"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D. D. in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia.)

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

"The book will create a sensation in Masonic circles, and evoke criticism of a most relentless character. The courage of the author in attacking such a rock-rooted bulwark as Freemasonry is something to admire, Fanatic though he be."—Nebraska Watchman.

"Light is needed on this subject and needed badly, and we welcome this contribution to the literature of anti-secretism, and cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers."—United Presbyterian, (Pittsburgh.)

"A charming work, fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin;' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the hook, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.'"—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ills.)

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"There is no important history extant but has connected with it numerous other histories of which it was the initial point, or the dominating influence. The abduction and murder of Morgan set ten thousand secret springs in motion, as the surrender of the charters of so many lodges at that time, and the severing of their connection with the order of some forty thousand of its members indicated. This story is one of these histories, and is a collection of facts woven into a story. It cannot fail to be read with interest."—Free Methodist, Chicago.

"The republication of the Reform Story which run through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these make a helpful addition for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind."—Christian Cynosure.

"It is one of the most fascinating narratives we ever read and teaches its lesson in a manner not soon to be forgotten. It is evidently written for the heart and its words go to the heart. It is singularly free from wild denunciation. Those who are interested in the secret society question would do well to form the acquaintance of this interesting work."—Lutheran Standard, Columbus, O.

"The exciting scenes of the fall of 1826, at Batavia, N. Y., when Wm. Morgan was murdered by Masonry, are woven into the story so as to give the truth of History a setting of attractiveness. The forty chapters of the volume are soon compassed by the eager reader who begins the volume. This volume ought to be read and will be sought as its merits become known."—United Brethren in Christ.

"The story is intensely interesting and the author has succeeded in weaving into it a great deal of information in regard to this mysterious order, which is certainly startling if true, and he gives what seems to be undoubted evidence to prove his assertions. The book is one which should be read by both Masons and Antimasons."—Wayne Co. Herald.

"Our Anti-secret society friends are certainly entitled to great credit for their persistence in their efforts to expose and root out secretism. The object of the writer of this story is to present in its true light the crafty, unscrupulous and exceedingly hurtful influence of Masonry, the parent of all the orders."—Reformed Presbyterian and Covenanter.

FARM NOTES.

BUGS AND POISON.

As the season for using Paris green is at hand it should be remembered that iron rust is the best antidote for this poison. Water strongly impregnated with iron is not to be used to dilute the poison, as the iron in it will neutralize a portion. Much of the danger from this poison may be avoided by applying it in weaker doses which are equally effective in destroying all insect life. For using on potatoes we mix one teaspoonful of Paris green thoroughly with 100 pounds or one bushel of fine gypsum.

It is reckoned by many good potato growers that the application of Paris green with land plaster to the potato crop practically costs nothing. The advantage to the potato from the gypsum on its leaves defrays the entire expense, even when two or more applications are made in a season.

It is quite likely that London purple, another arsenical prepartion, will take the place of Paris green as insect poison. It is cheaper and is less likely to burn the leaves by excessive doses. The objection to it is that it works more slowly, sometimes two or three days elapsing before much effect is seen.

There is no use attempting to poison the old beetles which appear on the potato vines as soon as they come up. They are not there to eat but to lay eggs and propagate their kind. Only the larvæ can be destroyed by poison, as these alone eat the leaves of the potato. Much injury is done to potato vines when young by repeated doses of poison, made stronger at each application because the first did not effect anything.—American Cultivator.

CULTIVATING CORN AND POTATOES.

Nearly level culture is undoubtedly best for corn; and it is probable that much depth of tillage is not usually required. The corn plant loves the warmth of the sun, and every inch of depth of cultivation beyond what is needed to destroy weeds is an obstruction to the sunlight and to heat. Pulverized soil stirred so frequently that corn roots cannot run through it, is a mulch whose tendency is to make the sub-soil moister, and, therefore, cooler. This tendency is, in part, counteracted by the heating of manure or of clover sod under the furrow. Without this bottom heat, a finely pulverized soil is colder six or eight inches below the surface than a soil that has not been cultivated.

In what is called level culture there will be a slight elevation around the hill, where the cultivator throws small particles of dirt which cannot be turned back. Just before the corn is laid by, it is a good plan to cultivate so as to cover the small weeds which are apt to start at midsummer around the plant. Early in the season, though, the cultivation should be either level, or rather away from the corn plant, there is little danger of uprooting a young spear of corn, even though only slightly above the surface. Its root is certainly three or four times as long as the part above the ground; and, if some dirt is drawn from it, the effect will only be to give more sunlight and warmth.

In cultivating potatoes the advocates of level culture overlook the necessity for protecting the tubers from sunburning. Whether we plant deep or shallow, a considerable proportion of most kinds of potatoes will set near the surface, and will need some sort of a hill for their protection. Every year millions of bushels of potatoes are rendered nearly worthless for edible purposes by being exposed and greened by the summer sun. So unsalable are these potatoes that in years when the price is low they are often left ungathered in the field. Theoretically, by planting four or five inches deep, we should secure a setting of tubers low enough down to avoid injury. With some varieties this may be true. Others, however, will set high, even though planted low.

The hoe has been largely superceded for tilling corn and potatoes by implements worked by horse power. Intelligently used, however, the hoe is a valuable implement. It is generally better policy to cut out late-starting weeds in corn close to the stalk than to cover them up with dirt at random, as it must be by horse power, in which many will escape. In destroying thistles or quack grass in corn the last work must be done by the hoe; for it will be after ears have set, and the corn cannot be worked by horse without breaking many off. It requires considerable labor to do this; but a part of the increased expense will be repaid by the larger crop. The hoe is, however, often so used on young corn as to do as much injury as good. Hired help, especially from the old country, know no way to hoe corn except to draw earth around it. This is a double injury, as it takes moist earth from the center of the rows, breaking off many feeding roots, and it destroys the brace roots which start from the stalk and are designed to protect it from blowing down by storms. Level culture, it is now admitted by near ly all, is more favorable for keeping corn upright than the old fashioned plan of hilling.

A NEW PAMPHLET.

A WOMAN'S VICTORY;

OR

THE QUERY OF THE LODGEVILLE CHURCH

BY JENNIE L. HARDIE.

This simple and touching story which was lately published in the Cynosure is now ready for orders in a beautiful pamphlet. It is worth reading by every Anti-mason —and especially BY HIS WIFE. Get it and take it home to cheer the heart of your companion who may desire to do something for Christ against great evils, but is discouraged from making any public effort. PRICE, FIFTEEN CENTS. Ten for a dollar

WEBSTER'S PRACTICAL A NEW DEPARTURE IN DICTIONARIES.

An Industrial Revolution.—In a large Connecticut manufacturing establishment there is in operation a new style of furnace which produces more steam-power from a consumption of 1,000 lbs of coal than can be generated from 20,000 lbs burned in the ordinary way. In other words, the new contrivance already saves nineteen-twontieths of the fuel, and it is believed that before being publicly announced it will be so improved that the saving will reach 49 fiftieths! The facts already developed are simply incredible to one who has not actually seen them verified.

A Remarkable Coincidence.—While the new Furnace was in process of construction, the editors and publishers of Webster's Unabridged were engaged upon their new work which is as great an improvement upon all previous Dictionary productions, and just as valuable in its way as is the incredible fuel economizer above alluded to. Webster's Practical is not only a new compilation by the leading Dictionary House of the world, but it embodies several new features which, for ordinary use, rendor it pre-eminent among dictionaries—not excepting even the Unabridged.

1st, Condensation.—By grouping all derivative and compound words under their root or leader (as in the "Book" example quoted below), such words are adequately treated in one-third of the space required by the old arrangement. By this means nearly all the desirable material of the four and five-dollar dictionaries is presented in a convenient and handy form in Webster's Practical.

2d, Association.—We comprehend as well as remember things chiefly by their associations. For this reason any one who shall carefully read the "Book" paragraph which we reproduce from Webster's Practical Dictionary, will not only comprehend it more readily, but will be able to remember two or three times as much as would be gained by reading about the same words when treated separately as in other works.

3d, Ready Reference.—Not only do we comprehend and remember more readily by the new grouping method, but we do it in less than a fourth of the time required when the words are classified in the old way. Hence, no one who values time would hesitate to pay one dollar for Webster's Practical rather than accept the best of the older dictionaries as a gift.

4th, Derivative Terminations.—Only the larger dictionaries hitherto published give the derivative terminations. The New American Dictionary, for instance, does not give any of the four variations of so common a word as forbear, while they are all given in Webster's Practical.

5th, The Illustrations in Webster's Practical are more numerous and better executed than those of any other ahridged or low-priced dictionary.

6th, Prefixes and Suffixes.—Another important feature of Webster's Practical is its peculiar treatment of prefixes and suffixes, which is believed to be more desirable than a separate department of two or three hundred pages which is sometimes allotted to them.

7th, Compendium Matter.—Still another invaluable feature of Webster's Practical is its compendium matter, over one hundred pages of which is devoted to the most complete Pronouncing Vocabulary ever compiled of Biblical, Classical, Mythological, Historical and Geographical Proper names. With Webster's Practical Dictionary at hand, one need not be at a loss to correctly pronounce or spell the most difficult words.

8th, An Invaluable Book.—The importance of supplying every child with Webster's Practical for his very own, is not generally appreciated. As an educator it is worth a hundred times its price, and a little self-denial to provide one or more copies in every family will prove a better economy than an endowment of hoarded bank-stocks later on in life.

The following paragraph is reproduced from Webster's Practical.

Book, bŏŏk, n. A collection of sheets of paper, etc., bound together; a literary composition, written or printed; a subdivision of a literary work. (Mer.) A volume in which accounts are kept. — v. t. [BOOKED (bŏŏkt), BOOKING.] To enter, or register in a book. — Book'ish, a. Given to reading; more acquainted with books than with men. — Book'-bind'er, n. One who binds books. — -bind'ery, n. A place for binding, etc. — -bind'ing, n. Art or practice of, etc. — -case, n. A case with shelves for holding books. (Bind.) A book-cover. — -cov'er, n. (Bind.) A case for a book; a cover of cloth or other material prepared for casing a book. — -keep'er, n. One who keeps accounts. — -keep'ing, n. Art of recording mercantile transactions and keeping accounts. — -learned, -lĕrnd, a. Versed in books; ignorant of life. — -learn'ing, n. Learning acquired by reading,—esp. as opp. to practical knowledge. — -mak'er, n. One who writes and publishes books; a compiler; a sporting man who makes a record of bets. — -mak'ing, n. The practice of, etc.; compilation; systematized betting. — -mark, n. Something placed in a book by which to find a particular place. — -plate, n. A label indicating ownership, place in a library, etc., usually on the inside of the cover of a book. — -post, n. The post-office arrangement by which books are mailed. — -sell'er, n. One who sells books. — -shelf, n. A shelf to hold books. — -shop, -stall, -store, n. A place for selling books. — -stand, n. A stand for selling books in the streets; book-stall; a support to hold books. — -worm, n. A worm or mite that eats holes in books; one excessively addicted to study.

THE QUANTITY TEST.

Webster's Practical Dictionary, ($1) 600,000 Words and 1,400 Illustrations.
New American Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Popular Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Standard Dictionary, ($1) 210,000 Words and 612 Illustrations.

Quality Test.—Aside from all advantages above alluded to, there is still another and very important feature of the new work to be considered, viz.: its quality as compared with the cheap dictionaries which have had the largest sales, and which have been compiled chiefly from the old editions of Webster on which the copyrights have expired. Hence Webster's Practical contains more matter than any other dollar dictionary. Its quality, to say the least, is the very best, while its arrangement and all other new and desirable features, including first-class illustrations, paper, printing and binding are added without extra charge.

A Subscription Book.—As Webster's Practical is not for sale at book-stores, our readers will be able to procure it only from canvassing agents, unless it be ordered in connection with this journal in accordance with our special offers.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Onnandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

Thurlow Weed's Great Letter

On the abduction and murder of WILLIAM MORGAN in 1826, which has been the most widely published of any Anti-masonic document. The dedication of a noble granite monument to the memory of Morgan, and the able and eloquent addresses of the Convention make this a most valuable pamphlet.

SEE WHY.

It contains—
1. Portrait of Morgan.
2. Portrait of Thurlow Weed.
3. Fine picture of the Monument.
4. The great letter of Thurlow Weed and his affidavit—almost the last public act of his life.
5. Address by J. E. Roy, D.D.
6. The monument oration by Pres. C. A. Blanchard.
7. Addresses on "Christian Politics" by Pres. J. Blanchard, on the Character of Freemasonry by Prof. E. D. Bailey, on the "Freedmen and Secret Societies" by Rev. H. H. Hinman; and very interesting personal and historical reminiscences.

IN BRIEF

The inventor of barbs on fence wire receives a royalty of $120,000 a year.

Perry Davis, the originator of the famous medicine known as the "Pain Killer," has been in the Mercer county (Pennsylvania) alms-house for the past fifteen years.

Thirty-five thousand dollars is said to be the price paid by the English publishers for the copyright of General Gordon's diary. It will not fill more than one ordinary volume.

Dr. Zintgraff, of Bonn, has taken a phonograph with him to Africa. He intends to bring home phonograms of the savage dialecte which he will hire the natives to speak into the machine.

The order of the Uruguayan government for the arrest of all priests who preach against the position taken by the government in regard to civil marriage, threatens to terminate in a rupture between the government and the Vatican.

An 18-year-old boy was before a Kentucky court for carrying deadly weapons. The judge consented to dismiss the case on condition that his mother openly cowhided him in court, which she did with a will, stripping him to the waist.

That was a clever boy who, when he was given five shilling to dig up his aunt's garden, hid a two shilling piece in it and told all the boys in the neighborhood. The next morning the ground was pulverized two feet deep.—N. Y. Sun.

A new musical instrument of great promise in aid of sacred music has just been exhibited in Boston. It is the invention of Mr. James Bailie Hamilton, of England. Rev. Phillips Brooks and others invited the inventor to give a public recital in Music Hall, Boston, to show its merits. A very large audience assembled. Mr. S. B. Whitney played the vocalion, the choir of men and boys from the church of the Advent assisting. Seldom has assembled in Music Hall a more interested audience. Good judges spoke highly in commendation of the purity of tone and wonderful carrying power of the instrument. It is said, "the reeds are of wood and leather and are perfect imitations of the human vocal chords." It is understood that a company in Worcester, Mass., has the manufacture in charge. In size this was much like an upright piano.

The annual pay-roll of the employes of the Chicago Postoffice is $430,405. This amount does not include letter-carriers or mail-bag repairers, who are paid out of a separate fund. The number of letter-carriers employed in the Chicago office at present is 321. The mail-bag repairers number thirteen, and porters six. In the first or executive division, including the financial and inquiry departments, watchmen, and helpers, there are forty men; in the second, or mailing division, 205; in the third, or city delivery and stations, 147; in the fourth, or registry department, there are 49 clerks, and in the fifth, or money order 30. This makes a grand total or 821 persons in the service.

It takes eighty men and women to make a postage stamp. First the white paper is cut into sheets, each large enough for a hundred stamps. The stamps on each sheet are counted twenty-six times, to make sure the number is correct. The printer counts and passes the sheet to gummer, the gummer gums the back, and, having counted, gives it to the perforator, who divides the stamps by rows of little holes, not forgetting to count. It is surprising how quickly and accurately the hands can work. Seven hundred million postage stamps are made every year in the United States. New York City uses eight millions a month.

Ronayne, Past Master of Keystone Lodge, No. 639, Chicago, gives the correct or "standard" work and ritual of Masonry; the proper position of each officer in the lodge room, order of opening and closing the lodge, dress of candidate, ceremony of initiation, the proper manner of giving the signs, gripe, etc., are fully illustrated and explained. First three degrees. Paper cover, 35 cents.

The Master's Carpet, or Masonry and Baal Worship Identical, explains the true source and meaning of every ceremony and symbol of the lodge, and proves that Modern Masonry is identical with the "Ancient Mysteries" of Paganism. Bound in fine cloth, 420 pp.....75 cts.

Freemasonry at a Glance Illustrates every sign, grip and ceremony of the first three degrees. Paper cover, 32 pages. Single copy, six cents.

Freemasonry Illustrated. A complete exposition of the seven degrees of the Blue Lodge and Chapter. Profusely illustrated. A historical sketch of the institution and a critical analysis of the character of each degree, by Prest. J. Blanchard, of Wheaton College. Monitorial quotations and nearly four hundred notes from standard Masonic authorities confirm the truthfulness of this exposition and show the character of Masonic teaching and doctrine. The accuracy of this exposition legally attested by J. O. Doeshurg, Past Master Unity □ No. 191, Holland, Mich., and others. This is the latest, most accurate and complete exposition of Blue Lodge and Chapter Masonry. Over one hundred illustrations—several of them full page—give a pictorial representation of the lodge-room, chapter and principal ceremonies of the degrees, with the dress of candidates, signs, grips, etc. Complete work of 640 pages, in cloth, $1 00 per dozen, $9.00. Paper covers, 75 cents; per dozen, $7.50. First three degrees (376 pages), in cloth, 75 cents; per dozen, $7.50. Paper cover, 40 cents; per dozen, $4.00. ☞The Masonic quotations are worth the price of this book.

Mah-Hah-Bone; comprises the Hand Book, Master's Carpet and Freemasonry at a Glance. Bound in one volume. This makes one of the most complete books of information on the workings and symbolism of Freemasonry extant. Well bound in cloth, 589 pp.....$1.00

Adoptive Masonry Illustrated. A full and complete illustrated ritual of the five degrees of Female Free Masonry, by Thomas Lowe; comprising the degree of Jephtha's Daughter, Ruth, Esther, Martha and Electa, and known as the Daughter's Degree, Widow's Degree, Wife's Degree, Sister's Degree and the Benevolent Degree. 20 cents each; per dozen, $1.75.

Knight Templarism Illustrated. A full illustrated ritual of the six degrees of the Council and Commandery, comprising the degrees of Royal Master, Select Master, Super-Excellent Master, Knight of the Red Cross, Knight Templar and Knight of Malta. A book of 341 pages. In cloth, $1.00; $8.50 per dozen. Paper covers, 50cts; $4.00 per dozen.

Grand Lodge Masonry. Its relation to civil government and the Christian religion. By Prest. J. Blanchard, at the Monmouth Convention. The un-Christian, anti-republican and despotic character of Freemasonry is proved from the highest Masonic authorities. 5 cents each; per dozen. 50 cents.

Judge Whitney's Defense before the GRAND LODGE OF ILLINOIS. Judge Daniel H Whitney was Master of the lodge when S. L Keith, a member of his lodge, murdered Ellen Slade. Judge Whitney, by attempting to bring Keith to justice, brought on himself the vengeance of the lodge, but he boldly replied to the charges against him, and afterwards renounced Masonry. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25

Oaths and Penalties of Freemasonry, as proved in court in the New Berlin Trial. Also the letter of Hon. Richard Rush to the anti-Masonic committee of York County, Pa., May 4th, 1831 The New Berlin trials began in the attempt of Freemasons to prevent public initiations by seceding Masons. These trials were held at New Berlin, Chenango Co., N. Y., April 13 and 14th, 1831, and General Augustus C. Welsh, sheriff of the county, and other adhering Freemasons, swore to the truthful revelation of the oaths and penalties. 10 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

Stearns' Inquiry into the Nature and TENDENCY OF FREEMASONRY. With an Appendix treating on the truth of Morgan's Exposition and containing remarks on various points in the character of Masonry, and a Dialogue on the necessity of exposing the lodge. 338 pages: cloth, 60 cents each per dozen, $5.00. Paper covers, 40 cents each; per dozen, $4.00.

Masonic Oaths Null and Void; or, Freemasonry Self-Convicted. This is a book for the times. The design of the author is to refute the arguments of those who claim that the oaths of Freemasonry are binding upon those who take them. His arguments are conclusive, and the forcible manner in which they are put, being drawn from Scripture, makes them convincing. The minister or lecturer will find in this work a rich fund of arguments. 207 pp., postpaid.....40 cts.

Bernard's Appendix to Light on MaSONRY. Showing the character of the institution by its terrible oaths and penalties. Paper covers: 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Freemasonry Self-Condemned. By Rev J. W. Bain. A careful and logical statement of reasons why secret orders should not be fellowshiped by the Christian Church, and by the United Presbyterian church in particular. Paper covers: price 20 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Masonry a Work of Darkness, adverse to Christianity, and inimical to republican government. By Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong (Presbyterian), a seceding Mason of 21 degrees. This is a very telling work and no honest man who reads it will think of joining the lodge. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

The Mystic Tie, or Freemasonry a LEAGUE WITH THE DEVIL. This is an account of the church trial of Peter Cook and wife, of Elkhart, Indiana, for refusing to support a reverend Freemason; and their very able defense presented by Mrs. Lucia C. Cook, in which she clearly shows that Freemasonry is antagonistic to the Christian religion. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

Sermon on Masonry, by Rev. James Williams, Presiding Elder of Dakota District Northwestern Iowa Conference, M. E. Church—a seceding Master Mason. Published at the special request of nine clergymen of different denominations, and others. 10 cents each; per dozen, 75 cents.

Are Masonic Oaths Binding on one InITIATE. By Rev. A. L. Post. Proof of the sinfulness of such oaths and the consequent duty of all who have taken them to openly repudiate them. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Freemasonry Contrary to the ChrisTIAN RELIGION. A clear, cutting argument against the lodge, from a Christian standpoint 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Thirteen Reasons why a Christian should not be a Freemason. By Rev. Robert Armstrong. The author states his reasons clearly and carefully, and any one of the thirteen reasons, if properly considered, will keep a Christian out of the lodge. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Oaths and Penalties of the 33 DeGREES OF FREEMASONRY. To get these thirty-three degrees of Masonic bondage, the candidate takes half-a-million horrible oaths. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

ON ODDFELLOWSHIP.

Sermon on Odd-fellowship and Other Secret Societies, by Rev. J. Sarver, pastor Evangelical Lutheran church, Leechburg, Pa. THE PILLOW-INHALER!
ALL-NIGHT INHALATION

Cures CATARRH, HAY-FEVER, ASTHMA and CONSUMPTION, by enabling the sufferer to inhale powerful, healing, soothing and curative vapors ALL-NIGHT—eight hours out of the twenty-four—whilst sleeping as usual, and without any discomfort. Used the same as an ordinary pillow. No pipes or tubes. Concealed reservoirs in the Pillow hold the liquid and volatile balms. There is no dosing the stomach, no douching or snuffing, but, just as a smoky lamp will leave a deposit on a whitened wall, so the PILLOW-INHALER, for eight hours at a time, spreads a powerful healing balm or salve on the inflamed inner coating of the diseased air-surfaces, from the nostrils to the bottom of the lungs, and hence into the blood. It is a constitutional and local cure at the same time. Its success is wonderful—a success that is changing despair into hope, and filling homes with joy. It is inexpensive and can be used by any one. Call and see it, or send for pamphlet and testimonials.
CATARRH. HAY-FEVER. CONSUMPTION.

IF OUR READERS are not satisfied that the proposals of the N. C. A. Board (see 8th page) will make their paper one of the best in the country they are hard to please. But we have in store something valuable besides. There is a little necessary delay in preparing the sketch that will accompany the fine portrait of HON. SAMUEL PLUMB, which is all ready, and next week we propose to begin the evidence that the great temperance movement in America was begun by Anti-masons! This will be with a fine portrait and sketch of REV. LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG. We hope to follow soon with portraits of DR. BENJAMIN RUSH, whose centennial is to be observed in September, and DR. GEORGE B. CHEEVER, author of "Deacon Giles's Distillery."

The city of Monmouth, Ill., is prohibition by an earnest good-will as well as by statute. The American Express company having delivered beer in the town contrary to the ordinance, suit was brought by the town, but before the trial came off the general superintendent came down from Chicago, paid the costs to settle the suit and had it dismissed, giving orders that the city regulations should be observed while in force. Why did not Neal Dow and his friends in Portland do as well by the Grand Army?

The difficulty that has arisen over the appointment of a United States consul at Prague in Austro-Hungary, shows with what tenacity the old despotisms of Europe hold to their old semi-barbarous ideas of the necessity of standing armies, and the virtue of bloody and revengeful wars. Charles Jonas, of Racine, Wis., was selected by President Cleveland for the position, but Austria objects, because Jonas, when a boy in Prague University, wrote a severe criticism of the military laws of the empire. If the customs of savage life, which have so long prevailed amid the so-called civilization of Europe, could be for an instant relaxed the kings, emperors, dukes, grandees and what not, would see in him who attacked the war system, a friend of humanity whose efforts should be encouraged, not suppressed. Obliged to leave Bohemia because of his school-boy sentiments Mr. Jonas has become the editor of the most influential Bohemian paper in the United States, and for several years has been engaged in editing books to enable his countrymen to become intelligent English students. At the time of his appointment he was at work on a large Anglo-Bohemian dictionary.

Following the success of Dr. Kittredge and others in this city in the suppression of the races on the Lord's Day, comes the decision of our new Postmaster Judd to stop the sale of stamps on that day. Its first effect is a loud grumbling from a crowd of people who have paid no attention to the order, so accustomed are they to a total disregard of the Sabbath. The daily papers which have a Sunday edition look with distrust and jealousy upon any public attempt to hallow the day and join the grumblers. Nevertheless we hope Mr. Judd will remain firm. On Monday the press reports told of President Cleveland spending the day before fishing at Woodmont, Pa. It may be these reports overstep, as they often do, the truth. At least, Mr. Cleveland, who has shown much regard for the convictions of the people, should have heeded their feelings in this matter, even if he has no care for the day itself. It would be well if all the government officials should read and heed the following from a decision of the United States Supreme Court, lately given by Judge Field: "Laws setting aside Sunday as a day of rest are upheld, not from any right of the government to legislate for the promotion of religious observances, but from its right to protect all persons from the physical and moral debasement which comes from uninterrupted labor. Such laws have always been deemed beneficent and merciful laws, especially to the poor and dependent, to the laborers in our factories and work-shops, and in the heated rooms of our cities; and their validity has been sustained by the highest courts of the States."

The news of an abortive attempt of the Anamites of Tonquin to throw off the French yoke lately fastened upon them, as well as the reports from Madagascar, give a special interest to the position of the moderate Republican party of France. A general election is pending in that country, and at a meeting of the representatives of that party last week in Paris, a manifesto was prepared to be issued to the voters of the Republic. In the summary of the document, given herewith, the demand for a reduction of the military service and condemnation of the foreign policy of greed are of great importance: "1. A demand for a reduction in the period of military service to the shortest term compatible with the exigencies of the national defense. 2. A demand for economic reforms, especially a readjustment of taxation and the reestablishment of a real equilibrium in the budget. 3. In regard to the proposal to separate church and state, the manifesto says that although opinions differ among Republicans, all can agree upon a policy which, while it will guarantee freedom of conscience, will resolutely oppose clericalism, which, under the mask of religion, is really a union of all the factions hostile to the Republic. 4. The platform condemns a foreign policy of adventure, and declares that the desire of the Republican party is for a national policy based on self-respect firmly carried out. 5. The manifesto in conclusion appeals for a union of all French Republicans against the Monarchists."

The cholera scourge which last year devastated the valleys of Southern France and Northern Italy, and this year has appeared with more dreadful fatality in Spain, is not unexpected in this country, and the health authorities of our large cities have been giving some attention to the public sanitary arrangements which may prevent, or check at least, its fatality. But the temperance societies are indirectly doing also a great work of prevention, for United States Consul F. H. Mason reporting from Marseilles, France, says: "In its choice of victims the cholera was most precise and definite. With rare exceptions they belong to one of the four following classes of persons: Those who live under bad hygienic conditions in respect to food and lodgings; those who are imprudent in respect to eating, drinking, and exposure; those weakened and debilitated by alcoholic excess, and those who suffer from chronic digestive weakness or derangement. Among the imprudences which become dangerous in the presence of cholera are overeating to the extent of producing lethargy or indigestion, drinking any liquid so-called, as a check to the process of digestion, eating raw vegetables in the form of salads, and in general the use of raw fruits, unless perfectly fresh and ripe. The drinking of cold water or beer after having eaten fruit is a direct challenge to cholera which no person, however strong and healthy, can afford to risk. The susceptibility of drunkards to cholera influences is proven by abundant evidence, among which may be cited the sweeping fatality of the disease wherever it attacked the inmates of inebriate asylums; anything, in fact, whether of a temporary or of a chronic nature, which impairs the vigor of the digestive organs exposes the persons weakened to choleric attack.

THE ULTIMATE ISSUE.

BY REV. M. A. GAULT.

The Religious Amendment movement has for over twenty years been pushing the agitation of the question, "Shall this country be ruled by Christian morality or infidel licentiousness?"

The last great conflict was whether the country should be controlled by African slavery, or American liberty. We settled that question in favor of liberty, but not until three billions of treasure, and half a million lives had perished in the war. The great question in that conflict was, "On which side is the Constitution?" The logic of events compelled us to admit that it was on the side of slavery, and we had to correct it.

In like manner the question in this rising conflict is, "On which side is the Constitution?" Is it for Christian morality, or against it? Nothing but the religious amendment will settle this question. I remember when large churches were crowded before the war, while ministers and others earnestly debated the question, "Resolved, that slavery was unconstitutional, etc." The large majority took the affirmative then, but the war settled the question in the negative. Will another war be necessary to settle this other question? Many think it will; that God must again shake us over the pit of ruin before we awake to the fact that our Constitution is on the side of the liberalist.

As in the other case the great majority now say it is not. I presented this issue recently before the Chicago Presbyterian ministers' association. The roll was then called and each minister presented his views on the question. I noted sentences defining the position of each, and here submit it to the readers of the Cynosure.

Dr. Patterson, Revs. J. C. Myers, Geo. Noyes, and W. S. Post, wondered if such an amendment would make us any more a Christian nation. While they deplored the secularizing tendencies of our times, yet they failed to see how this movement would effect the question. They expressed themselves in sympathy with such agitation as would educate public sentiment in harmony with the law of Christ.

Dr. Skinner and Rev. W. O. Latimore thought it infringed upon the sphere of other associations. They had never found sufficient warrant for such a movement. The education of Christian sentiment is the work of the church.

Rev. J. N. Trowbridge did not see that such an amendment would result in the good that would justify the labor necessary to secure it.

Rev. J. T. Lamont said he used to favor it, but the more he thought of it, the more he regarded it as a useless enterprise. In fact he believed it would do more harm than good.

Rev. N. C. Granger believed the Constitution was stronger as it was.

Rev. A. M. Mann said his mind was in sympathy with the movement.

Dr. W. T. Meloy said he was determinedly opposed to secularizing the government. He resided in Ohio in 1880, when a new State constitution was proposed, and he noticed that the phrase, "In the year of our Lord," was omitted. Secularization of government is the order of the day. Times had changed since he was a boy, and was taught to take off his hat when an oath was administered in his presence. The Democratic party in Ohio had a plank calling for a purely secular government, administered on a purely secular basis. From such a government he prayed to be delivered.

Revs. D. S. Kennedy, W. J. Woodbridge, and J. N. Walker did not know that they were ready to acquiesce in the movement. They took no stock in attempting to advance Christianity by statute law. The remedy for evil is not to rush to law. You cannot force men to be religious, or shoot them into heaven by a civil statute. The best thing the church can do is to stand away over yonder and let the State stand away in the opposite direction. Keep religion and politics as far apart as possible.

Rev. James Bassett thought a great conflict was rising between Christianity and infidelity. We must meet the opposition with more vigorous effort.

Rev. D. S. Caslin said he was a rank Prohibitionist, and felt in sympathy with a movement like this.

Dr. Herrick Johnson said he would be glad to see such an amendment, but he had never felt the importance of it as others do. He thought we have in substance what the amendment proposes.

Rev. E. N. Sawers said he believed as they used to say in Scotland, "There was a King James and a King Jesus, but the former was only the servant of the latter." He dissented strongly from the idea of separating politics from religion. He hailed this movement with joy. Every speech made in such a cause would tone up and strengthen the public conscience.

SMOKED AND PICKLED.

BY ELDER NATHAN CALLENDER.

There is a place conceded to the traveling smoker —"the smoking car," so called, though the car itself is innocent of the charge, only as the effects of smoking animals, called men. This smoking car arrangement is supposed to be a remedy for the smoking nuisance to the traveling public. We have a right to the question, which is the greater offense to the traveler, smoking or smoked men? (we use the word men with some allowance) which is the most offensive and damaging to health, to go right into the smoke house and take the tobacco fumes fresh, or to be in close contact with men both smoked and pickled with tobacco and with poison beverages.

To make this question plainer, imagine yourselves in a smoke-house where the fresh smoke tends in some degree to keep off the stale and fœtid odors of tobacco-pickled and liquor-soaked men whose bodies and breath send off a "stinking savor," and then suppose you are surrounded by tons of smoked men without the fresh smoke to abate the sickening effects, and you would almost wish yourselves in the smoke-house and have done with it.

Of this I had an impressive example two days ago, when a huge human form, with all the tokens of a sensual life on him, occupied a seat in too close contact with me for comfort. The stench—it was a stench—was quite tangible enough to impress the sense of a Nihilist of the existence of the real and the substantial. Along with the smoking car there should be also the smokers' car; and if smokers and tipplers cannot agree to travel together in the same coach (we sumbit they should) then let us have class cars in earnest, founded on the "fitness of things." Put the clean animals, clear of bad drinks and poison weeds and drugs, where they justly belong, in the first-class coach (rich or poor, black or white) and the unclean into the second and third class cars according to character. While on this class question, we submit also that church edifices ought to be arranged in mercy to the clean worshipper, who could surely do better service in church in pure air and healthy respiration. We are believers in "natural selection and survival of the fittest" in the full and free development of a godly life, and would implore all men, especially Christians, to "put away all filthiness of the flesh and spirit and so perfect holiness in the fear of God."

This tobacco curse is only a little behind the liquor curse in debauching and blunting the moral sense. It is high time that somebody takes high ground in God's name in this branch of reform. David Wilmot said on the slavery question: "I will get upon the highest pinnacle and there wait for the rising of the waters." This he did, and though he did not live to see the end, the waters did rise high enough, thank God, to sweep slavery from the highest pinnacle of the nation. Somebody must lead off and with the spirit of the martyrs, thunder against this awful debauchery of the people by this agent of Satan, tobacco. God in his own way has made the heavens light and vocal by the thunders of his voice. His thunders are all around the skies and his lightnings to the ends of the earth. But lightnings and thunders will not arouse the people. They have become used to his voice as they are to the literal thunders. Several of the "stars of heaven" have recently fallen and another is now trembling in its course, ready to fall to the earth prematurely, through the long and reckless breach of physical law. Poor souls, rushing into the presence of their Maker "before the time" by intemperance—yes, intemperance! How about the tobacco inebriate entering the kingdom of God?

Sometimes when the ordinary voices of nature and her God fail to awaken stupid man he sends the earthquake and "shakes the earth terribly and makes man's heart faint, and his knees to tremble at his awful voice." We believe that nothing short of a moral earthquake which shall shake the world—the church, yea, the clergy, enough to put out the fires kindled as by the sparks of Satan's forge, under the very nose, in the face and eyes of God's sacramental host by their own hands. And we should hope and humbly pray that all God's people who "chew the cud" would get the lock-jaw long enough to lock tobacco out and lose the key to a morbid and ruinous appetite and "divide the hoof" from this tobacco-steeped world.

KILLING BY FAINT PRAISE.

Masonic writers frequently admit a particle of censure in a volume of praise in the defense of their order to preserve an appearance of impartiality and gain the confidence of the public. The attacks of some writers on Good Templarism apparently partake of this character, and, although they may present the worst features of particular lodges they leave the impression of much good and little evil, whereas in others the reverse is true. It is said that a church society in New York city is running a skating rink beneath its place of worship, but that all rinks are not conducted by Christians is proved by the stringent laws for their regulation. In the same manner few Good Templar lodges are largely composed of, or controlled by Christians as is attested by the acknowledged fact that Good Templars are sometimes employed by Freemasons to mob Anti-masonic lecturers.

Schuyler's Lake lodge was composed of the general public, but mainly of the younger portion, who were attracted by the novelty and fell off when it ceased to be such until its numbers were brought to a low ebb and the vital spark was finally extinguished by internal dissensions. The temporarily reformed then withdrew to their bottles, the giddy to the dancing hall, and the questionable characters to their usual retreats. It seems to have been mainly employed by secretism for proselyting the young and served its purpose effectually. Few or none were excluded. The good were invited with the bad, "the humblest man and the most degraded sister," (EXPOSITION) and if its other effects have been as effectually obliterated as its temperance character, it is well for the community. But the escort of a male Templar at night is still sometimes sought by a married one of the opposite sex, which is described by one writer as a characteristic of the order. The churches have declined; the pastors are supported with difficulty and many years have elapsed since a religious revival has occurred. On the other hand the prosperity of its two hotel bars and drug store are unsurpassed in villages of equal size in neighboring counties, and the Masonic lodge subsequent to the collapse of the Good Templars reported a membership of seventy to which additions have been made. Such are the results of a Good Templar revival. *

THREE or four years ago the editor of this paper, then connected with the local press of Chicago, was almost nightly attending land leagues, and meetings of labor agitators and strikers. Now, in those same halls in various parts of the city he is attending meetings of building associations. How great and refreshing the change! In many cases he meets the same people who were then agitators now peaceably going to work to get homes for themselves. Get a a labor agitator into a building association and he at once becomes on a small scale a capitalist. His interest in the community changes, and in a short time he is on the road to prosperity. Look into it, and you will find that nine out of ten of the wealthy and prosperous men of to-day began their career by saving their little earnings, and even after they have become rich they do not squander and waste their money as many of our working people do.—American Building Association News.

A PROBLEM.

One of the best written and most popular of the graduation pieces at last Wheaton Commencement was that of Miss Florence C. Johnson, who discussed some features of the woman suffrage question under the above title. The Union Signal published it entire, and we copy the following passages:

Already many social and political questions have been brought out, but there are other important ones still demanding our attention. The slave question was one fraught with difficulties, perplexities, and ere it was settled occasioned bloodshed and sorrow, but it was settled and set aside.

At present, intemperance, secret orders, freedom of thought, the press, religious liberty, the relations of labor and capital, and last, but not least, the woman question, demand the thought and verdict of the people. It seems hardly needful to argue that a problem respecting the happiness and destinies of one-half of the human race is important. Much has been written and said concerning the sphere of woman. We dismiss this question with the affirmation that the sphere of any rational being, whether man or woman, is that place which he or she can most perfectly fill with the highest exercise of the powers given by the Creator.

What is she and what can she do are the questions for our consideration. One has said, "The girl who makes the poet sigh is a very different creature from the one who makes his soup." Fancy paints her an angel, but she, after all, is only flesh and blood, possessed of the wants and weaknesses of her brother. The savage would make her a slave, the Asiatic an ornament and a plaything; but the Christian a companion and fellow-worker with man in all things.

There are three stages through which all reforms must pass, ridicule, argument and adoption. The first and second on this question have passed, the third has his foot on the threshold, his hand on the latch. Already in twenty States and territories of the United States woman can vote. In three States she has a voice in all questions affecting the public weal. In some States she is allowed to vote on matters pertaining to school questions, in others concerning taxes, and in one State on the temperance issue.

One thing which concerns woman most deeply is the protection of her home. She has found that simply training her children in the ways of godliness is not sufficient to secure their well being. Outside the home circle are snares innumerable hidden for her loved ones' feet. She has plead, and toiled, and wept, and died, and still the work of death goes on. O, men of America! give her the power to remove these traps and pitfalls, to strike down these enemies of her home. When first she entered this warfare in the interest of her home, country, and God, her only thought was to conquer by prayers and entreaties, but only a few years ago she began to realize that these weapons were insufficient, and now she feels that nothing short of the ballot can enable her together with her brother to gain the victory in this conflict with King Alcohol.

The secret orders are also enemies to woman. When the sacred institution of marriage was established, the Lord ordained that husband and wife should be one. The vows taken in these societies virtually destroy the bonds of this holy union. The influence of woman is to purify, to restrain, to exalt, and when she is excluded from the companionship of her brothers, they cannot but degenerate.

The records of the past corroborate the statement that woman is competent to make her mark in the world, as she has done many things of which her sisters of the present age may justly be proud. Adverse circumstances have not entirely hidden her talents and heroism. The Bible teaches that she is fitted for positions of honor and trust. To Mary was given the highest honor ever bestowed upon mortal. She was chosen to be the mother of our Lord. Hannah poured into the golden censer, waved by the angel before the throne of the Almighty, the incense of her petition. Her mission was to impress the purity and strength of her daily life upon one whose career as a distinguished prophet and judge was illustrious. Great men, as in this case, have had great mothers. Deborah was a prophetess, judge, warrior and poet of the chosen people of God.

In the history of nations, the hand of woman has often touched the spring of their destinies.

By ignoring one-half of the human race, many social, political and religious schemes have failed and will fail, for truly one has said that politics will not go right, religion will not go right, nothing human will ever go right, except in so far as woman goes right.

When the gates of Paradise were closed on the first human pair, the angel of light seeing the anguish on the faces of the exiles, prayed that the punishment might be less grievous. "I do not punish," said the loving Father, "I only discipline that they might enter the gates of the infinite." Then the angel formed the rose which he threw upon the bosom of Eve. She pressed the heavenly blossom to her lips in an ecstacy of delight, and exclaimed: "He is no longer angry, this is a gift of his love."

As the rose, from whose sweet perfume comes the odor of heaven, is to woman a token and pledge of favor restored, so woman is to man in this wilderness and desert of sin.

Is it not time that a magnanimous nation say to those who would keep her bound in the grave clothes of a dead past, Proclaim liberty throughout all lands, to all the inhabitants thereof! Break every yoke, and let the oppressed go free.

IS CHRISTIANITY DECLINING?

[From an article in the North American Review by the Rev. Dr. C. H. Parkhurst, pastor of the Madison Ave. Presbyterian Church, New York.]

The tendency to prognosticate evil of Christ and his doctrine is no new thing in the world. In the sixteenth chapter of Mark we read, "And when the Sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of James, and Salome, had bought sweet spices that they might come and anoint him;" and this is what the world has been volunteering to do for Jesus now these 1800 years. The ointment and the embalmers are at the sepulcher betimes, but the Lord walks yet in the garden. In the North American Review of December, 1879, Froude says, "Protestantism has failed." In the Atlantic Monthly of a little earlier date Goldwin Smith writes, "Belief in Christianity as a revealed and supernatural religion has given way." In 1868 Dr. Ewer issued a book entitled "Protestantism a failure." Buckle, in his "History of Civilization in England," claimed that Protestantism had seen its best days. "In the times of Aaron Burr," says Parton, "it was confidently predicted that Christianity could not survive two more generations." Of the same period another writer states that "Wild and vague expectations were everywhere entertained, especially among the young, of a new order of things about to commence, in which Christianity would be laid aside as an obsolete system." Considerably more than a century ago Voltaire said, "Before the beginning of the 19th century Christianity will have disappeared from the earth." It is an instructive coincidence that the room in which Voltaire uttered these words has since been used as a Bible repository. "They came unto the sepulcher bringing the spices which they had prepared, and they entered in and found not the body of the Lord Jesus." And it is still so; a redundancy of ointment, but no corpse.

As to any suspicion that there is going forward in society a process of moral deterioration, such suspicion is historically unfounded and is explicable on three grounds: the avidity of newspapers, which stand in electric connection with the remotest quarters of the country and make a point of giving largest prominence to whatever will satisfy an appetite for the sensational; meager acquaintance with the moral condition of society fifty, a hundred, or a thousand, years ago; and an elevated moral sentiment that takes offense now at what in times past would have been accounted as tolerable or even unexceptionable. Writing of a period a hundred years back, a recent contributor to Blackwood's Magazine says, "It was an age when delicate young women of the best blood and best manners in the land talked with a coarseness which editors of the nineteenth century can represent only by asterisks." It is part of the history of the old church at Andover, Mass., that the chief causes of discipline for 125 years were fornication and drunkenness. Theodore Parker, writing in regard to the fathers of New England, says, "It is easier to praise them for virtues they did not possess than to judge them with fairness and discrimination." As illustrating the coarse intemperance of the times among Christian people, he states that it is recorded in the probate office that "in 1678, at the funeral of the widow of John Norton, one of the ministers of the First Church, in Boston, above fifty gallons of wine were consumed by the mourners. Just two hundred years ago at the funeral of the pastor of the church at Ipswich, Mass., there were consumed one barrel of wine and two barrels of cider. If this occurred at the funeral of an old and loved pastor, we can infer what excesses would be habitual on occasions less stated and solemn. In a historical survey of the Congregational churches of one of the New England States, it is related that "not very far from the period of the Revolution, several councils were held in one of the towns where the people were trying to get rid of a minister who was often the worse for liquor, even in the pulpit, and once at least at the communion table! but some of the neighboring ministers stood by him, and the people had to endure him till his death." This reminds me of the case of one who not above fifty years ago was deacon of a prominent church in western Massachusetts, who had habitually a drunken spree as an after-effect of tasting the wine at a sacrament, but whose irregularities were not considered by the church sufficient ground for ecclesiastical impeachment. Rev. Dr. Leonard Woods said, "I remember when I could reckon up among my acquaintances forty ministers who were intemperate." A gentleman, in writing to a Boston paper about that date, said, "I have a list of 123 intemperate deacons in Massachusetts, 43 of whom became sots."

A word or two will be in place in regard to church attendance and church membership. Dr. Griffin became pastor of the Park Street Church, Boston, in 1811. So unpopular was it to be seen in attendance upon an evangelical church that, as Dr. Nehemiah Adams relates, gentlemen of culture and standing who ventured into Dr. Griffin's church Sunday evenings, attracted by the reports of his genius and eloquence, went in partial disguise, sitting in obscure corners, with caps drawn over their faces and wrappers turned inside out." That was in Boston less than eighty years ago! I find that in New York City less than sixty years ago a mob prevented the holding of a meeting planned by Dr. Spring and others for promoting the better observance of the Sabbath. In the year 1800 there were in the United States 3,030 evangelical churches; in 1850, 43,072; in 1870, 70,148; and in 1880, 97,090. A gain of 27,000 in ten years, ending in 1880, and this is what the critics have been pleased to call an effete Protestantism! As gleaned from the "Year-books" and "Church Minutes," the number of communicants in evangelical churches in the United States has been as follows: In 1800, 364,000; in 1850, 3,529,000; in 1870, 6,673,000; and in 1880, 10,065,000. Of course during all this time there was an immense increase in population, but the increase in church membership a good deal more than kept pace with that of population. Taking the whole country through, there was in 1800 one evangelical communicant to every 14½ inhabitants; in 1850, one to every 6½; in 1870, one to every 5¾, and in 1880, one to every 5. Even during the period since 1850, in which materialism and rationalism have been subjecting Protestantism to so severe a strain, while the increase in population has been 116 per cent., the increase in communicants of Protestant evangelical churches in the United States has been 185 per cent.

The same pronounced drift Christianwards evinces itself if we consider the matter of American colleges and college students. Writing in 1810, Bishop Meade, of Virginia, said, "I can truly say that in every educated young man in Virginia whom I met I expected to find a skeptic, if not an avowed infidel." When Dr. Dwight became president of Yale College, in 1745, only five of the students were church members. In the early part of Dr. Appleton's presidency of Bowdoin, only one student was a professing Christian. In 1830, according to returns obtained from American colleges, 26 per cent. of the students were professing Christians; in 1850, 38 per cent.; in 1865, 46 per cent.: in 1880, according to the Year-book of the Young Men's Christian Association, out of 12,063 students in 65 colleges, 6,081 or a little more than half, were professors of religion. An American college is one of the very safest places in which a young man can be put. And it is by such steps as these that the religion of Jesus Christ is undertaking to die out from the respect and affection of our American people! So far from Christianity betraying the first symptons of exhaustion, there has been no time since the Jordan baptism of Jesus when Christianity has moved with such gigantic strides, and put forth efforts so vigorous and hereulean, as during these years of our own century when the disciples of Voltaire and the imitators of Paine have been most agile in their production of obituaries and accumulation of embalming spices.

It is during this time, in fact within the last forty years of it, that there have sprung up all our Young Men's Christian Associations, with organizations extending North and South, East and West, in North America and South, Europe, Asia, the Sandwich Islands, Australia, Madagascar. A strange way it is that Christianity has of dying! Our American Sunday schools, too, are all of them a growth of the present century, numbering only half a million pupils in 1830, with an increase of six millions in the fifty years following. It is during the last eighty years, likewise, that the American church has shown its colossal vigor in the inauguration of its missionary enterprises. Beginning with the second decade of our century with a contribution of $200,000, the total amount raised for home and foreign missions in this country up to 1880 was $129,000,000; and 88 per cent. of that was raised during the last thirty years, the period during which Christianity is supposed to have betrayed accumulating symptoms of debility and senility. 70,000 mission communicants in 1830 had become 210,000 in 1850 and 850,000 in 1880. All of this, to say nothing of other organizations of evangelization and amelioration, the Bible Society, the Tract Society and the rest, which have sprung from the fecund soil of our own magnificent Gospel century.

Such are the facts. Like the Scribes and Pharisees would you see a sign from Jesus? There are the signs. The books are accessible, the facts are verifiable. To him who thinks he knows it all, and is going through life under cover of the impression that the world is tired of Jesus, and that the intelligence of the age has passed the defunct body of our senile faith over into the hands of the undertaker, let it be recommended to review the matter, and to treat it with the candid and studious respect due to a cause that in point of vitality, growth, vigor and productiveness is comparable with none that solicits the attention or engages the interest of mankind.

THE CAPTURE OF NEW ORLEANS.

"What a gathering! The riff-raff of the wharves, the town, the gutters. Such women—such wrecks of women! And all the juvenile rag-tag. The lower steamboat landing, well covered with sugar, rice, and molasses, was being rifled. The men smashed; the women scooped up the smashings. The river was overflowing the top of the levee. A rain storm began to threaten. 'Are the Yankee ships in sight?' I asked of an idler. He pointed out the tops of their naked masts as they showed up across the huge bend of the river. They were engaging the batteries at Camp Chalmette—the old field of Jackson's renown. Presently that was over. Ah, me! I see them now as they come slowly round Slaughterhouse Point into full view, silent, so grim, and terrible; black with men, heavy with deadly portent; the long-banished Stars and Stripes flying against the frowning sky. Oh, for the Mississippi! the Mississippi! Just then here she came down upon them. But how! Drifting helplessly, a mass of flames.

"The crowds on the levee howled and screamed with rage. The swarming decks answered never a word; but one old tar on the Hartford, standing with lanyard in hand beside a great pivot-gun, so plain to view that you could see him smile, silently patted its big black breech and blandly grinned.

"And now the rain came down in sheets. About one or two o'clock in the afternoon (as I remember), I being again in the store with but one door ajar, came a roar of shoutings and imprecations and crowding feet down Common street. 'Hurrah for Jeff Davis! Hurrah for Jeff Davis! Shoot them! Kill them! Hang them!' I locked the door on the outside, and ran to the front of the mob, bawling with the rest, 'Hurrah for Jeff Davis!' About every third man there had a weapon out. Two officers of the United States Navy were walking abreast, unguarded and alone, looking not to right or left, never frowning, never flinching, while the mob screamed in their ears, shook cocked pistols in their faces, cursed and crowded and gnashed upon them. So through the gates of death those two men walked to the City Hall to demand the town's surrender. It was one of the bravest deeds I ever saw done."—Geo. W. Cable in the Century.

In studying the many-sided genius of Victor Hugo, his biographers, the World, (London) thinks, will not forget Hugo the painter. Many of his manuscripts are illustrated with strange drawings, and while living at Guernsey he drew and painted constantly, and made sixty-four compositions for the illustration of his novel, "The Toilers of the Sea," which were engraved by Meaulle. This publication, only a few copies of which were printed, has become a bibliographic rarity. Victor Hugo's drawings and water-colors resemble very closely in style and execution those of Gustave Dore; they are violent, excessive, tumultuous, full of strong contrasts and oppositions; they are a poet's drawings, the whole force of which is derived from the author's poetic sentiment. On the back of the last drawing, "The Toilers of the Sea," the poet has written the following words: "On the face of this cardboard I have sketched my own destiny—a steamboat tossed by the tempest in the midst of a monstrous ocean, almost disabled, assailed by foaming waves and having nothing left but a bit of smoke which people call glory, which the wind sweeps away and which constitutes its strength.—Victor Hugo, Guernsey, 1856."

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

There was something peculiar in their parting. When the red-whiskered gentleman had taken his seat in the car he turned his face for an instant to the window with an uneasy glance after his comrade who, during the pause before the starting of the train, had walked up and down the platform with keen reconoitering looks to the right and left, and now standing somewhat back from the crowd and thus out of the range of observation, with one single rapid motion he brought both arms together from a horizontal position and touched with the index finger of his right hand, the other fingers being doubled inward, the second knuckle joint of the thumb of his left. Stephen, we must confess, was not a very bright Odd-fellow, as, indeed, one cannot well be who has higher objects with which to occupy his mind than the remembering of signs and grips, and though he observed the action it was done so quickly that he failed to recognize it for what it really was—the Sign of Safety in the Degree of Friendship.

Mr. Basset had, in fact, gone off a few days before the situation was discovered, but it was only as far as the house of a lodge brother, where he had been all the time hidden; and now cleverly disguised and within a day's ride of the Canada line we will take our final leave of him. But in justice we must say that even with a fair prospect of successfully eluding the officers of justice who supposed him a thousand miles away, he was a very miserable and unhappy man. Public disgrace, which but a little while before had only loomed up in the farthest background of his mental visions as a dim possibility, was now a real thing—as real as the cold clutch of Death's fingers on a soul unprepared—and what vow of a secret fraternity could stand between him and the inward avenger?

But is not this an unfair representation of Odd-fellowship? inquires the reader. Because a few members defend criminals and uphold liquor selling, must it follow that the whole order is responsible for their individual action? Now this is precisely the point we desire to come to. An order that inserts in its obligation a protection clause, which can be construed any way according to the moral sense of the candidate, certainly lays itself open to grave suspicion, and honest men will be in no haste to clear it from the first charge till it tears down the convenient screen between criminals and the law which it has borrowed from its Masonic mother. In reference to the second charge, one single fact will suffice.

In 1870 a petition was presented to the Grand Lodge of the United States to enact a law allowing State Grand Lodges to prohibit members of subordinates under their respective jurisdictions from engaging in the traffic in intoxicating liquors. The petition was refused, it being decided that "it is contrary to the spirit and policy of our institution to pass any law on the subject referred to, creating a new test of membership in the order." Thus we see that Odd-fellowship presents no more bar to the admission of a rumseller than it does to a Mormon or an infidel. We have conclusive testimony from one of their own standard writers: "No peculiarities of religious belief or practice are requisite to admission in the order, and none disqualify."

In fact the views of the Grand Lodge on the temperance question might even be accepted with very slight changes as a part of the declaration against "sumptuary laws" embodied in their political platform, as we may learn by another quotation from that same standard authority: "Lodges cannot abridge the liberty of the citizen nor dictate to him what he shall eat nor what he shall drink . . . . neither will the laws nor the principles of Odd-fellowship descend to the restriction nor the regulation of the beverage of its members."

It is a coincidence worthy of note that the Masonic Odd-fellow whom Mr. Basset, as related in a prior chapter, had "warned of approaching danger," acting on the familiar proverb that "one good turn deserves another," now played a chief part in aiding and abetting the latter's escape from justice. Attached to the fashionable hotel which he kept was an elegant club room, where assembled every lodge night the convivially inclined among the brethren, who smoked and played cards till the small hours of the morning, and amused each other, while sipping their glasses of wine and punch, with the various neat fictions about "important lodge work" by which they imposed on the credulity of their unsuspecting wives. Nor did this interchange of reciprocal obligations with a professed prohibitionist shock him greatly in view of the fact that he knew more than one in the lodge who talked as stoutly for prohibition as did Mr. Basset, while holding secret business relations all the while with the very traffic whose existence they affected to deplore. Mr. Parker of the Phœnix House might have listened silently to the praise of Odd-fellowship as a temperance order, and even as a matter of prudent policy gravely assented, but he would have certainly indulged himself in a good laugh behind his informant's back at the absurdity of the idea.

Odd-fellowship is Masonry's first born, made in her image, and if anybody wishes a conclusive proof that this is so let him attack Masonry and then note the filial readiness of the average Odd-fellow to spring to her relief.

Stephen Howland felt as every truly upright soul must over the fall of another, intensely sorrowful; and his trust in what the Rev. Theophilus Brassfield had so often styled "a complete system of morality" was sadly shaken. He was in exactly the mood of mind which has lead many a man into downright skepticism of all good. Such an experience must either drive the soul to take a firm foothold on the Rock of Ages, or to launch its little cockle-boat on that wide sea of doubt whose farthest shores are the Cimmerian land of blank atheism where hope is a myth, and faith a dream, and the whole universe a vast hollow Nothing.

The illness of a juror caused a temporary adjournment of the court. Stephen was trying to while away the time over a newspaper when the opposing counsel sauntered up.

He belonged to the Bohemian class of lawyers, and considered no case out of the legitimate line of his practice which involved a big fee, or even one of reasonable size. He considered Stephen's notions of professional honor and probity as decidedly Quixotic, but such men have sometimes a curious liking for their moral opposites; and though frequently pitted against each other, they were much better friends than one could suppose possible after listening to their savage sparring in court hours.

"It was a queer thing now that Basset should do as he did. It come like a thunder-clap, but there is an epidemic just now of defaleations and embezzlements and forgeries. Such things seem to have their regular periods like the seventeen-year locusts."

"It would be refreshing if we could have an epedemic of public honesty," returned Stephen, dryly.

"I think the same, my dear fellow—in the abstract, you know. But for us lawyers—phew!—it would be as bad as an epedemic of health to the doctors. Now you take this liquor trade; it is a confounded bad thing all through, but if it should be swept out of existence to-day I should lose half my practice. I defend rumsellers and you prosecute, but, bless you! they'd better fall into your clutches than mine. I bleed 'em well now, I tell you. I took a five hundred dollar fee from one the other day, and I don't believe he had enough left to start him in the boot-blacking business."

The lawyer stopped to laugh, and Stephen could not help laughing too.

"I have had curious things happen in the course of my legal practice," the former continued, "but nothing queerer than what happened once in this very court-house when I was defending two liquor sellers arrested for violation of the Sunday law. You know the old saying, 'There's no telling how a jury will flop.' If you will believe it, with exactly the same evidence in both cases one was acquitted and the other fined seventy-five dollars. I found out afterwards that the one acquitted belonged to some secret society—the Noble Order of Red Men, I think it was—and his friends managed to get a juror or two who belonged to the fraternity on to the bench. Six were Masons and Odd-fellows. The other rumseller was a poor devil of an Irishman, forbidden any such privilege under ban of his priest."

"It is a privilege that if often used to mock justice will bring in a reign of lynch law sooner or later," said Stephen, indignantly. "I believe in equal rights and fair play even for liquor sellers."

The other shrugged his shoulders.

"This secret order business is overdone. It is our American failing to overdo things. When I was first admitted to the bar I joined the Masons and the Odd-fellows and the Knights of Pythias, thinking that when I was in Rome I had better do as the Romans do. And I can walk in their processions, and wear their fol-de-rols, and have a chief seat a all their feasts and pow-wows generally—if I want to; but as a rule I contrive to find other fish to fry. Really now, between you and me—hark! what's that?"

It was a sound of fife and drum. Stephen, from his boyhood, had a passionate love for martial music, and the inspiring strains seemed for a moment like the wings of some strong archangel lifting him above all his trouble and darkness into a realm of which his only conscious thought was like Peter's on the mount—that it would be good to dwell there.

"A detachment of the Salvation Army, they say," carelessly remarked the other lawyer, after making due inquiry of one of the throng who were bending their steps in the direction of the music. "I'm going to hear 'em."

Stephen followed with a readiness that surprised himself, for he was somewhat of a stickler for regular methods; and, though he did not doubt that the Salvation Army had accomplished good in its peculiar way, he had looked on a conversion under such instrumentality a little as he might on a miraculous cure wrought by some practitioner outside of medical schools—rather as a phenomena than a precedent. But the stirring music, the odd and yet deeply devout appearance of the company, as in fine military order they marched through the street with waving banners, and defiled on to the common where a rude platform had been erected—even the unmannerly interruption of a few rowdies in the crowd, impressed Stephen with a deeper feeling than that of mere novelty. The effect of their warlike songs, their regular-drilled tread, their earnest faces, was something like that produced by the early Methodist movement. It seemed to sharpen and define the lines which an ease-loving pulpit has allowed to grow so dim and misty between the Lord's side and the devil's side. And to Stephen's positive nature it was a relief to feel sure once more that there were two sides, even though he was not equally sure of being himself on the right one.

The preacher announced no text. Stephen noticed that he seemed to be a very well developed specimen of muscular Christianity, and was evidently an illiterate man; but after the first words fell on his ear he felt that he was standing in the presence of one of those rare orators made by grace and not by art or nature, and ceased to feel any repugnance. Not a suspicion, however, crossed his mind that this was Peter Snyder, the converted rumseller, who had joined the Salvationists because they afforded a channel for free and effective Christian labor, which he could never have found in the set lines of old and respectable religious organizations. He had no cultured taste to be shocked by their peculiar methods of work, and they on their part did not mind his literary and theological deficiencies. But there was no loud, ranting talk, only a deep, sweet earnestness, a perfect unconsciousness of himself that produced an effect like the highest pulpit art.

"I want to tell you folks about Jesus Christ," he began. "You think you know about him already. Maybe some of you do, and if that is so, you hain't no kind of business to be standing round here when you ought to be telling other people about him. Or hain't you got nothing to tell? Didn't he hang bleeding on the cross with the nails in his feet and hands and the spear thrust through his side for you? I want to know.

"But as I said when I begun, it's t'other kind I'm a goin' to talk to. The Lord is coming with all his armies and riding on his swift chariots of salvation, and you resist him jest as I did, a heapin' up sin against sin to be fuel in that day which shall burn as an oven. But I ain't a goin' to talk to you about my sins, for the Lord has cast 'em all behind his back; and I ain't a goin' to talk to you about your sins. Maybe I shall come to 'em by and by. People like to tell what they know about. Now I know about the Lord Jesus for I have seen him!"

The speaker made a pause. A startled hush fell on the crowd. Stephen at first thought the man crazy, and was half inclined to walk off, but curiosity impelled him to stay.

Said Joseph Cook: "I am threatened privately with a pauper's funeral for certain things I say publicly. Let me have the funeral of a pauper rather than not have that of an honest man." In his prelude months ago upon the new Congregational creed Mr. Cook said: "I am likely to be very severely attacked for what I am saying this morning, and perhaps may lose much by my temerity. But I am attached to sound views. I am profoundly in love with evangelical truth, and do not like to see the veins of America filled with milk and water."

It is said that John Wesley was once walking with a brother, who related to him his troubles, saying he did not know what he should do. They were at that moment passing a stone fence to a meadow, over which a cow was looking. "Do you know," asked Wesley, "why the cow looks over that wall?" "No," replied the one in trouble. "I will tell you," said Wesley; "because she cannot look through it. And that is what you must do with your troubles—look over and above them."

REFORM NEWS.

IOWA MEETING.

The time set for the annual meeting is August 25–27. The place is not determined but is left to the Executive Committee. Friends, where shall it be held? Any persons having a desire for the meeting to be in their midst, or having suggestions to make, will address the president, Rev. Geo. Warrington, Birmingham, Iowa, or the undersigned. Let us hear from you. A. W. Hall, Sec'y.
College Springs, Iowa.

—It is suggested that the Illinois State Convention be held August 27th and 28th, by one of the Executive Committee. Will that do? Where shall we meet? What say you friends in Galva? in Rockford? in Morrison? in Wheaton? Where and when? Write.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

THE OHIO STATE MEETING.

CEDARVILLE, Ohio, July 8, 1885.

Last evening's session closed a convention successful in the purpose for which it was called. It was designed as a point of outset for old-time work contemplated by the friends in the "Buckeye State." Captain J. M. Soott's presence was itself an inspiration and his appearance in the chair a signal for work. Secretary S. A. George reviewed the past in a very able paper, giving the "spine" of the work done at seven State gatherings since the organization, and suggesting wisely for the future. Bro. Wright, pastor of the Second U. P. church of Xenia, gave the speech of this session with very happy effect.

The forenoon of Wednesday was devoted to business which will be officially reported by the secretary; the afternoon to resolutions and an address by Dr. J. G. Carson, of Xenia. The attendance for harvest time and the heat of summer was highly commendable, but those who made a sacrifice were amply repaid by the eloquent and impressive speech of the Dr., who has not abated one jot of his former vigor in opposing the "Mystery of iniquity."

Bro. Travis was greeted by a good audience in the evening and his address of an hour or more, was like the man, sound, sensible, and transparent, and so ingeniously put together as to defy any attempt by adverse critics to pick flaws or unravel the web of argument woven with the artlessness of a child and the skill of a master workman.

DAYTON, July 9.—Arrangements were made at Cedarville for a convention at Columbus, in December next. Among other distinguished citizens, Dr. L. Davis was chosen to speak on that occasion. A desire to meet the Dr., and if possible obtain his assent to the request of his brethren was one of the inducements that brought me to this city. I am glad I came. It is refreshing to tarry for a little season with a man who unites goodness of heart with greatness of soul, and whose conversation is seasoned with piety, culture and unswerving integrity to intelligent and prayerfully considered convictions. The Dr. has a happy faculty of always returning "a hundred fold" for every effort I have made to meet him face to face, and I never part from him without more exalted admiration of the dignity of true, artless, unselfish manhood. "Fiery trials have overtaken" the United Brethren household of faith in "these times," and the Dr., who was present when the "Old Constitution" was formed and covenant adopted, and who has for more than half a century labored assiduously to maintain the testimony of the church of his choice, naturally feels sensitive when told that the time has come when he should "sit down with the young men and help form a constitution worthy the church of to-day and of the ages to come." Possibly the Dr. may yet discern the hand of God in what is now a mystery, and find that the Shepherd is weaning the sheep and lambs of his flock from undue attachment to the "fold," that he may be their "all and in all," amidst the stormy seas that girdle the shores of that "City which hath foundations."

Beside the household of this brother beloved, I am under obligations to Bishop Wright, Bros. Dillon, French, Shuey, and Drury for words of cheer and hearty God-speed in my work. The absence of Bro. Hott deprived me of the anticipated pleasure of an interview with the senior editor of the Telescope, but his assistant and the publisher each assured me of co-operation and space for notices in preparing for the Columbus convention.

MANSFIELD, July 10.—A pleasant surprise was that of meeting Bro. George at 10 o'clock last evening on the train, who, though weary with the work of the convention, was hopeful and cheerful as ever. We reached this city about 10 o'clock A. M., and it was with regret that I felt it duty to myself and the cause, to decline his cordial invitation to spend the remaining morning hours at his pleasant home, a mile or more distant. I needed rest and refreshment and turned in at the nearest hotel. I was very soon putting in time in blissful ignorance of earth and all its conflicts out side the domain of "dream land," prepartory to an "early start." Suddenly a change came over "the spirit of my dreams," and from oblivious forgetfulness I became quickly conscious of the proximity to a wild commotion. The cries of excited men and rapid succession of reports from pistols and the tramping of a crowd just outside the hotel, suggested the presence of a mob. I was too weary to watch and too stupid to fear and so after a few moments I committed myself to God and fell asleep. I have made inquiries this morning of the night clerk and others about the hotel and depot and have been informed, without any apparent interest in the matter, that they were chasing off tramps. The Mansfield Daily Herald makes no mention of the occurrence in its morning issue, and from the silence of the press and the indifference with which the matter is treated at the Tremont House and the depot I infer that a rushing crowd and a dozen or more pistol shots at the dead of night, is an incident so common about these parts that it is not thought worthy of notice.

ONTARIO.—I have been enjoying the fellowship of Elder John Finney for a few hours and have at high twelve just partaken of the generous hospitality of his ample store of creature comforts. He has gone to see some of his associates in reform and church work to arrange for me to speak before leaving this old battle ground. Seeming reverses have come to this household since I came first to share their helpful and kindly offices, but they have still ample means for all the necessities of life. Bro. Finney, with a true devotion and living faith, says: "It is all right, I have no doubt; but I can't understand it." His chief regret seems to be that he has not more to give in aid of the cause of Christ in reform and church work.

LATER.—Elder Finney has returned, having made arrangements for me to fill the U. P. pulpit in this place Sabbath morning and evening. I will now go on to Galion and see Father Anten and others there, and return to-morrow if the good Lord so will.

J. P. STODDARD.

—Bro. A. H. Springstein writes that the three months for which he was engaged by the Michigan brethren as lecturer have expired, and he understands the contract to cease. He has done little by way of direct work against the lodge, but has been busy in the Lord's work in other ways during all the time. He lectured twice at South Lyons. The calls for regular Gospel work are more than he can fill, and his soul is alive to them. We yet hope the Michigan brethren will rally and meet the proposition of the N. C. A. Board to sustain well a worker in their State the year round.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LODGE IN COURTS.

AURORA, Ill.

DEAR SIR:—I want to read the Cynosure as long as I am able to do so. I am 79 years of age; have done what I could to oppose slavery, Masonry and intemperance. Have lived to see slavery, one of the greatest evils in our land,, abolished, but at what a sacrifice of life and money! When the women are allowed to vote then we can hope for prohibition.

If we could disfranchise members of secret organizations; make them ineligible to office as they have the Mormons, and leave it for those outside of secret organizations to make and execute our laws, we might have some show of justice. But rings are formed by members of secret organizations that rob and plunder our government with impunity. They make our laws and are elected to execute them, but but fail in their execution. Our so-called courts of justice are only a mockery and a disgrace to humanity.

In our city court a woman is on trial for keeping a disorderly house. Mr. W. on the stand is asked by the city attorney if he ever visited the house of the woman on trial, and if so, who he saw there? He says, "I saw you there."

"Well, who else?"

"I saw" (looking up at the judge upon the bench) Judge P——," but before he could pronounce the name the gavel came down with the command, "stop, sir! I'll maintain the dignity of this court." The judge fines his paramour and sends her to the county jail for ninety days.

I was attending court at a fall term some years since at Geneva. Judge Wilson, who they have at the late election elected a member of the appellate court, and who at the time of election was a member of the supreme court, at the fall term I refer to, was our circuit judge. A mere youth without parents was tried and convicted for the crime of stealing a horse that he saw running loose upon the prairie. The judge fines the boy and sends him to the county jail till spring, when it will be warm weather, he says, and very feelingly advises him then to go out and get work and try and earn an honest living. The boy was guilty of stealing the horse; while the judge was under indictment for defrauding the U. S. Government during the civil war, while acting as colonel of a regiment. But no trial or punishment for him and his two guilty parties, one of them master in chancery of his court, one an ex-sheriff. The U. S. attorney enters a nolle pros. in all three cases, and all go free. While J. G. Stolp, owner of the woolen mills, at Aurora, is fined $8,500 for making false returns to our U. S. collectors; and our most extensive marble dealer in grave stones and monuments fined $1,000 and both made to pay their fines. Neither of them were Masons.

You no doubt are familiar with these and similar cases. I have lived in Aurora since 1850 and witnessed the crimes of our courts. At our first city election under our city charter we elected A. C. Gibson, formerly an old Whig and Anti-mason and anti-slavery in politics, for many years a member of the Troy bar, New York, and a strong temperance man, as a judge of our city court. The term of office is four years. After serving two years impartially, the Masons and whisky men got a bill passed by our legislature (that was largely composed of Masons, as it always is) making any man ineligible to the office of judge over 64 years of age. This is the only way they they could dispose of him, as they could not impeach him. But fearing this act might unseat some other judge, they made it a special act for the city of Aurora only. The late O. B. Knickerbocker was the prime mover in procuring the passage of this act, and Judge Gibson informed him it was illegal; that all laws under our Constitution must be of a general character. But he had no money or time to spend in litigation, and to save both would resign, which he did, and the Governor ordered a special election to fill the vacancy. No formal nominations were made, but the Aurora Beacon announces the name of B. F. Parks as a candidate for judge, probably at the time the most debauched and dissipated member of the bar in Aurora. But he was a Mason, and they all went in for him and he was elected. This Judge Parks has lately been at the Washingtonian Home in Chicago, to be treated for drunkenness; but is now out giving temperance lectures. He was a standing candidate of the Beacon and run in opposition to Judge Cody for circuit judge in 1874, getting over 400 majority in Aurora, where lodges and Masons were thick, all going for him; but he was defeated by the vote of country towns.

He is now giving temperance lectures and talking reform. But he has told this story too often to be believed. But this is the class of men with which the most of our offices are filled to-day. Stoop at nothing—put themselves forward, and the whole fraternity are bound to vote for them. Judge Wilson is one of the most popular men among the Masons they have. The late O. B. Knickerbocker of the Aurora Beacon, a high Mason, was one of the most earnest supporters of Judge Wilson at all times —while nothing too bad could be said of Sherwin, our ex-Congressman; but no word as to crime of Wilson. A. FULLER.

THE LUTHERAN CHURCH AMONG THE SWEDES IN AMERICA.

WAHOO, Neb., July 6, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—In his letter from Rockford, Rev. J. P. Stoddard refers to our Synod and its meeting in very encouraging and friendly terms. This is indeed a good omen for us, as it hitherto, in general, has been the practice of American papers edited by non-Lutherans to speak disparagingly of everything that is Lutheran. Especially have we found the Baptist and Methodist denominations very bitter against us, saying all manner of evil and nothing good. This will explain to you, and I think also to your readers, why the Finnish brother, Rev. Hoikka of Oregon, speaks as he does.

In the history of the Evangelical Lutheran church among the Swedes in America there are many wonderful chapters relating the unmanly, not to say unchristian treatment the Lutheran ministers received at the hands of American denominations, especially in the beginning of our work. Never before, so far as I have been able to find out, has the odious work of proselyting been so ruthlessly carried on as on the arrival of the Swedish emigrants on American soil.

Yet we have been signally blessed in the work of gathering great hosts of the emigrants around the Word of God. The meeting at Rockford was the twenty-sixth annual meeting, closing the first quarter century of its work as an organized body. During that time the number of congregations has increased from 36 to over 400, with about 100,000 members. The ministers number nearly 200. The church has schools for higher education, where last year over 500 students were enrolled and about 30 professors engaged. Then there are five orphanages with from 16 to 60 orphans in each, cared for and under Christian training; and two hospitals, one at Chicago, the other between St. Paul and Minneapolis. The money raised during the twenty-five years for missionary, school, church and beneficiary purposes exceeds five million dollars: and this all from a people that came as poor emigrants, having, like myself, many of them, borrowed the money to come over on.

These results have of late began to show those who so earnestly opposed us in the beginning, thinking, no doubt, that they did God's service—that the Lutheran church among the Swedes also ought to be tolerated. So now they are at peace with us. And what the Lutheran church has done for the Swedes in America amounts to more than twice as much as that of all the other Christian denominations together. The reason why this proselyting work has been so odious in our eyes, is that they never seemed to care the least for the unconverted, the prodigal and fallen; but always tried to lead away those who had found peace with God and salvation through him.

At Rockford we adopted a series of resolutions that I will forward to the Cynosure when I get a copy. They were a timely step in the right direction, denouncing "oyster suppers and church fairs, etc.," as unsuitable means for raising church funds. Resolutions regarding our position on secrecy will, I think, be forwarded by the right party. Your paper has frequently been mentioned in our official organ, the Augustana, and I think is fast gaining friends among our people.

The readers of the Cynosure are one with us on the question of secrecy, therefore it may be excused if occasionally a letter is sent in whereby our position and work is in some measure introduced to our American Christian brethren. Mutual acquaintance engenders friendship, and friendship unity.

BRO. E. MATHEWS IN TROUBLE.

Detroit, Mich., July 7, 1885.

Dear Bro. K.—The occasion of this hurried note is to inform my many friends who are readers of the Cynosure, and so posted as to Masonic rage that they know that my notoriety (in the newspapers) grows out of the naughtiness of the members of secret societies. The first offender is an Abiffite wearing his Masonic pin at the time, but who had evidently forgotten the uses of the gavel. He was in liquor at the time of assailing Rev. R. Clark, but being well known by me and many others who witnessed in full the shameful, cowardly assault. This Mason, knowing that I had publicly notified the people of my determination to bring him to justice, took the time by the forelock and early Monday, July 6th, swore out a warrant before Justice Purington of Coldwater, Branch county, Mich., charging Bro. Clark—the very man who was choked and bruised by him and not less than three other roughs—with "assault and battery." The officers took Bro. Clark from the work of repairing our tents, and he was brought to where his wife and many others were, about a half mile west of camp ground. The wife and others, much frightened, called me from the house where I had been for nearly an hour, ignorant of what was being done, to prevent them from taking him away unless we knew they had a right. On approaching the buggy I saw Bro. Clark surrounded by three men, and asked him, "Have you seen their authority for the arrest?" To which he said, "No." I told him it was his privilege and asked for the warrant. To this demand these men replied roughly, and one who afterwards proved to be the sheriff of the county (for we didn't know him at the time) took handcuffs from his pocket and tried to snap them on Bro. Clark, which I forbid until he produced his authority. He struck me a murderous blow on my skull, inflicting quite a wound, from which I bled freely. In the struggle I took his cuffs from him, and he produced a pistol and threatened my life. I said, "Shoot it is! But you can't take this man without reading your warrant or producing proper authority."

In the struggle I took him by the beard and completely humbled him and he consented to read the papers, after which, in my rags and bleeding freely, I went as his prisoner with Bro. Clark to Coldwater. The complaint he lodged under oath is—criminal assault. I am out on bail. Our preliminary hearing comes off on Thursday, July 9th, this week, in Justice Purington s office, Coldwater, Mich.

I ask your prayers and support. If I am convicted the fine is not more than $500.00, or more than two years in the State prison; or not more than one year in the county jail. E. Mathews.

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. God chooses extraordinary messengers for extraordinary occasions. v. 1. f. c. Several facts regarding Elijah strongly favor the supposition that he was not a native Israelite. It is implied in the expression, "who was of the inhabitants of Gilead," as there were many foreigners, Ishmaelites, resident in that region; while the personal appearance of the prophet himself, his fleetness of foot, his power of endurance, his rude dress, and hairy, sinewy frame, comport exactly with the picture of a desert Bedouin of the present day. If this conjecture is correct, apostate Israel had indeed fallen low when the descendant of "the son of the bondwoman" must be chosen to shame back to a sense of their guilt the children of Isaac and heirs of the promise! God is never at a loss for messengers. Even out of the stones he can raise up children unto Abraham who will bear faithful testimony to his truth. Times of extraordinary degeneracy need extraordinary religious instrumentalities. The preaching of the early Methodists at a time when English society was one slough of corruption is a case in point. The Salvation Army of our day, however we may object to its methods of work, has a mission as undoubted. The great body of the church needs to be roused from its apathy and indifference; the masses must be reached. Any agency which will do this is, or should be, above carping criticism; for when God chooses his instruments for any important work it is not our human tastes which he consults but the needs of the hour.

2. The power of prayer—Faith the true miracle-worker. v. 1. l. c. We notice in this abrupt and startling message three points in which lies the whole secret of prevailing prayer. (1) Implicit faith in a living God. (2) Conscious integrity. (3) Unquestioning belief in prayer as God's chosen instrumentality. James, who selects Elijah out of Old Testament history as the most marvelous instance of the power of prayer, yet tells us that he was a man subject to like passions with ourselves. He was not less human than other men but perhaps a little more so, as evidenced by the severe training to which God would not have subjected him if those passions had not needed to be disciplined.

3. God's school for his noblest workers is the school of hardship and trial. vs. 2–16. Ministers who are afraid to speak out against sin in their churches lest they lose their pulpits, should contemplate Elijah hidden by the brook Cherith and divinely fed by ravens. There is one subject more than any other which the ministry dare not touch—the sin of secretism. They dread Masonry's hidden power, and well they may; but they forget that servants of a sovereign who can spread a table for them in the desert have no necessity to court the world. We need Elijahs in the pulpit—men who will put God's truth before everything else and let bread and butter considerations go. The strongest faith may need further discipline. It was probably harder to Elijah to be sent to a Sidonian widow—a countrywoman of Jezebel's—for sustenance than to be fed by unclean ravens. Yet he rises and goes, to find what he might not have found in Israel, a faith answering to his own. Two years more in God's training-school, fed from the widow's frugal but miraculously-provided table and Elijah is strong enough to meet Ahab, strong enough for that supreme test on Carmel.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

What have been some of God's ways of training his messengers? Acts 7: 29, 30; 1 Sam. 8: 1; 16: 11; Amos 7: 15; Luke 1: 80; 2: 51. Is the man who lets everything go for the truth's sake sure of his daily bread? Isa. 33: 16.

"Of the inhabitants of Gilead." Gilead was the wild hill-country east of the Jordan, between Bashan on the north and Moab on the south. It was a wild, mountainous region on the borders of the desert. Its inhabitants were always a wild, vigorous, fierce, and lawless race, more barbarous than civilized, more Bedouin than Israelitish. Such are the people of this district to this day. Elijah was a fair type of these people. In his savage dress (2 Kings 1: 8), in his fleetness and strength (1 Kings 18: 46), in his power of endurance (1 Kings 19: 8), in his rapidity of movement (1 Kings 18: 12), and in his fondness for wild and especially mountainous regions (1 Kings 18: 19; 19: 8).—Todd. All his acts show him like a fire consuming the ungodly; an embodiment of the avenging justice of Jehovah in an evil day. Glowing zeal, dauntlessness of soul and unbending severity are his leading traits, though he showed the gentlest sympathy in the relations of private life. Elijah came to open the path for the kingdom of God, and bring about a state of things in which its gentle message of love could be proclaimed amongst men.—Geikie. The times were fit for Elijah and Elijah for the times. The greatest prophet is reserved for the worst age. Israel had never such an impious king as Ahab, nor such a miraculous prophet as Elijah.—Bishop Hall.

"There shall not be dew nor rain." Drought was one of the punishments threatened by the law if Israel forsook Jehovah and turned after other gods. (Deut. 11: 17; 28: 23; Lev. 26: 18, etc.)—Cook The fertility of Palestine is entirely dependent upon the regularity and copiousness of the rains, and during the long intervals between them upon the heavy dews. Hence both dew and rain are frequently employed in the Scriptures as emblems of blessing. (Deut. 33: 28; Ps. 72: 6); and the cessation of them is treated as a great misfortune. (2 Sam. 1: 21; Isaiah 5: 6)—Todd.

"These years." An indefinite period. The drought lasted three and a half years (Luke 4: 25; Jas. 5: 17).—P.

"But according to my word" Not at his own caprice, but as directed by the Lord. And his word would depend upon the penitence, etc., of the people. It was because of the obduracy of king and people that it lasted so long.—Pulpit Com.

"And it came to pass after a while. Hebrew, at the end of days. An indefinite term which furnishes no idea of the exact time. All we can be sure of is that he must have been more than two years, out of the three and a half, at Zarephath.—Pulpit Com. How Elijah's faith must have been tried as the waters slowly dried up, leaving him without resource. It is such slow processes that try faith most of all. Many possess the faith for a sudden great and heroic deed, for one who can maintain his faith unshaken in the midst of such slow trials as this. This trial the faith of Elijah stood. Yet it may be that now and then, in his solitary musings upon the ways of God, the thought might have occurred to him that this one stream might have been spared for his sake. But there was faith even in such a doubt. Such an exemption of this stream would, however, have brought crowds of people thither for water and thus his retreat would have been discovered. God does not always exempt those whom he loves from their share in such visitations as these. "It is," says Bishop Hall, "no unusual thing with God to suffer his own dear children to be enwrapped in the common calamities of offenders. He makes a difference in the use and issue of their stripes, not in the infliction. The corn is cut down with the weeds, but to a better purpose."—Kitto.

"Arise, get thee to Zarephath." It lies still, as no doubt it did then, on the high road between Tyre and Sidon, and on the shore. The prophet would thus be in the lion's den, in the very heart of the dominions of Ethbaal.—Pulpit Com. It was beyond the limits of the kingdom of Israel; and therefore the prophet was here comparatively safe from the vengeance of Ahab.—Todd.

"And when he came . . . behold the widow woman was there." The widow showed by the oath, "as Jehovah thy God liveth," that she was a worshiper of the true God—Spence. Never would Elijah have made the demand, and still less would she have paid any attention to it, had she been a heathen and worshiper of idols. Baehr. She had seen better days, for her house had an "aliyeh," or roof chamber built over it—the room specially appropriated for guests, as the best furnished in the house, and usually dedicated, in a well-ordered family, to meditation and prayer.—Geikie.

"As the Lord thy God liveth." Showing her recognition of him as an Israelite and a man of God, and therefore having peculiar claims upon her; and also her own religious tendencies.

"I have not a cake." Rather 'loaf," the smallest kind of bread. Bread was baked in small round and flat loaves, about a span in diameter, and a finger's breadth in thickness, shaped not unlike flat stones (Matt. 4: 3; 7: 9); and three of them were allowed for each person for a meal (Luke 11: 5).—Todd.

—Dr. Cullis' Faith Convention at Intervale Park, N. H., will be held July 22–30. No better meeting is likely to be held in New England this summer. It will be truely a gathering of the Lord's people.

—At the installation of Rev. Mr. Dutton over the Congregational church at Great Falls, N. H., June 11, in his charge Rev. Mr. Lewis advised the new pastor to attend to his work as a minister of the Gospel and to have nothing to do with outside organizations, as Freemasons and Good Templars.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chiuamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

THE CHURCHES VS. LODGERY.

The following denominations are committed by vote of their legislative assemblies or by constitution to a separation from secret lodge worship:

Adventists (Seventh-day.)

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JULY 16, 1885.

"THE UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST," of Chambersburg, Pa., announces the merging of that paper and Bishop Wright's Richmond Star in a new paper, the Christian Conservator, which is to start at Dayton. We cannot but think this change is an augury of good for the cause of Christ against the secret poison attacking the body of Christ on earth. It is announced by rumor that Rev. Halleck Floyd is to edit the new paper, and he has made a fair record hitherto. It will be impossible to retain the subscribers to the Star and the Chambersburg paper if there is the least faltering or swerving from the doctrine of death to the lodge; and moving the paper to Dayton is very significant. The new paper and the old Telescope cannot stand side by side in Dayton without being enemies or friends. If they are enemies it will be fatal to the Brethren church. If they are friends it will be fatal to the lodge. Let us hope for the last and pray for it. Indeed, the situation of the U. B. church looks hopeful, though the law adopted at Fostoria is decidedly weak and shakey. But if the Brethren leaders have made up their minds that the lodge must and shall go, we can afford to be patient.

THE LUTHERAN SWEDES.

The Elgin, Ill., Advocate gives the following sharp retort on Congregational Pharisaism and folly, by the Augustana Swedes:—

"At their Synod, in Roekford, on Monday, the Swedes in a set of resolutions, unanimously passed, severely seored the Congregational denomination. In May, at the State conventiou, [Congregational] a resolution is said to have been passed purporting to show the necessity of a purer standard of Christian eharaeter among the Swedes, and a larger liberty to stand forth as distinet organiztions. This was endorsed by a eouncil of Congregationalists at New Britain, Conn., in June. The Synod 'sincerely regretted to learn that the Congregational chureh of Ameriea is, and proves itself to be, so ignorant in regard to the status of Christianity among the Swedes, and it protests against sueh false statements, and eondemns as unehristian all proselyting, partieularly when based on falsehood and deeeption.'"

As the Cynosure understands the case the Swedish Synod is right, and its somewhat biting strictures just. State-church Lutheranism and American Lutheranism are two very distinct and different things. The one has civil power and patronage; the other has neither. And, besides, of all the State churches, the Scandinavian Lutherans are least corrupted by alliance with the State. The high mountains and hard soil of Sweden and Norway, poverty, good air and water, and hard work have protected the Northmen from the sins of Sodom: aristocratie plethory, "pride and fulness of bread." The Lutheran Swedes are now about where the English people were before London had control of the world's commerce, and had turned English peasants into factory hands, and made the "stout English yeoman" a thing of the past. Even down to Cromwell's day, earls, dukes, and lords were many of them Puritans, and the Long Parliament discussed and adopted a "Catechism" and "Confession of Faith." The two and a half millions of Swedes and Norwegians who emigrated to this country were the cream off the Scandinavian pan. The Mormon priests are now bringing over the bottom of that pan, the pauper class who had too little energy and enterprise to migrate without Mormon leaders, and whose old religious tinder is lit by Mormon lucifer matches.

The Augustana Synod at Rockford, Ill., were 170 ministers and nearly as many delegates representing one hundred thousand church members, and outside population beside. This body of Christians are sounder in theology, purer in morals, and far more thorough in discipline than the Congregationalists who coolly speak of "evangelizing" them. One may spend a whole day and night at Augustana College, Rock Island, Ill., among some hundred of Swedes without the sight or smell of tobacco smoke; and four of the professors said to the writer, "If one of our young men should be known to enter a liquor saloon, he would be promptly disciplined." The drinking customs of students in Yale College defy discipline, or there is little or no discipline to defy.

As to sound theological or doctrinal teaching the Swedes are decidedly superior to the Congregationalists. As illustration and proof, take the manual of the Hessel Valley church, Sugar Grove, Warren county, Pennsylvania, which says: "This congregation accepts the unaltered Augsburgh Confession." (consisting of Melancthon's twenty-one articles received by all the Protestent reformers).

"The pastor must be a true and sincere Christian, and lead a godly and edifying life."

"When members forsake or openly resist the faith, or degenerate into a sinful life, as drunkenness, licentiousness, profanity, slanderings, profanity of the Lord's day, or anything which may cause offence, the church council shall exercise discipline." Matt. 18: 15–18.

"No person may be received member of this congregaiton who is guilty of a vicious life, or is a member of the Freemasons or any other infidel society." (p. 10).

It is the duty of members—"To read and search diligently the Word of God, to sanctify the Sabbath, to constantly attend the public services, * * * to exercise private, family, and mutual devotion and prayer," etc., etc. (p. 11).

Prayer meetings are kept up in Augustana College and Theological Seminary. No young man is admitted to the Seminary to study for the ministry without relating his experience of a living, personal faith in Christ.

In Rockford, where this Synod met, the Congregational chruches are crawling with Freemasons. Knights Templar, who drink the cup of devils from a human skull, and the mass of whom belong to no Christian church, are admitted to the Congregational churches, in full uniform, to practice their sham worships on the Sabbath! And yet these churches talk of "evangelizing" our Swedish Lutheran population! Let us get the beams out of our own eyes that we may see motes in theirs.

ALL HANDS ON DECK.

The Great Captian gives the order, the Board of the National Association reports it. After deliberating a great part of two meetings, the general plan of lecture work which should cover nearly the entire country east of the mountains was arranged as published last week. The Directors have heard the word, as did Joshua—Command the people that they go forward; and the earnest enthusiasm of those men meeting in Carpenter Hall must be felt to every extremity of the land where our reform has penetrated. "This Board means business," said the devoted brother elected secretary of the directors. At the meeting, June 29th, the feeling seemed to be unanimous that if the Lord had any work for the N. C. A. this year it was on this line. "That is our business if we have any," said one; "I move we meet to-morrow and put it through." Adjourning for a week the plan was digested and put in shape. The leading idea was, not that one man, or set of men should do all the work, but that there should be a grand movement all along the line, a determined shouldering of responsibility by every man, woman or child who has a heart in this reform. So through the State Associations and other auxiliaries, let there be Lecturers and Agents in the field from New England to the Kansas and Nebraska border, some to work in State lines, some in convenient localities to step across such boundaries. This will give in New England, New York with western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota and Kansas and Nebraska, ten workers: then a God-given man for the South, and one to take the region around about Washington from New Jersey to Virginia, two more—twelve men chosen of God for this work and backed by the prayers and support of thousands will give us a report next year that will call for a week's thanksgiving.

There are several facts in the detail which were considered by the Board:

1. The Men.
2. Their Preparation.
3. Their Fields.
4. Their Support.

There is a list of names published weekly in the Cynosure. Some of these may be ready for the work; but probably not enough. Brethren, we must pray, PRAY, PRAY that the Lord will send forth laborers into this harvest.

For their instruction in the best methods of work all agreed that a training school for two weeks would be the thing, and as the expense for board would be met by friends at Wheaton, the Board voted to hold it there within six weeks. Let every man who feels called of God to this work write immediately to Bro. Stoddard and be ready.

To set in order the fields of labor, State meetings should be held as soon as possible, so that not a day of the favorable season for lectures may be lost. If a State meeting cannot be held the Executive Committee or officers of the State Association must assume responsibility. Ohio has just had her meeting, Iowa is rousing and so is Illinois, though the latter is maintaining her agent already. Let the State officers open correspondence with the N. C. A. secretary and get the ball in motion. Don't wait for him to begin.

Then the funds! Where shall they come from? Not from anywhere if we all sit still and wait for them to fly in at the window. But if we take up the work with a new consecration to the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord, whom the lodge casts out, He whose are the gold and silver will supply the funds. We need to have a chance to exercise more faith in our ever-living and blessed God in this matter. And the men who pray for this reform will not be behind in the paying when they see some spirit and energy in their leaders. They can be relied on. When Bro. Hinman went South he was supported for the first year by such contributors.

Several of the States, as Illinois and Wisconsin, at present will be self-supporting. Others will do nobly, as Minnesota where some $300 have already been raised, but further aid will be needed. The Board have faith to believe that they will be able, through God, to supply this need. Some may say the Board has already a large fund, why cannot they bear all the expense? The Board has not a large fund, that can be so used. It has none but trust funds, and all will remember the agreement made by Mr. Carpenter when he donated the N. C. A. building, that $30,000 should be raised. He did not, to be sure, stipulate that so much should be a permanent fund, but it was the understanding that a large proportion should be so, and every Board since has endeavored to keep good faith. But aside from this fund every penny the Board can use will be made to do good service for God this year.

The Illinois plan, which is recommended for State funds, is simply to get from every friend of the reform in the State a subscription, yearly or monthly, or a pledge for the same. Subscription blanks and pledge blanks can be cheaply printed. They can be mailed from the Cynosure office to all subscribers in any State. Other papers will probably help in the same way. This work should be begun without a day's delay. Presidents, secretaries, treasurers, you were chosen to do something. Consult together if you can, but at least write to General Secretary Stoddard, and make a beginning.

And above all, pray continually that God may help us in his cause. Pray for the Board, for the officers of the N. C. A. and the State Associations, for the editors, for the lecturers—and so, helping together with the Lord, we shall certainly have occasion to rejoice together with great joy in the end.

LETTER TO JUDGE CRAIG.

To Hon. A. M. Craig, Judge of the Supreme Court of Illinois:

I have read with pleasure and with pride your late speech at the laying of the corner-stone of the court house in Knox county, Galesburg, Illinois. The speech itself, adroit and appropriate to the occasion, had the last paragraph been omitted, was one to be proud of. It evinced research, public spirit, and an enlightened care for the masses well becoming a patriot citizen and judge. The only objectionable paragraph is the last which is this:

"And now that the corner-stone has been laid in due form by an ancient organization, where every action is governed by the square, let us indulge in the fond hope that the courts called upon to preside herein may see that the scales of Justice are always balanced with honesty, integrity, and wisdom, and that the laws of the land tempered in justice may be administered to all alike."

And remembering, as I do well remember, when you were a student at Knox College and I was its president, your frankness and fairness of character, I am willing to hope that even this paragraph, the only one in which you allude to the lodge, is intended to counteract the known and sworn partiality of Masonic courts and jurors to members of the craft. If this is in reality your meaning, when you "indulge the fond hope" that, in Knox county court house, "the laws may be administered to all alike," then even this your Masonic paragraph like Shakespeare's

"toad, ugly and venomous, Wears yet a precious jewel in its head."

Still you must permit me to regret that any former student of mine could utter such a paragraph; could call Freemasonry "an ancient organization where every action is governed by the square." I must discredit your intelligence, not to suppose you to know that sentiment to be simply and superlatively untrue. And I can only account for your uttering so false a sentiment, by your surroundings.

The Republican editor estimates that a thousand Masons, four hundred being "Sir Knights," had come from forty-three counties to help Knox county lay a corner-stone. The ladies, (heaven save the mark!) the LADIES of the Baptist church, who once before dined twenty-one lodges, met in convention to drive away the good and learned Dr. Edward Beecher from his Galesburg pulpit, because of his faithful and fearless report of the State Congrega tional Association,—the ladies of the Baptist church once the most Anti-masonic of all the Christian denominations; when the sainted Bernard and Colver and Stearns, and a host of like great and good men were its leaders,—these BAPTIST ladies had prepared a sumptuous banquet, and, as a church, welcomed and feasted the lodge, which baptizes infants by sprinkling, and swears husbands to life-long concealment from their wives and children. The Congregational church near by where you stood, had, for years, supported a Freemason as its pastor, and the College, on a portion of whose original campus you were speaking, sustains a president, gazetted by the Masonic saint Lanphere, as a proud ornament of the order. To suppose, amid such Masonic surroundings you could escape bowing slightly, in the temple of this modern Rimmon, would be perhaps to attribute to you more and higher than human virtue.

Yet, my dear sir, you should not have done it. You know that the city where you spoke owes its foundations, and the College its existence to the prayers, money and self-denial of Anti-masonic Christians; that the patriarch Sylvanus Ferris, whose business judgment saved the infant College from bankruptcy, was familiar with the Morgan trials, where the Masonic oath defeated the oath of God and the judiciary of the State of New York. You knew that special justice, Wm. L. Marcy, judge, governor, United States cabinet secretary, and the distinguished ornament of the Silas Wright Democracy, when he saw Masonic church members and church officers, who were good men, commit perjury without stint, obedient to their Masonic oaths,—you know that Judge Marcy exclaimed from the bench, "IF MEN WILL DEFY HEAVEN AND EARTH WHAT CAN HUMAN COURTS DO? No wonder, surrounded as you were by that same lodge which defeated Judge Marcy and shielded murder most foul and horrible, by the blinding force of its oaths in good men; no wonder that you should gasp out the feeble, "fond hope" that "Courts" in that court house may "balance the scales of justice with honesty and integrity." But you well know, honorable sir, that you were "hoping against hope," to hope that the lodge, whose known and avowed principle is partiality to Masons and proscription to outsiders, will administer justice "to all alike." To hope that Masons will do as they are sworn by cut-throat oaths not to do, is to profess your belief that Masonry means nothing,—is a stupendous sham. But did those forty-three lodges meet—in the words of Mr. Rufus W. Miles, of the building committee, and himself a Mason—to "monkey around that corner-stone? Did that host of hard working men meet there to "monkey" a sham? It was anything but a "sham" to the wives who saved, and the children who toiled for the money spent in that "monkeying." You know, full well, sir, that the wives of mechanics and small farmers must have turned their old calico dresses, and sent their girls to pick small fruits by the quart, to save money for "father" to pay his share of the swords, fuss and feathers of that "monkeying."

But, honorable sir, you are too well informed not to know that just such shams to-day subject four-fifths of mankind to kings and priests. The college which graduated you taught you that such religious shams antagonize free government, God and goodness. You are too good a lawyer not to know that the silence and refusal of the lodge to answer the charge in our indictment is a confession of judgment. Hundreds of good men like Col. Chambers, Jonas Harding and Norman Churchill, among the noble fathers of Galesburg, have come out from the lodge and given sentence against it. Other hundreds of equally good men with Chambers, Harding and Churchill, have lately sworn out indictments against the Masonic lodge. They tell us in the language of the late Dr. Ransom of Burlington, Iowa, that they "joined to see if Morgan's revelation was true and found it the same old harlot, selling secrets as harlots sell their virtue, where they have got none to sell." How can you sanction by your words and character such remorseless, sworn swindling of young Americans? An early graduate of Knox College "should be made of sterner stuff."

A point more, and I have done. When you joined the lodge, you "entered in the name of God;" you knelt at an altar; you were stripped to shameful nudity; kneeling thus blindfolded, you were exhorted to pray; prayers were said over you; the shock of entrance explained by Mackey's Ritual, was "the throes of the new birth; and when knocked down, buried, and raised from the dead by an infamous caricature of Jesus Christ, as "the lion of the tribe of Judah; you were declared a "brother," "saved from the grave of iniquity and raised to the faith of salvation."(See Mackey's Lexicon of Masonry, p. 297.) And the only attempt at apology for such stuff is that it is "monkeying!" Mere horse-play and joke! And if it be so, your good sense will pronounce it damning blasphemy and imposition. But it is just such stuff as the gentile or Christless religions of mankind are made of. It is false, man-made worship. There is the hiding of its power over man.

When sick once I spent a day in a pleasant home between Galesburg and Knoxville. On the stand near my head lay Rob Morris' Voice of Masonry. I opened a number and read an editorial denunciation of our Union solders, then fighting to save popular government, because they obeyed their officers and disobeyed the signs of rebel Masons, who were fighting to destroy it. The Voice of Masonry, which thus gave "aid and comfort" to treason, is still, in other hands, published in Chicago. I have since conversed with the Secretary of Federal Lodge, No. I., D. C. He told me he left the lodge at the opening of the war because "the lodges all went for secession." You were a Democrat, but no disciple of Vallandigham. You were a War Democrat. But the lodge-rooms of the South were the council-chambers of treason, and inaugurated the war of the rebellion, to strangle free government and eternize human slavery.

Let that bloody drama pass, curtained by oblivion, but, my dear honored sir, now that I am "old and gray-headed," nearing heaven's portal, I beg for the wife and sons who love you, for the people who have promoted you, for the Republic which shelters and honors you, for your old president whom you have befriended, and above all for the Saviour who died for you, never again lift your voice in honor of a religion which is opposed to Christ. But, like the good Col. Chambers, who, on his dying bed, called his family around him and left his testimony against the lodge, tell your friends and fellow-citizens that Freemasonry is an accursed religious imposition and cheat.

J. BLANCHARD.

THE LODGE AND MORALS.

London probably never had just such a sensation as was experienced last week. The Pall Mall Gazette, having previously announced its purpose, published for three days the results of the private investigations of its managers into the lechery and vice practiced by men of wealth and of the highest social rank in that city, giving details of the horrible traffic in young girls in London, and between that city and the continent. The parallel of these articles it would hard be to find in any print. The sale of the paper was stopped in all book stalls controlled by the authorities, but the crowds rushing to the office so jammed the street that all the lower windows of the building were crushed in and the police were called out to clear the street. The presses were kept running eight hours a day, millions of copies being run off and selling as high as twenty-five and fifty cents a copy by the newsboys. The managers have been so careful in their evidence that they defy prosecution. In court the names they could produce would redouble the sensation. They are safe; but it might be as well that the whole vile and fiendish business could be made known, but for the fact that the very familiarity with such revolting crime often robs it of its power to shock the conscience, and the frightful mien of vice

> "Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

Spurgeon and many eminent men have written approving the course of the Gazette and offering pecuniary aid if an appeal is taken to the law. The enormous demand for the paper shows how greedy is the popular mind for stories of infamous lust and crime; and, were the truth known, a history of our American cities would supply as appalling details. During the last five years our Chicago papers have once and again given hints of such a state of things here. There are two elements in the preparation of a state of society in which such a state of things can be developed: wealth and the license given to rank and title. These elements are operating in America almost as powerfully as in England. Mark the record of the Knight Templar conclaves. In this city their presence was a Saturnalia of debauch, and in Washington their meeting was such a reign of lust that the women of that city protested in a public assembly against it. Mr. Moody did a great work in London, but the devil did not take a vacation.

HAULING DOWN THE FLAG.—The action of the Mormon authorities in displaying the United States flag at half-mast on Independence day makes patriot blood tingle as it did when Anderson gave up Sumter. Over the city hall, county court-house, Deseret News office, President Taylor's house and the theater the national banner drooped in shame. A committee of citizens demanded it should be put where it belonged, and a riot was for a time threatened, when the Mormons yielded so far as the public buildings were concerned, but over their private residences the flag was at the proper place they said, "as we have not more than half our rights." The Deseret News, the church organ, fully justifies the outrage in a five-column editorial, showing it was under church authority, and claiming it was right to do it because liberty was dead in Utah. Another fact makes this alien element bold. They are, it is said, actually negotiating for the purchase of lands in Mexico, and Brigham Young, Jr., and Bishop Snow are now in that country trying to find a place for Mormon colonies. The press is full of denunciation at the Mormon audacity, some pious journals advising that some one be shot. The insult will have one effect—it will help the heedless American public to understand better who are aliens among us and who genuine Americans. The religious and secular press can talk as severely as they please at the Mormon with his strange oaths, his system of government subordinated to a semi-religious hierarchy, his abominable immorality allowed by his religion, and the bloody penalties visited upon seceders—the evil is afar off. But let them talk of the lodge which propagates the same accursed dogmas—that they dare not do, even if they see the evil; and they will not inquire for fear they will know too much for their own good. The press that curses the Mormons and flatters Freemasonry practices what used to be known in Christ's day as hypocrisy.

—The Union-Signal and other papers contradicted the daily press reports, that liquor was allowed at the Portland meeting of the Grand Army of the Republic. The Law and Order League with the city officials seized large quantities sent there for the meeting. This we are happy to note; but it does not counteract the effect of the general protest of the G. A. R. that liquor should be free.

—Every reader of this paper should mark carefully the offer of the publisher on the last page, sending the Cynosure for four months to new subscribers with a fine selection of books and pamphlets. This is an offer that should set a thousand men at work immediately. Improve every opportunity when meeting with neighbors. Give them an invitation to accept so liberal an offer.

—Bro. Clark, with his companion, "George Harris," held a grand meeting in the rink, at Englewood, July 5th. They also spent two days at Evanston, with much profit to all who heard them. This week Monday they visited DeKalb, Ill., and expecting to return to Wheaton Wednesday, an appointment was made for them in the Baptist church, by Elder Barlow, the pastor.

—The senior editor of the Cynosure with Pres. C. A. Blanchard started for Saratoga, N. Y., last Wednesday. The latter is expected to address the National Educational Convention meeting there this week.

—George W. Clark passed his 73d birthday happily with his children in this city, June 28th. Though the number of his years and the whitening of his hair show that the almond tree of age flourishes, yet his heart is young, and like a perpetual fountain his nature overflows with those gracious affections and good deeds to all men. Not one in a thousand of the public singers who have flourished in his day will ever be remembered as he; nor can we think of one whose songs have been so worthily embalmed in the lives and memories of men freed from the shackles of slavery, of liquor and the lodge, for—

> "Only the actions of the just, > Smell sweet and blossom from the dust."

—The letter from Bro. Edward Matthews on another page will be read with grave interest by thousands in his own State, Iowa, Illinois and New York among whom he has lectured. While in his former condition of servitude to the devil, Bro. Matthews was a prize-fighter and we may well believe a hard one, too. That explains why he is unwilling to be run over by men professing to be officers of the law yet unwilling to give a prisoner any satisfactory evidence of their authority. A card received Saturday tells us that he has furnished bail to appear at the September term of court; and though excitement runs high about Coldwater the injustice of the seizure will be so manifest before that time that we hope the indictment will be "quashed." Already the papers are taking back the false reports furnished them at first. Hon. Mr. Henry, State senator of Oscoda, telegraphed Bro. Matthews: "Count on me for anything in my power. Be of good cheer." He has been retained with Justice Berry of Quincy and F. C. Mathews of Detroit as counsel. Let every reader of this pray God to be with our brother and deliver him from the hands of evil men. Everybody who has heard of him knows him to be an uncompromising enemy of the lodge; hence the effort to destroy him.

THE HOME.

A PILGRIM SONG.

Our God is faithful! Time moves on, to find us
Still singing of the mercies left behind us;
Still taking, as we sing, of some fresh sto e;
And looking trustfully for those before.

How can we doubt, with memories to cheer us?
How can we sorrow with his love so near us?
How can we faint, while he has streugth to give,
And we, by faith, his proffered grace receive?

Like as a father pitying, he leads us,
And, daily, with some heavenly morsel feeds us;
Sees to our ailings, hushes our alarms,
And hears us, weary, in his loving arms.

He who has led thus far, will never leave us,
Until he at his heavenly home receive us;
There we shall see his face, and there adore,
And tune our harps to praise him evermore.

A few more stages on our journey going,
And we shall reach where Jordan's stream is flowing;
Our faithful God will cleave its swelling tide,
And lead us safely on the other side.

There Ebenezers shall be lost in joy for ever,
Where sorrow, sin, and want can enter never,
Where in a day that knows no coming night,
We'll bless the faithfulness that kept us right.

CONFIRMATION OF SCRIPTURE.

Tacitus, the Latin historian who was a contemporary of Pliny the younger, writes in his annals: Christus, the founder of that name (i. e., of the Christians) was put to death as a criminal by the Procurator, Pontius Pilate, in the reign of Tiberius." The late Prof. Jacobus tells us of another supposed confirmation of what is recorded in the Bible. A copy of the very sentence of Christ is supposed to have been found in the year 1820. It is engraven on a copper plate. It was found in an antique case of white marble while excavating in the ancient city of Aginalla, in the kingdom of Naples, and was discovered by the Commissariats of Arts attached to the French army. The following is the writiug on the copperplate: "In the year seventeen, of the empire of Tiberius Cæsar, and the 25th day of March, the city of holy Jerusalem, Anna and Caiaphas being priests, sacrificators, of the people of God, Pontius Pilate, Goveruor of Lower Galilee, sitting on the presidential chair of the Prætory, condemns Jesus of Nazareth to die on the cross, between two thieves—the great and notorious evidence of the people saying: (1) Jesus is a seducer. (2) He is seditious. (3) He is an enemy of the law. (4) He calls himself falsely the Son of God. (5) He calls himself falsely the King of Israel. (6) He entered into the temple, followed by a multitude bearing palm branches in their hands. Order the first centurion, Quillus Cornellus, to lead him to the place of execution. Forbid to any person whomsoever, either poor or rich to oppose the death of Jesus. The witnesses that signed the condemnation of Jesus are, viz: 1. Daniel Robani, a Pharisee. 2. Joannes Zorobabel. 3. Raphdel Robaui. 4. Capet, a citizeu. Jesus shall go out of the City of Jerusalem by the gate of Struenus." Without laying too much stress upon this discovery introduced by Dr. Jacobus, it may not be amiss to notice by the way that the divine Word does not suffer by the discoveries of the age. In them its histories receive a new confirmation. If teachers aud scholars would like to turn aside and spend a few moments in talking of modern discoveries, they could find many interestiug incidents and facts worth remembering. The discovery of the Moabite Stone confirms Bible history. The discovery of the Codex Sinaiticus iu 1844 in the convent of St. Catharine on Mt. Sinai, teaches how perfect the New Testament is as we have it. The Rev. Geo. E. Merrill, in his little book prepared for English readers, shows us the value of this old manuscript. His book is called "The Story of the Manuscripts." If any one is curious to know how our present New Testament was compiled they will eujoy reading this popular work. Last year a discovery near Thebes brought to light the mummies of nearly thirty of the most illustrious of the Egyptian Pharaohs, and with them documents which, when translated, it is hoped will fill not a few historical gaps, and supply interesting facts bearing on Bible history. The last series of the St. Giles lectures published in book form and called "The Faiths of the World," treat of this discovery. I give one brief quotation: "The inscriptions, it is not unlikely, may refer to that even (the Exodus) and may even serve to identify Pharaoh who so often hardened his heart against Jehovah and Moses, as well as throw light on other Bible incidents. Indeed, leading Egyptologists have already substantial reasons for the belief that, in one of these mummies, they have the remains of the king that 'knew not Joseph.'" The value of the wonderful discovery by George Smith of the old brick and stoue library of Assurbanipal is well-known. These stone and brick books have been made to do good service. Dr. Crosby makes a telling use of them in the following extract taken from his article, "The New Criticism:" "At another time the Kueneus and Wallhausens of the day, with their Robertson Smith echoes, found that the inspired writer or compiler of the Chronicles had a very big and ugly hole iu his inspiration. He had (2 Chron. 33: 11) recorded that the king of Assyria carried Manasseh to Babylon, when, of course, no king of Assyria would have done such a thing. He would have carried him to Nineveh, his capital. But the ignorant writer, writing in a late age, perhaps in the Meccabæn period, had a dim notion of a Babylonish captivity in the past, and therefore naturally sent Mauasseh to Babylon. The weak-backed Christians rushed at once into their favorite retreat in time of danger. 'Oh! the Scriptures were not given to teach us geography or history.' These Scriptures may make all sorts of mistakes in every science and tell us the moon is made of green cheese, and yet be God's holy word of truth! Infidels chuckle when they find Christians ready to acknowledge that the word of God, so reverently quoted and exalted by our Lord, is brimful of crude errors and ridiculous mistakes. However, as to Babylon, when the Assyrian discoveries showed that Esarhaddon, the conqueror of Manasseh, lived not at Ninevah, but at Babylon, we did not hear any 'beg your pardon' from the learned critics, but they went zealously to work to find another ugly hole in the inspiration of the Bible." In the Stone Library there is a full history of Esarhaddon. He married a Babylonian wife, built a palace at Babylon, and dwelt there, in order by his presence to unite more firmly the two kingdoms of Babylon and Ninevah. We believe that there are untold evidences in favor of Christianity aud the Bible buried in Oriental lands. We believe that these arguments will be resurrected in the discoveries which explorers and others shall yet make in God's own time. We even indulge the dream that the old Tables of Stone will astonish the world some day by coming forth from their hiding place. It may be also that the body of Jacob was embalmed for a future service to be rendered to the people called Israel, the people who took their name from him. Bodies as old as his have been brought to light.—Christian Statesman.

A WORD OF ADVICE.

It is as easy to be a good man as a poor one. Half the energy displayed in keeping ahead that is required to catch up when behind, would gain credit, give more time to attend to business, and add to the profit and reputation of those who work for gain. Be prompt, honor your engagements. If you promise to meet a man, or do a certain thing at a certain moment, be ready at the appointed time. If you go out on business, attend promptly to the matter on hand, then as promptly attend to your own business. Do not stop to tell stories during business hours. If you have a place of business be there when wanted. No man can get rich by sitting around stores and saloons. Never 'fool" on business matters. Do not meddle with business you know nothing of. Never buy an article you do not need, simply because it is cheap, and the man who sells it will take it out in trade. Trade is money. Strive to avoid harsh words and personalities. Do not kick every stone in the path—more miles can be made in a day by going steadily on than by stopping to kick. Pay as you go; a man of honor respects his word as he does his bond. Aid, but never beg. Relieve others when you can, but never give what you cannot afford to, simply because it is fashionable. Learn to say no. No necessity for snapping it out dog-fashion, but say it firmly and respectfully. Have but few confidants. Use your brains rather than those of others. Learn to act and think for yourselves. Be vigilant. Keep ahead rather than be behiud the time. Young men, cut this out and place it, by careful perusal, in the golden storehouse of your brain, aud if you find there is folly in the argument let us know.—Sel.

THE MAN WITH A MEMORY.

Who has not met with encyclopedias on legs, packed full of learning on a great variety of subjects, but learning unassimilated, without method or system, and made up of information the most trivial as well as the most valuable? Who has not listened "with sad civility" to more than one person like the Count of Coigny described by Tallyrand, "who possesses wit and talent, but his conversation is fatiguing, because his memory is equally exact in quoting the date of the death of Alexander the Great and that of the Princess de Guemenec's poodle?" Lord Bolingbroke has given a vivid picture of a scholar of his acquaintance who was an omniverous reader, and joined a prodigious memory of this kind to a prodigious industry. "He has read almost constantly," says Bolingbroke, "twelve or fourteen hours a day, for five and twenty or thirty years, and had heaped together as much learning as could be crowded into one head. In the course of my acquaintance with him I consulted him once or twice, not oftener; for I found this mass of learning of as little use to me as to the owner. The man was communicative enough; but nothing was distinct in his mind. How could it be otherwise? He had never spared time to think, all was employed in reading. His reason had not the merit of common mechanism. When you press a watch or pull a clock, they answer your question with precision; for they repeat exactly the hour of the day, and tell you neither more nor less than you desire to know. But when you asked this man a question he overwhelmed you by pouring forth all that the several terms or words of your question recalled to his memory; and if he omitted anything, it was that very thing to which the sense of the whole question should have led him and confined him. To ask him a question was to wind up a spring in his memory, that rattled on with vast rapidity and confused noise till the force of it was spent and you went away with all the noise still in your ears, stunned and uninformed. I never left him, that I was not ready to say to him: "Dieu vous fasse la grace de devenir moins savant!" God grant you the favor of becoming less learned.—Selected.

HOW WE WENT INTO BATTLE.

A group of children were gathered around a veteran of the last war, teasing him for a story.

"Do tell us about a battle," says a little fellow with a tin sword. "We can read iu our books about victories and defeats, but we want to know how they fight!"

"Yes! that's it," said the little drummer. "How do the men fire? how do they go in? and how do they come out? and how are they kept in order?"

"And does the General blow his trumpet?" asked the youngest, with a tin horn hanging about his neck.

"I see! I see!" the old Colonel answered; "you want to know how the business of a battle is conducted." And, stauding erect, he called out: "Attention, battalion! Stack arms! Rest!

Then the boys put their swords and drums one side, and sat down very quietly to hear the story: and the Colonel began.

"During the summer of 1864 the Union army, commanded by General Sherman, was marching South. We had left Chattanooga on the first day of May, and had been marching and fighting for two months. The officers and men were called out at daylight by the roll of the drum, had their breakfast before sunrise, aud were fighting and marching, all the day long, after the Confederate army commanded by General Johuston. The firing of cannons and guns was heard constantly, and only ended when the night closed in and hid the enemy from sight.

"One day I had been in the rear of our army, on army business, when, ridiug forward to overtake my General, I passed the Ninety-niuth Rhode Island Regiment. Just at this time I heard a brisk firing at the front, and an officer rode up and ordered the Colonel to halt his regiment and wait for orders. Then the Colonel called out, 'Halt! Stack arms! Rest!' The men brought the bayonets of their guns together, forming little pyramids, and sat down by the side of the road. They were soon engaged in different occupations. One, taking from his knapsack a tin box containing writing materials, commenced a letter; another took coffee from his haversack, mixing it in a tin cup with water from his canteen, while his comrades scraped together leaves and brush, and lighted a fire; another polished his gun, while his friend read the news from the North in the latest paper; and so all were busy, or resting, as though they had no thought of a battle.

"While thus occupied, another mounted officer arrived aud spoke to the Colonel, who immediately ordered the bugle to sound 'Attentiou.' Then the order went down the line, 'Fall in men! fall in!' and every one knew that this meant business; aud so, without haste, they carefully repacked their knapsacks, put on their equipments, took their guns and moved to their places. Then came the order to march, and the regiment moved forward to the battle.

"I rode to the front to see the fighting. As the Ninety-ninth were about to go in, the Colonel ordered a halt, and said a few words to them about doing their duty. Then they moved on in column; that is, one company behind another."

The boys were now much excited, and one said, "Oh! uncle, did they looked frightened?"

"They looked very much as you boys do when you are going into a snow-ball fight," said the Colonel. "When the first company were as near to the enemy as one street in New York is to another, the captain gave the order, 'Ready! Aim! Fire!' and at the same time the enemy fired; and the air was filled with smoke, and a rattling, ringing, crashing sound succeeded.

"Men here and there fell, or dropped their guns, showing that they had been so wounded that they could not stand, or that a ball had struck their arm. Some were left on the ground when the company wheeled and marched to the rear. The second company took the place of the first, and fired into the thick smoke without seeing the enemy.

"Just beyond this regiment was a battery; that is, some cannon, each on two wheels, the other part of the carriage, called the limber, having been drawn away. The horses were driven a short distance, and were quietly eating from their nose-bags. It is not safe to take the horses and the limber very far from the gun-carriage, as they might be called for to draw the cannon away in haste."

Just here the little drummer seemed anxious to be heard; and when his uncle paused, he said: "I know, uncle, what limber means; for when we were drawing our wagon the other day, and the fore-wheels came off, you said we had unlimbered."

Then the story went on. "One of these horses was struck by a rifle-ball. He plunged and snorted with pain, and then lay down; but the other horses continued to eat their oats, for this was their business at the time.

"Other regiments were resting on their arms; that is, the men were standing at ease, and in place, resting their guns on the ground and making themselves as comfortable as they could while awaiting orders.

"Soon the firing ceased, the smoke cleared away, and looking over the fields I saw that a bridge that spanned a small stream with steep banks was burning. The enemy had attempted to keep our soldiers from putting out the fire, and that had brought on the little battle, which we call an engagement. They hoped by burning the bridge to check the movement of our army. By this means they expected to make us wait while they got further away; or gain time to select a field and prepare to fight us by throwing up intrenchments, or mounds of earth, to secure themselves when we should attack them.

"Gen. Joseph E. Johnston was a thorough soldier, and a very able man; but what could he do against such an army as ours?

The enemy had not yet learned that our government had provided for all difficulties. With the Union army came trains of cars loaded with all that was necessary for the army, and among these were bridge timbers, plank, and tools, on a construction train. As the enemy retreated this train was pushed forward to the stream, and the bridge timbers taken to their places and the planking put on. Carpenters and as many soldiers as were needed assisted at this work; and while the timbers of the old bridge were burning the new one was ready for use. After a few hours' delay our troops and trains were crossing, and in hot pursuit of the retreating enemy."

"But, uncle," said the tin-sword boy, "why did not the enemy go some other road?"

"Because, my boy, they needed the railroad for their cars, and also the bridges to cross on.

"The battle had ceased, a very small specimen of a battle, but large enough to illustrate its excitement, its horrors, and its discipline. Now came the sad ending—the clearing up of the field.

"A train of ambulances were driven up and conducted by mounted officers to different parts of the field. The wounded men were carefully lifted into these carriages and driven off. Each driver attended to his business. As one passed toward the clean, white tents composing the field hospital he met another returning, and called out, 'Drive over that way Tom, and you will find a load waiting,' and he pointed with his whip in the direction without stopping his horse.

"Men not mortally wounded, and having the use of their legs, make their way toward the hospital. One has his arm in a sling, another has a bloody handkerchief about his head. I asked the first about his wound. He replied, 'Oh, Colonel, you should have seen our company go in, and how Captain Dick led us, and how the Colonel praised us!' 'But I asked you how you were wounded,' I said. He was so excited that he forgot to answer, and I said again, 'Are you badly wounded?' 'My arm, you say! Oh, it's pretty badly shattered, but they shan't take it off if I can help it,' and he moved on.

"I met another cheerful looking young fellow, shuffling along rather painfully, and I said, 'Where are you hurt my lad?' 'One ball in my leg and one in my arm; too much for one skirmish, Colonel.'

"I now rode to one of the large tents, and, looking in, saw a number of surgeons, their coats off, their sleeves rolled up to the shoulders, and their hands bloody, working in a very business-like way. They stood at tables, and the wounded were brought in and laid before them.

"The brave boy whom I had met, and who had no time to tell of his wounds, now came forward hesitatingly. He heard a shriek from within, he saw blood, he turned pale—his glory had departed. Trusting to my look of sympathy, he came to my side and whispered, 'Will you please go in with me?'

"A badly wounded man was now placed on the table, and he looked imploringly at the countenances of the surgeons, as though he would read their decision. A fly lighted on the nose of one of the operators and he rubbed it off with his wrist, the knife in his bloody hand projecting forward.

"Here were but twenty wounded men to be cared for. Think of two hundred thus wounded, with no room in the tents for them; some crying for water, some groaning, some delirious.

"Dear boys," said the Colonel, "do you know why I tell you of these scenes that make you tremble? It is for this: You boys must attend to the business of the great nation in twenty or thirty years, and I want you to have such a horror of war as I have; as every true soldier has. You, John, may be President, and you, Thomas, may be Secretary of War, and you, William, may be member of Congress. Then you will hear some of your friends talking fiercely about going to war with France or Spain or England, because some foolish captain of a ship has fired into one of our vessels, or because one of our citizens has got into trouble in Europe. It will then be necessary to tell them what you have heard of the horrors of war, and persuade them to find some other way to settle their difficulties. Always bear in mind that we have no right to go to war until all other means of maintaining peace have failed."

The boys looked rather disappointed as the story ended. They had only thought of war as a time for marching about with music and soldiers' clothes and feathers. The Colonel roused them up with, "Take arms! Forward march!—and go about your business."—Christian Union.

TEMPERANCE.

Pass where we may, through city or through town,
Village or hamlet of this merry land,
Though lean and beggared, every twentieth pace,
Conducts the unguarded nose to such a whiff
Of stale debauch forth-issuing from the styes
That law has licensed, as makes temperance reel.
There sit involved and lost in curling clouds
Of Indian fume, and guzzling deep, the boor,
The lackey and the groom. The craftsman there,
Takes Lethean leave of all his toil;
Smith, cobbler, joiner, he that plies the shears,
And he that kneads the dough, all loud alike,
All learned and all drunk. The fiddle screams,
Plaintive and piteous, as it wept and wailed
Its wasted tunes and harmony unheard.
Dire is the frequent curse, and its twin sound
The cheek-distending oath. 'Tis here they learn
The road that leads from competency and peace
To indigence and rapine: till at last
Society grown weary of the load,
Shakes her encumbered lap, and casts them out.
But censure profits little: vain the attempt
To advertise, in verse, a public pest,
That, like the filth with which the peasant feeds
His hungry acres, stinks, and is of use.
Th' Excise is fattened with the rich results
Of all this riot. The ten thousand casks,
Forever dribbling out their base contents,
Touched by the Midias finger of the State,
Bleeds gold, for Parliament to vote away.
Drink and be mad, then; 'tis your country bids;
Gloriously drunk—obey the important call;
Her cause demands the assistance of your throats;
Ye all can swallow, and she asks no more.

THE RELATION OF ALCOHOL TO THE HUMAN SYSTEM.

Rev. Daniel Dorchester, D. D., in his book: "The Liquor Problem in all Ages,' after marshalling a long army of testimonies, sums them up as follows:

1. That no kind of alcoholic liquors—not even wine, beer, or ale—form any part of the necessary sustenance of man.

2. That alcohol produces no desirable effects upon a healthy living organism.

3. That there are no circumstances of extreme labor, or of severe heat or cold, in which the use of alcoholic liquors is beneficial.

4. That instead of warming the body, alcohol reduces its vitality.

5. That there are no special modifications of the mental or bodily conditions, short of actual disease, in which the use of alcoholic liquors are necessary or beneficial.

6. That the capacity of the healthy human system to sustain either mental or bodily labor, under depressing circumstances, is not augmented by the use of alcoholic liquors; but on the other hand, their influence impairs that capacity.

7. That alcohol undergoes no change in the body, and cannot be digested and incorporated into any bodily substance, but is a disorganizer of the system, injuring and destroying functions necessary to life.

8. That while a good state of health cannot be benefited by alcohol, yet the injury may not at once be apparent.

9. That "alcohol is not only not a helper to work, but a certain hinderer of work."

10. That "the best physical performances can only be secured through absolute abstinence from alcohol."

11. That the constant use of alcoholic drinks, in ever so moderate a measure, injures the nerve tissues.

12. That many people who are not known as drunkards are injured by these drinks.

13. That the moderate use of alcoholic drinks "produces a marked liability to acute diseases."

14. That the "merely moderate man is never safe, neither in the counsel he gives to others, nor in the practice he follows for himself."

15. That "alcohol taken into the system, produces the same effect, whether it be pure alcohol, rum or whisky, gin or brandy, or if it be wine, malt liquors, or cider;" the difference is only in degree.

16. That "the use of beer is an evil only less than whisky, if less on the whole." "It is peculiarly deceptive at first, but is thoroughly destructive at the last."

17. That "the constant use of beer is found to produce a degeneration of all the organisms, profound and deep-seated."

18. That though "the beer drinker may be the picture of health, yet in reality he is most incapable of resisting disease." "Compared with inebriates who use different forms of alcohol, he is more generally diseased."

19. That particularly does the liver suffer from the use of lager beer, and the kidneys, too, are impaired by it, Bright's disease being very extensively caused by beer.

20. That in Germany attention is being called to evidences of race deterioration caused by the free use of beer."

21. That it is more and more evident that all alcoholic liquors must be strictly confined to the domain of medicine.

22. That "when prescribed medicinally it should be with conscientious caution, and a sense of grave responsibility."

23. That their use as a medicine is being greatly curtailed by the most scientific physicians.

24. That the most advanced medical science is discovering excellent substitutes, which inspires the hope that even in the treatment of disease, alcoholic liquors will yet be wholly superseded.

IT DON'T PAY.

It don't pay to hang one citizen because another citizen sells him liquor.

It don't pay to have one citizen in the county jail because another citizen sells him liquor.

It don't pay to have one citizen in the lunatic asylum because another citizen sold him liquor.

It don't pay to have fifty workmen ragged, to have one saloonkeeper dressed in broadcloth and flush with money.

It don't pay to have ten, smart, active, intelligent boys transformed into thieves to enable one man to lead an easy life by selling them liquor.

It don't pay to have fifty workingmen and their families live on bone soup and half rations, in order that one saloonkeeper may flourish on roast turkey and champagne.

It don't pay to have one thousand homes blasted, ruined, defiled and turned into a hell of discord and misery, in order that one wholesale liquor dealer may amass a large fortune.

It don't pay to give one man, for $15 a quarter, a license to sell liquor, and then spend $5,000 on a trial on another man for buying that liquor and committing murder under its influences.—Christian Secretary.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

—The Isaac Newton Lodge of Freemasons, Cambridge, Eng., held an emergency meeting a few weeks since, for the purpose of raising Prince Albert Victor, son of the Prince of Wales, to the third degree. The ceremony took place at the Guild Hall, and was attended by a large number of Freemasons from all parts of the country, including several officers of the Grand Lodge of England, and Lord Kintore of the Grand Lodge of Scotland. The ceremony was performed by the W. M., of University Lodge.

—P. W. Haring, 32 years of age, joined a lodge at Osceola, Pa., paid in $1, went home and became sick of typhoid fever, and died May 15th, having never paid more than $1 into the W. and O. B. F. His family however received the $2,000 just the same as would the family of any benefit member. Such items are hawked about as a proof of the advantages of lodge insurance. Were the whole truth known it would be offset by scores of cases where large investments have been lost in these orders.

—The Supreme Temple of the Patriarchal Circle of Odd Fellows of the United States, meeting at St. Paul, Minn., last week, elected officers for the ensuing year as follows: Supreme Consul, Peter Vanvechten, Jr., of Milwaukee; Supreme Venerable Oracle, H. M. Innis of Columbus, Ohio; Oracle, Martin Krueger of Michigan City, Ind.; Vice Oracle, J. H. Mahler, of St. Paul; Commander, Col. S. S. Oddy, of Rochester, N. Y., Marshall, Geo. C. O. Akley, of Chicago; Secretary, Newell Daniels, of Milwaukee; Treasurer, Franklin Ellis, of Troy, Ohio; Standard Bearer, Louis Van Nordin, Toledo, Ohio; Trustees, A. Long, of St. Paul; A. B. Adams, of Battle Creek, Mich., and Samuel Flagler, of Ottumwa, Iowa. It was decided to make the organization a military order, and it was also decided to adopt a system of insurance similar to those of other secret organizations. The plan is not completed, but is left in the hands of a special committee consisting of C. L. Deering, of Portage City; A. B. Meyers, of Milwaukee, and A. G. Bleekman, of Chicago.

—The supreme officers of the Catholic Knights of America, assembled at Louisville, June 30, for the purpose of electing a supreme medical examiner and chairman of the sinking fund for the ensuing two years.

—According to the Freemason, of Detroit, John W. Kelsey, the janitor of the Masonic Temple, New York, has a scheme to aid the Bartholdi statue fund. He proposes to contribute a blooded horse to be raffled for. This is an idea worthy of the lodge in which gambling has not yet ceased to be a virtue.

THE CHURCHES.

—Rev. Halleck Floyd of Dublin, Ind., last year acted as agent for the Dayton Seminary. He is now engaged in the same work for Hartsville College.

—The Salvation Army continues their meetings in this city on the North Side near the Chicago Ave. church. The police station is opposite their place of meeting, and the officers are inclined to protect them from the assault of roughs.

—Pastor Seguin of the Reformed Catholic mission in this city lately visited St. Louis, and was last week in Detroit. The papers of the latter city criticized his sermon severely.

—Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, son of the great London divine, is pastor of a flourishing Baptist church in Auckland, New Zealand.

—Dr. Talmage's Brooklyn Tabernacle is to be kept open all summer; so also will Dr. Cuyler's church in Lafayette avenue, Brooklyn, and throughout July, as in several summers past, the Rev. Dr. Kittredge, of Chicago, will preach in that place.

—The issue of religious works of all kinds by the Presbyterian Board of Publication last year reached over 20,000,000 copies, and by the Baptist Society during the same time, 22,986,016 copies.

—At Farwell Hall, recently, Revs. J. D. Brushingham, Robert Johnson, P. H. Swift, Scott, A. H. Kirkland, and Mrs. Jane Beaver were constituted a committee to nominate officers for an association for the benefit of destitute boys in Chicago. Mr. Hogeland, who has done much for the poor, ragged urchins of the gutters and alleys, is the projector of the scheme, and it is his purpose to open an intelligence office where boys can register their names, so that homes may be found for them on farms. A meeting will be held shortly to organize the association.

—The Rev. C. E. Laughlin, pastor of the Presbyterian church of Lennox, Iowa, and his sister Regina Laughlin, were both drowned on Sunday, June 28th, in the Platte river, eight miles east of Lenox, while on their way to the Platte church.

—Rev. Jerry Witherspoon, D. D., pastor of the First Church in Nashville, Tenn., writes: "You have already heard of our great revival in Nashville, conducted by the Rev. Sam. P. Jones. My church shared largely in the results of that meeting. God's people were wonderfully revived, and to the roll of this church were added on profession 155 members.

—Rev. Dr. J. L. Kirkpatrick, Professor of Moral Philosophy and Belles Lettres, at Washington and Lee University, died in Lexington, Virginia, on Wednesday, June 24th. He was prominent in the Southern Presbyterian church, and was President of Davidson College, North Carolina, for several years. He was Moderator of the General Assembly in 1862.

—Rev. J. W. Bain, formerly of the United Presbyterian church, has been released from the Alexander Presbyterian church, this city, after a successful pastorate of a little over three years. No reason for such action is published, but a parting gift of two thousand dollars from the congregation, and a series of strong resolutions show that it was from no lack of the attachment of his people.—United Presbyterian.

—In the United States Roman Catholic bishops and archbishops are, of Irish descent, thirty-three; of German, thirteen; of French or Belgian, twelve; of English, nine; of Spanish, two, with four other countries, one each.

—The Rev. Newman Hall, of London, was seized with dizziness on the 30th ult., and was for two hours in a semi-conscious state. He is recovering.

—The Committee for the Lord's Day Observance in the Canton Vand offers a prize of 100 francs for the best short essay against the practice of holding elections on Sunday, so common in Switzerland.

—At a recent meeting of the Protestant ministers of New Orleans, a resolution was adopted extending an invitation to Mr. D. L. Moody, to visit New Orleans in the autumn and hold a series of meetings.

—The East Presbyterian church of Buffalo, the Rev. Henry Ward, pastor, has received eighty new members since the first of May—all but five of them on confession of faith, and a number of others are expected to join soon.

—The first sermon known to have been preached in the Chinese language in Philadelphia was delivered lately by Dr. Hartwell, Superintendent of the American Baptist Missionary Society for the Pacific Coast, at the Baptist Tabernacle.

—It is reported that the Massachusetts Hampshire East Association, composed of thirty-five Congregational ministers, has refused to adopted the new Congregational creed, and the new association will adopt one of its own. But it is feared that these ministers desire a yet more conservative creed than that rejected.

—Rev. F. M. Hollister on July 2nd, succeeded Rev. G. S. F. Savage, who resigned his position as Secretary and Treasurer of the Chicago Theological Seminary last spring. Mr. Hollister was for more than thirteen years pastor of the Sixth Presbyterian Church of Newark, N. J., and was the Western Secretary of the American Tract Society for six months until his induction into his present office.

—It is said that the word camp-meeting first originated with the Presbyterians. Certain Presbyterians ministers held a sacramental meeting at a place called Cane Ridge in Kentucky, in 1800. It was attended by more than 20,000 people and protracted for weeks. The Encyclopedia Brittanica says that this was the first camp-meeting ever held in the United States.

—Through the zealous labors of Signor Luigi Capellini, the soldier-evangelist in the Italian army, more than 1,000 soldiers have left the Church of Rome during the last thirteen years and been admitted as members of the Evangelical Military church.

—Rev. William Deane, D. D., for fifty years a Baptist missionary in China, one of the best known missionaries that ever left America, is in Chicago. His work has been of an important character, and he has become thoroughly identified with the missionary interests in China, where he is looked upon with deep veneration by the many natives who have become acquainted with him and his work. His services have been called into use by the British Government in the line of interpretation for the royal court, and his long years of acquaintance with the language have specially fitted him for this delicate task. He has become intimately conversant with the Chinese, having translated the Bible into that tongue. He has also familiarized himself with the Japanese. Dr. Deane has reached his 81st year.

—Pastor Lecoat, of the Breton Mission, has concluded the translation of the whole of the Scriptures into the Brezonic tongue. This is the first Protestant version of the Scriptures in Brittany, and it cannot fail to be of great use in future evangelistic work in that country. The New Testament has been out about a year, and the Trinitarian Bible Society is about to carry the Old Testament through the press.

—The five divisions of the Presbyterian church in the United States have a total footing as follows: The Northern Assembly has under its care 5,973 churches, with 5,341 ministers and 615,942 communicants. The Southern Assembly numbers 2,040 churches and 127,107 members. The Assembly of the United Presbyterian church has 858 churches and 87,637 members. The Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian church has 2,463 churches and 122,249 members. The Reformed church has 520 churches and 81,880 members. Total, 11,854 churches and 1,034,306 members.—N. Y. Witness.

This schedule omits entirely the Reformed Presbyterian Synod, numbering 121 congregations and 10,745 members; the Reformed Presbyterian General Synod, numbering not quite so many; the Associate Synod and the Associate Reformed, which number some thousands. All these latter divisions are opposed to the lodge.

—Rev. W. C. Van Meter, formerly well known as connected with the Howard Mission at "Five Points," New York, but for some years laboring in Rome, is visiting Chicago. He had appointments last Sabbath at Memorial Baptist church, Chicago avenue Sabbath school and other places. Of the work conducted from Rome he speaks encouragingly, and his report shows that during the six months ending May 1st the mission had been instrumental in the distribution of 170,000 Bibles, Testaments, Gospels, Psalms, and Proverbs, and many thousands of tracts, in addition to which 200 unmounted maps of Palestine were given out. The International Sunday-school lessons have been translated and adapted to the special wants of preachers, teachers, and pupils, and are sent free throughout Italy, Sicily, Corsica, and Sardinia. Six day and night schools are supported in part or entirely by the mission. At the Vatican mission school 181 pupils were received, ninety-six of whom were young men. An important and hopeful feature of the work is free medical attendance on the poor. Access is thus gained to many a family who otherwise could not be successfully approached. At the mission, instead of a sermon Sunday evening, a conference of ministers and Christian workers is held, and much valuable experience is gained thereby. The receipts from all sources, including a balance of $1,631, amounted to $3,634, and the expenses $3,545.33. For the information of persons disposed to aid the mission it is stated that $25 will pay the salary of a night school teacher during the winter and $25 meet the average expenses of a Sunday school for one year.

HOME HINTS.

FRUIT SYRUPS.

Making syrup is an all day affair, and a good plan is to set the jars of juice in the oven at evening and keep a low fire all night, finishing off next forenoon. Six quarts of grape juice should make one of syrup, wine colored, lucent, of delicious, refreshing perfume and flavor. One tablespoonful in a glass of water gives a delightful drink, like fresh grape juice, the true substitute for wine with all temperate people, and the finest medicine for correcting a feverish, bilious state ever known. The syrup itself is valuable for restoring strength, and consumptive persons should take it by the tumbler daily, sipping it leisurely with sugar if too tart for the taste. It makes new, rich blood, it cleanses the system, clears brain and feeds starved nerves. It has the hypophosphites which doctors prescribe for wastes of tissue, and taken freely will arrest even critical stages of disease. People fed on pure food with abundance of fruit need never dread cancer, Bright's disease, gout, neuralgia, dropsy, or a dozen other of the worst scourges of the race.—Vick's Magazine.

FAT BABIES.

If we may judge from the perfect passion of some mothers for fat babies, as for fat chickens, pigs and the like, we may infer that all are intended for the market or for thanksgiving. It may pay financially to have the latter fat, since they weigh more, though the wise are now rejecting the fatest creatures in the market; but this principle does not apply to babes, save in cannibal localities. But seriously, a fat babe is oftener than otherwise diseased. Indeed, extremes of fatness and leanness are alike indications of disease, more especially subjecting the victims to croup, sore throat, diphtheria, bowel complaint cholera infantum included. Slight deviations from the standard condition indicate that the babe has too much or too little food, while unusual specimens of fatness or leanness point directly to disease, the fatness in hot weather being the most unfavorable. Let the mother remember that sweets of all kinds, cream, butter, and all forms of oils, with starchy foods, as arrowroot, crackers, sago, tapioca, corn starch, etc., are the fatteners—more appropriate in moderate quantities in the winter than in the hot season. If a child is too fat, suffering from heat, all of these should be discontinued, or used very sparingly, while the fruits, berries, vegetables, omitting, perhaps the starchy potato, and the whole grain products instead of fine flour, are beneficial.—Golden Rule.

CAMPHOR AND CHOLERA.

At a recent meeting of the Homeopathic Medical Society of New York several physicians read papers on cholera and all spoke highly of camphor as a remedy. One doctor said that during a certain cholera epidemic in Europe 2,000 people each of whom wore a small bag of camphor about their necks, escaped although exposed to the disease, while others died by the hundreds. Pure water, good ventilation, regular and correct habits, and wholesome surroundings are the best preventives known.

RED PEPPER AND SALT FOR CHOLERA.

A Massachusetts correspondent calls our attention to the publication, about thirty years ago, of a very successful cholera cure, introduced in this way: The captain of an emigrant ship, coming from Europe, had lost many of his passengers by cholera, although freely dosing all with the remedies then usual. At last he made a prescription of his own—one teaspoonful of red pepper and a tablespoonful of salt to a half pint of boiling water; this to be given as hot as possible to every patient when first taken. It is said that this simple remedy acted as a charm, curing all the cases on board that ship, and attaining considerable general popularity during the time of that cholera visitation.—Scientific American.

It is the theory of medical men who believe cholera to be caused by a bacillus which poisons food and water that the germ may be killed by heat, and they recommend that all water shall be boiled and all food cooked before it is drunk or eaten. The theory is new but the practice is old, as is shown in a recent letter to the Tribune. In 1849 the cholera prevailed in Paris, Ky., with great violence. A family of thirty whites and blacks had not a single case of sickness among its members, yet no precautions were taken except to cook the food and boil the drinking water.

THE PILLOW-INHALER!

Cures CATARRH, HAY-FEVER, ASTHMA and CONSUMPTION, by enabling the sufferer to inhale powerful, healing, soothing and curative vapors ALL-NIGHT—eight hours out of the twenty-four—whilst sleeping as usual, and without any discomfort. Used the same as an ordinary pillow. No pipes or tubes. Concealed reservoirs in the Pillow hold the liquid and volatile balms. There is no dosing the stomach, no douching or snuffing, but, just as a smoky lamp will leave a deposit on a whitened wall, so the PILLOW-INHALER, for eight hours at a time, spreads a powerful healing balm or salve on the inflamed inner coating of the diseased air-surfaces, from the nostrils to the bottom of the lungs, and hence into the blood. It is a constitutional and local cure at the same time. Its success is wonderful—a success that is changing despair into hope, and filling homes with joy. It is inexpensive and can be used by any one. Call and see it, or send for pamphlet and testimonials.

"THE AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST,"

and a new Portrait of

GENERAL GRANT.

The American Agriculturist has just issued a magnificent stipple-style line portrait of General Grant, executed by one of the very first artists of the country. The great warrior is sitting in an easy chair in his now famous library; the expression on his countenance is exceedingly life like, and the whole picture is grand and striking in appearance, far surpassing any previous likeness of the General. Its great merit is due to the fact that it is from General Grant's last sitting; that is, it presents him as a picture of health as he was just before his present and probably fatal malady overtook him. Other portraits, while presenting him in health, do not show his features and general appearance at a late period.

The regular price of the American Agriculturist is $1.50 per year. We have made arrangements with the publishers whereby we are enabled to send, postfree, in a tube specially made for the purpose, this portrait of General Grant, the American Agriculturist from now until the end of the year (eight months) and the Cynosure for the same time, all for the sum of $2.20.

The portrait alone sells for $1 in New York, we are reliably informed; no copies have been disposed of at less than that figure.

A Wonderful Woman, A Wonderful Life, AND A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Elizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

REVISED ODD-FELLOWSHIP ILLUSTRATED.

The complete revised ritual of the Lodge, Encampment and Rebekah (ladies') degrees, profusely illustrated, and guaranteed to be strictly accurate; with a sketch of the origin, history and character of the order, over one hundred foot-note quotations from standard authorities, showing the character and teachings of the order, and an analysis of each degree by President J. Blanchard. The ritual corresponds exactly with the "Charge Books" furnished by the Sovereign Grand Lodge. In cloth, $1.00; per dozen, $8.00. Paper cover, 75 cents; per dozen $4.00.

IN THE COILS; —OR— The Coming Conflict.

A NEW AND STRANGE STORY BASED ON STARTLING FACTS, VIVIDLY PORTRAYING A MYSTERIOUS AND DANGEROUS POWER AT WORK IN THE GOVERNMENT, THE CHURCH, AND THE HOME.

"All will agree that this is a powerfully written story."—Evangelist, (Chicago, Ills.)

"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D. D. in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia.)

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

"The book will create a sensation in Masonic circles, and evoke criticism of a most relentless character. The courage of the author in attacking such a rock-rooted bulwark as Freemasonry is something to admire, Fanatic though he be."—Nebraska Watchman.

"Light is needed on this subject and needed badly, and we welcome this contribution to the literature of anti-secretism, and cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers."—United Presbyterian, (Pittsburgh.)

"A charming work, fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin;' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the book, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.'"—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ills.)

Thick paper, beautifuly bound, 352 pages, sent to any address for $1.50. AGENTS WANTED.

HOLDEN WITH CORDS,

OR THE POWER OF THE SECRET EMPIRE. A faithful representation in story of the evil influence of Freemasonry, by E. E. FLAGG, author of "Little People," "A Sunny Life," etc. This is a thrillingly interesting story, accurately true to life because mainly a narration of historical facts. 384 pages. In cloth, $1; per doz., $9. Paper, 50c; per doz., $4.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"There is no important history extant but has connected with it numerous other histories of which it was the initial point, or the dominating influence. The abduction and murder of Morgan set ten thousand secret springs in motion, as the surrender of the charters of so many lodges at that time, and the severing of their connection with the order of some forty thousand of its members indicated. This story is one of these histories, and is a collection of facts woven into a story. It cannot fail to be read with interest."—Free Methodist, Chicago.

"The republication of the Reform Story which run through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these make a helpful addition for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind."—Christian Cynosure.

"It is one of the most fascinating narratives we ever read and teaches its lesson in a manner not soon to be forgotten. It is evidently written for the heart and its words go to the heart. It is singularly free from wild denunciation. Those who are interested in the secret society question would do well to form the acquaintance of this interesting work."—Lutheran Standard, Columbus, O.

"The exciting scenes of the fall of 1826, at Batavia, N. Y., when Wm. Morgan was murdered by Masonry, are woven into the story so as to give the truth of History a setting of attractiveness. The forty chapters of the volume are soon compassed by the eager reader who begins the volume. This volume ought to be read and will be sought as its merits become known."—United Brethren in Christ.

"The story is intensely interesting and the author has succeeded in weaving into it a great deal of information in regard to this mysterious order, which is certainly startling if true, and he gives what seems to be undoubted evidence to prove his assertions. The book is one which should be read by both Masons and Antimasons."—Wayne Co. Herald.

"Our Anti-secret society friends are certainly entitled to great credit for their persistence in their efforts to expose and root out secretism. The object of the writer of this story is to present in its true light the crafty, unscrupulous and exceedingly hurtful influence of Masonry, the parent of all the orders."—Reformed Presbyterian and Covenanter.

FARM NOTES.

LAYERING SHRUBS AND VINES.

Amateurs who desire to increase their favorite shrubs, roses or vines, will find layering the best method, and July the best month. to perform the operation. Although too slow a process for nurserymen who desire to multiply their stock rapidly, it is far the best method for all who require only a few extra plants. Select the north side of the plant to lay down the branch to be rooted, and pulverize the soil well where the new plant is to take root. Daphne oneorum, Exorchorda, Purple Fringe, Aristolochia sipho and some other shrubs as well as some of the hardy roses, will require two years to become well rooted. A few shrubs and vines refuse to root from layers; these are grown from seeds and by grafting, and as the seeds require considerable care and experience, their propagation had better be left to the nurserymen. Layered plants of he Clematis, having an abundance of eyes near the root, are more valuable for planting than the grafted, a matter of vital importance to persons about to plant the Clematis. Imported plants, usually grafted, often have but a single sound eye, and that several inches from the root. If in any way the intervening wood becomes broken or injured the plant is rendered worthless.—Vick's Magazine.

FEEDING CHICKENS FOR MARKET.

Much profit is missed by feeding young chickens too long. The early broods should now be ready for feeding. It is better to have them already fed, for then the cockerels will be ready for sale and the pullets will be so far forward as to be ready to begin laying, early in the fall. But if the chickens have not been fully fed, the cockerels should be separated now and the old cocks turned in with them. Probably no more hens will set, but as the eggs will be good for two weeks after the separation, this may be made at once. The best of the young cockerels should be selected for use next year, and the rest should be forced for market and disposed of at once. They will bring more now than any time later. An excellent feed for them is corn meal mixed with boiling hot sweet skimmed milk. This gives the flesh a fine flavor and a clear and white appearance, which adds to the market value. The feeding should not be continued over two weeks, and if the fowls have had all they will eat, they will be as fat as they can be made. Longer feeding will not add to their weight, and it is apt to produce disease.—American Agriculturist for July.

Many complain that onions do not keep. The trouble is in keeping them too warm, says the Farmer's Tribune. The onion is a bulb—a plant at rest—and the least warmth starts it into activity. It is much better that onions should remain frozen through the winter, provided they can thaw gradually, than to be put into a cellar or other warm place where their vegetation powers will be aroused. If put in heaps onions will be sure to spoil; but if spread in thin layers and covered with hay or straw, so that if frozen the thawing will be gradual, they will keep well through the winter. It is the custom with onion growers to get their crop to market as soon as possible. If they were to provide proper storage, they would realize much more from them when sent to market later in the season

Professor Forbes, the Illinois State Entomologist, contributes another paper on the "Root Web Worm," which is destroying the growing corn. He observes that the depredations of this new enemy to the corn have only been discovered in fields previously in grass, and he concludes therefrom that the root web worm breeds in grass. He suggests that the web worm matures from the middle of June to the 1st of July, and then ceases its mischief, so that a little delay in plowing up the old corn may save the new. These suggestions receive additional importance from the fact that they apply usually well to the attacks of the wire worms. These insects likewise are found only in hills of corn in infested fields, and if destroyed here are simply exterminated once for all.

Readers ordering goods advertising in the CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE will do well to mention the paper when ordering as we have reason to believe that our advertisers treat the readers well.

Past Master of Keystone Lodge No. 638 Chicago.

Explains the true source and meaning of every ceremony and symbol of the Lodge, thus showing the principles on which the order is founded. By a careful perusal of this work, a more thorough knowledge of the principles of the order can be obtained than by attending the Lodge for years. Every Mason, every person contemplating becoming a member, and even those who are indifferent on the subject, should procure and carefully read this work. An appendix is added of 32 pages, embodying which gives every sign, grip and ceremony of the Lodge together with a brief explanation of each. The work contains 422 pages and is substantially and elegantly bound in cloth. Price, 75 cents.

WEBSTER'S PRACTICAL A NEW DEPARTURE IN DICTIONARIES.

An Industrial Revolution.—In a large Connecticut manufacturing establishment there is in operation a new style of furnace which produces more steam-power from a consumption of 1,000 lbs of coal than can be generated from 20,000 lbs burned in the ordinary way. In other words, the new contrivance already saves nineteen-twentieths of the fuel, and it is believed that before being publicly announced it will be so improved that the saving will reach 49 fiftieths! The facts already developed are simply incredible to one who has not actually seen them verified.

A Remarkable Coincidence.—While the new Furnace was in process of construction, the editors and publishers of Webster's Unabridged were engaged upon their new work which is as great an improvement upon all previous Dictionary productions, and just as valuable in its way as is the incredible fuel economizer above alluded to. Webster's Practical is not only a new compilation by the leading Dictionary House of the world, but it embodies several new features which, for ordinary use, render it pre-eminent among dictionaries—not excepting even the Unabridged.

1st, Condensation—By grouping all derivative and compound words under their root or leader (as in the "Book" example quoted below), such words are adequately treated in one-third of the space required by the old arrangement. By this means nearly all the desirable material of the four and five-dollar dictionaries is presented in a convenient and handy form in Webster's Practical.

2d, Association.—We comprehend as well as remember things chiefly by their associations. For this reason any one who shall carefully read the "Book" paragraph which we reproduce from Webster's Practical Dictionary, will not only comprehend it more readily, but will be able to remember two or three times as much as would be gained by reading about the same words when treated separately as in other works.

3d, Ready Reference.—Not only do we comprehend and remember more readily by the new grouping method, but we do it in less than a fourth of the time required when the words are classified in the old way. Hence, no one who values time would hesitate to pay one dollar for Webster's Practical rather than accept the best of the older dictionaries as a gift.

4th, Derivative Terminations.—Only the larger dictionaries hitherto published give the derivative terminations. The New American Dictionary, for instance, does not give any of the four variations of so common a word as forbear, while they are all given in Webster's Practical.

5th, The Illustrations in Webster's Practical are more numerous and better executed than those of any other abridged or low-priced dictionary.

6th, Prefixes and Suffixes.—Another important feature of Webster's Practical is its peculiar treatment of prefixes and suffixes, which is believed to be more desirable than a separate department of two or three hundred pages which is sometimes allotted to them.

7th, Compendium Matter.—Still another invaluable feature of Webster's Practical is its compendium matter, over one hundred pages of which is devoted to the most complete Pronouncing Vocabulary ever compiled of Biblical, Classical, Mythological, Historical and Geographical Proper names. With Webster's Practical Dictionary at hand, one need not be at a loss to correctly pronounce or spell the most difficult words.

8th, An Invaluable Book.—The importance of supplying every child with Webster's Practical for his very own, is not generally appreciated. As an educator it is worth a hundred times its price, and a little self-denial to provide one or more copies in every family will prove a better economy than an endowment of hoarded bank-stocks later on in life.

The following paragraph is reproduced from Webster's Practical.

Book, bŏŏk, n. A collection of sheets of paper, etc., bound together; a literary composition, written or printed; a subdivision of a literary work. (Mer.) A volume in which accounts are kept. — v. t. [BOOKED (bŏŏkt), BOOKING.] To enter, or register in a book. — Book'ish, a. Given to reading; more acquainted with books than with men. — Book'-bind'er, n. One who binds books. — -bind'ery, n. A place for binding, etc. — -bind'ing, n. Art or practice of, etc. — -case, n. A case with shelves for holding books. (Bind.) A book-cover. — -cov'er, n. (Bind.) A case for a book; a cover of cloth or other material prepared for casing a book. — -keep'er, n. One who keeps accounts. — -keep'ing, n. Art of recording mercantile transactions and keeping accounts. — -learned, -lĕrnd, a. Versed in books; ignorant of life. — -learn'ing, n. Learning acquired by reading,—esp. as opp. to practical knowledge. — -mak'er, n. One who writes and publishes books; a compiler; a sporting man who makes a record of bets. — -mak'ing, n. The practice of, etc.; compilation; systematized betting. — -mark, n. Something placed in a book by which to find a particular place. — -plate, n. A label indicating ownership, place in a library, etc., usually on the inside of the cover of a book. — -post, n. The post-office arrangement by which books are mailed. — -sell'er, n. One who sells books. — -shelf, n. A shelf to hold books. — -shop, -stall, -store, n. A place for selling books. — -stand, n. A stand for selling books in the streets; book-stall; a support to hold books. — -worm, n. A worm or mite that eats holes in books; one excessively addicted to study.

THE QUANTITY TEST.

Webster's Practical Dictionary, ($1) 600,000 Words and 1,400 Illustrations.
New American Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Popular Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Standard Dictionary, ($1) 210,000 Words and 612 Illustrations.

Quality Test.—Aside from all advantages above alluded to, there is still another and very important feature of the new work to be considered, viz.: its quality as compared with the cheap dictionaries which have had the largest sales, and which have been compiled chiefly from the old editions of Webster on which the copyrights have expired. Hence Webster's Practical contains more matter than any other dollar dictionary. Its quality, to say the least, is the very best, while its arrangement and all other new and desirable features, including first-class illustrations, paper, printing and binding are added without extra charge.

A Subscription Book.—As Webster's Practical is not for sale at book-stores, our readers will be able to procure it only from canvassing agents, unless it be ordered in connection with this journal in accordance with our special offers.

It contains some of the MOST POWERFUL ARGUMENTS put in brief form, written by men of distinguished ability, showing the evil nature and dangerous tendency of secret societies. Those who circulate tracts need the book to make their selections wisely.

Send for a copy to Anti-masonic headquarters, the NATIONAL CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, 221 W. MADISON ST., CHICAGO. Price, 25 cents.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

BATAVIA CONVENTION PAMPHLET.

A Staggering Blow!

Such was to Freemasonry the great NATIONAL CONVENTION held in BATAVIA, N. Y., September 1882. It gave the world

Thurlow Weed's Great Letter

On the abduction and murder of WILLIAM MORGAN in 1826, which has been the most widely published of any Anti-masonic document. The dedication of a noble granite monument to the memory of Morgan, and the able and eloquent addresses of the Convention make this a most valuable pamphlet.

SEE WHY.

It contains—
1. Portrait of Morgan.
2. Portrait of Thurlow Weed.
3. Fine picture of the Monument
4. The great letter of Thurlow Weed and his affidavit—almost the last public act of his life.
5. Address by J. E. Roy, D.D.
6. The monument oration by Pres. C. A. Blanchard.
7. Addresses on "Christian Politics" by Pres. J. Blanchard, on the Character of Freemasonry by Prof. E. D. Bailey, on the "Freedmen and Secret Societies" by Rev. H. H. Hinman; and very interesting personal and historical reminisences.

IN BRIEF

The highest prize at the New Orleans Exposition for oranges was won by Massachusetts men.

Twenty-eight States in the Union have adopted laws restricting the practiee of medicine to educated persons.

Some almanacs 3,000 years old have been discovered in London. As they contain only calendars and meteorological reports the rhapsodies upon patent medicines are sadly missed.

The elegant soft hat of the Spaniards has remained the same from the earliest period to the present day, while among all other nations frequent transformations have taken place in that article.

One of the two free circulating libraries in Philadelphia that of the Friends in Germantown, has no work of fiction on its shelves, yet it gives out nearly 15,000 volumes a year, and about 25,000 people come annually to read in its rooms.

Queen Victoria detests smokers and keeps up in her palace the standing order, "Positively no smoking here.

The annual sale of cologne water in the United States is about $2,000,000. The total value of water exported from Cologne to this country in 1884 was $23,134.48. Nevertheless every druggist has the original genuine water in any quantity that may be desired.

As a result of the recent earthquakes in Cashmere, 3,081 persons lost their lives, 70,000 houses were laid in ruins, and 33,000 animals perished. An officer has been sent to survey the scene of the shocks.

The iron industry of Michigan is in a bad way. The strikes in the east have seriously affected the market, large mines and furnaces are closing down one after another, and the outlook is on the whole a dismal one.

The popularity of "hen fruit" may be attested by the fact that during the year 1884 the value of the eggs sent to this country from Canada and Europe aggregated $1,197,399.67. The province of Ontario contributed $661,540.47 worth; Quebec, $88,019.27; and Nova Scotia, $3,606.75. Besides these imports we got from Denmark an egg supply worth $253,729.20, and from Germany "dozens of dozens" enough to make a bill of $190,403.08.

An old Scotch lady being in London, observed above a currier's shop door a cow's tail fixed to the wall by way of a sign. She stood for a considerable time meditating on the curious sign. The shopman went out and politely asked her what it was that drew her notice so much, upon which she answered, "Od, I've stooden an' lookit near an' oor at that coo's tail, an' I canna see, i' the name of wonder, foo the coo cud gang in at sic a sma' hole and no' be able tae pu' in her tail after her "

It is shown by the report of the chief of the Bureau of Statistics at Washington that the value of the domestic breadstuffs exported from the United States during the eleven months ended May 31 $141,431,965, an increase of $1,875,092 as compared with the corresponding eleven months of the preceding fiscal year. The largest increase was in wheat and oats.

Rats and mice were long the scourge of Hawiian farmers, but they have been successfully dealt with by the introduction of the mongoose. Thirty-six pairs of this animal were imported from Jamaica two years ago into the District of Hilo, with the result of instantly clearing 4,000 acres of cane of this nuisance. One planter estimates his saving last year at $50,000.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

WASHINGTON.

The heads of the executive departments have been considering the advisability of reducing the annual leaves of absence granted to the department employes, and it is understood that the question was a topic of discussion in cabinet meeting. The general impression now is that these leaves will be reduced from thirty to twenty days.

The efforts of the inspectors of the labor bureau at present are largely directed to the ascertainment of the labor unit; that is to say, the exact cost of the labor necessary to produce the great staples of manufacture, the pig-iron product receiving especial attention. From present indications it is expected that the bureau will be able to make a comprehensive report to Congress within a few weeks after the reassembling of that body.

President Cleveland has addressed a letter to General Sheridan respecting the troubles among the Cheyenne Indians in Indian Territory.

General Sheridan left Washington for Fort Reno, I. T., on Thursday. A telegram was sent to the officer in command, saying that the outbreak must be suppressed even if the Cheyennes are wiped out of existence. General Miles is expected to arrive in the Indian Territory this week. The hope is expressed that he may be able to quiet the disturbance without bloodshed. He is well known to the Indians, and is said to have considerable influence over them.

The June wheat report of the National Agricultural Department estimates the aggregate yield at 363,000,000 bushels. The condition is higher than any year since 1880 (1883 excepted), and cotton has materially improved.

Eleven thousand nine hundred and twenty seven pieces of registered matter were handled yesterday in the Washington City Postoffice, the heaviest day's business in the history of the office.

President Cleveland has tendered the Liberian mission to the Rev. Dr. G. W. Bryant, pastor of the A. M. E. church of Nashville, Tenn.

The Commissioner of Agriculture has appointed W. M. King, of Ohio, chief of the seed division of the Agricultural Department.

The Comptroller of the Currency today authorized the First National Bank of Great Bend, Kans., to begin business with a capital of $50,000.

CHICAGO.

The annual report of Superintendent White, of the railway mail service, shows that over 685,350,000 letters were distributed by clerks under him.

The West Side street-car strike collapsed last Tuesday. The determination of the police to preserve order and allow the cars to be run was enough to bring the men to reason. A conference with the president of the company soon completed an arrangement by which all the strikers returned to their places Wednesday morning, and the cases of the sixteen discharged men were investigated. Most of them have been returned to their duties.

The Mayor's latest attempt to close the gambling dens is not yet successful. Taking advantage of the strike, games were opened in a number of places. The police officials, it is hoped, will yet drive them from the city.

The contest over the last election for mayor has at length begun. The committee of citizens which represents Mayor Harrison are a wholesale liquor dealer, a brewer, the attorney for all the liquor sellers of the city, and two others, one of whom is Potter Palmer.

COUNTRY.

A large body of striking lumber-mill employes from Bay City, Mich., went to East Saginaw, Friday and closed down a number of mills on the west side of the river. The mayor and sheriff issued orders for closing the saloons and cautioned the strikers against acts of violence.

The Rural New Yorker estimates the wheat crop of the country this year at 365,000,000 bushels, 147,000,000 bushels less than last year's yield. It reports the corn outlook as good; states that oats will be the largest crop ever harvested, and that the yield of rye and barley will be fair.

Secretary Chamberlain of the Ohio State Board of Agriculture, estimates that the total wheat crop of the United States will amount to 300,000,000 bushels, against an average of 451,000,000 bushels and a last year's total of 513,000,000 bushels.

A cigar-box wrapped in paper was left Thursday morning at the residence of George Krementz, a jeweller of Newark, N. J. The latter opened the box when he was struck by a bullet discharged from a pistol concealed in the receptacle, but escaped uninjured.

Strikers from Newburg marched into Cleveland Tuesday and forced the workmen from the Chisholm Shovel Works. Then marching to the Union Screw Works, they battered in the doors and windows, and orders were given to stop work. Mr. Fayette Brown, President of the company, was struck with a club and several girls employed in the packing rooms fainted from fright. The mob spirit prevailed in the city during the week, but with no altercation with the police.

Sunday morning at Stoughton, Wis., fire destroyed ten large tobacco warehouses with their contents, besides the St. Paul Railway Depot, six cars laden with lumber, and ten empty freight cars, creating a total loss of $650,000, upon which there is insurance approximating $450,000. The amount of tobacco destroyed is said to equal one-third of the entire crop of Wisconsin of 1884.

In Brattle street, Boston, Saturday, the dress of Miss Bessie, daughter of General E. W. Hincks, caught fire from a smoldering fire-cracker, resulting in burns which caused her death Sunday. Deceased was 20 years old.

Governor Martin, of Kansas, received a dispatch Tuesday evening stating that that the Cheyenne Indians were on the war-path in the southern part of Pratt county, and that several settlers had been killed and stock driven off. The report proved to be untrue; but about one hundred Indians have left their reservation and are supposed to be somewhere in southwestern Kansas.

In a runaway accident at Paris, Ill., Wednesday, the Rev. Dr. Von Deursen, a Presbyterian clergyman, was thrown from his buggy and fatally injured.

The strike caused the closing down Wednesday of all the lumber mills on the river in Bay City and West Bay City, Mich. At one point the officers and strikers were in collision. Three arrests were made, but when a threatening crowd surrounded the jail the prisoners were released.

Mrs. John Rogers, of Howden, Ind., made desperate at an assault upon her by her husband, whom she had rebuked for suspicious intimacy with Miss Emma Snell, Tuesday cut the throats of her two children and then drowned herself in a water-trough. Rogers has disappeared and Miss Snell has been so prostrated that she may not recover.

A man who had been working in the mill five hours turned cold water into the redhot boiler in a shingle-mill near Titusville, Pa., Wednesday, the explosion tearing the structure to atoms, killing one man, and probably fatally injuring three others.

FOREIGN.

In the whole of Spain Monday there were 1,467 new cases of cholera and 600 deaths from the disease. Toward the close of the week the disease seemed to be abating.

General Courcy, commander of the French forces at Hue, the capital of Anam telegraphs the government that on Sunday night 30,000 Anamites suddenly attacked the French troops and a desperate engagement ensued, resulting in the Anamites being repulsed. The French loss is placed at sixty and that of the enemy at 1,500.

Advices from Venezuela state that a revolution broke out in that country on the third inst., and that the government troops joined the insurgents.

Cholera, it is rumored, has crossed the Spanish Frontier into the Department of the Aume, France.

The news from Madagascar is of a most serious nature for the French invaders. Admiral Miot, wanting reinforcements, is obliged to act strictly on the defensive. Twelve thousand Hovas besiege the French occupying the Mazanga fort. The besieged are able to communicate with Admiral Miot only by sea. If the French will not withdraw peaceably, the civilized world will rejoice to see them driven out.

NEWS OF THE WEEK..... 16

A government official in this city, himself a member of a secret order, speaking of some of the changes brought about by a Democratic postmaster, said that in one of the important division postoffices where the superintendent resigned weeks ago, the carriers and clerks fulfilled their duties just as well as when he was present, and more heartily; that about all the old superintendent did was to draw his salary and write Masonic notices, being a high Mason. Prominent among the Democratic candidates for the place were two saloon-keepers and ward bummers. But we believe Mr. Judd, the postmaster, has appointed a man of upright character, who at least will not make the office a supplement to the lodge.

The Freemasons of Missouri seem about to add another landmark. Rev. (?) John D. Vincil, the Grand Secretary, wants to draw a line on saloon-keepers and says: "If Masonry exists to furnish association for saloon-keepers it ought to die. If it tolerates them it is unfit to live." On the face of it, this reads like a very brave speech and Good Templar papers print it with the utmost satisfaction, for it appears to prove that in Missouri the lodge and saloon are divorced. But that is neither the case, nor is it likely to be till the temperance fight is won in spite of the secret orders; for to reject the saloonists the lodge must adopt a discriminating test of membership opposed to every pretense it has ever laid before the public. We prefer to read Mr. Vincil with another interpretation. Masonry does "furnish association for saloon-keepers," it does "tolerate them," and must by constitution do so, therefore it "IS unfit to live."

The failure of John Roach, the only American ship-builder who can compete with the English companies, is likely to be made of considerable political importance. Mr. Roach, starting as a workman and poor, has built up an enormous business, while retaining to the last that regard for his employes which marks a just and generous spirit. He has been called a [illegible]nd subsidy beggar, because he has labored earnestly for the payment for the transportation of mails by ship equal to that paid the railways. Such a sum would encourage the establishment of American lines and the building of first-class steel or iron vessels to man them. Such ships would be available for government use in the remote emergency of war, while no dependence could be placed on vessels purchased of foreign builders. The refusal of the present administration to honor the contracts of a former one has in it a bad look of repudiation for the sake of party scheming. The vessels rejected were built under specifications given by the government and to ordinary men Mr. Roach seems to have been ruined, and an important American industry along with him, by a dishonorable political trick. There may be some explanation by Secretary Whitney which will change this judgment, but unless he makes a remarkably clear case the Democratic party will find Roach's hulks dragging heavily behind their bark at next election.

tion and success in China copied from a letter to the Independent on another page is no sooner in type, than the daily press reports the English premier, the Marquis of Salisbury, in conference with the Chinese representative, and the result is a new opium treaty between China and Great Britain. Not restricting or with a righteous stroke abolishing the infancy—but extending it; opening up the interior of the great Celestial empire freely to the deadly trade! Can Christian England look upon this treaty without bursting indignation and shame? The liquor interest triumphed for a moment in the late overthrow of the Liberal party. The cruelty that perpetuates the curse of intoxicating liquor at home, must not be expected to shrink from the baser business of destroying millions of poor foreigners with a poison drug.

—The Worcester Spy of the 10th inst., contains a notice of the death of Mrs. Jane T. Cheever, wife of Rev. Henry T. Cheever, one of our valued correspondents, and president of the National convention in Boston. The death of this amiable lady will be greatly mourned in a large circle of friends, and with them the Cynosure extends to the bereaved husband the hand of Christian sympathy.

—The first number of the Christian Conservator of Dayton, Ohio, the successor of the Richmond Star and United Brethren in Christ is just out with Bro. William Dillon at the helm, assisted by Halleck Floyd, and guided by the counsel of Prof. Davis and Bishop Wright. It is a strong number and worthy the cause it represents.

REV. LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG AND THE FIRST TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

BY ELDER J. L. BARLOW.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS.

The portrait accompanying this sketch is a fair and striking likeness of a man whose memory should be kept green and fragrant, especially by all the friends of temperance. From 1808, till his death, a few years since, he held a prominent position among the pioneers in the temperance cause in the State of New York; and his familiar face was seen and his voice was heard, in the State, and other gatherings, for the promotion of a reform to which he committed himself in the prime of his manhood with a zeal which knew no abatement, until he was called in a good old age to lay off his battered armor for the rest and the crown of the faithful.

The writer knew him personally only in his later years, meeting him from time to time in the annual meetings of the different State temperance organizations. These he delighted to attend as long as his health and extreme age would permit. Through all the years from the incipient stages of reform until "Prohibition" began to be the rallying cry, he kept step with the advancing hosts of temperance; and if not himself a recognized leader, he was a prominent and efficient worker, whose influence was felt all along the lines.

LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG was born on the 23rd of November, 1775, at Bedford, in the county of Westchester, N. Y. His father, Isaac Armstrong, a revolutionary soldier, was a cousin to Paulding, one of the captors of Major Andre. When our friend was in his eight year, his family removed to East Line, in Ballston, Saratoga county, N. Y. Here he spent his youth, became a Christian, was prepared for the ministry; and on the 15th day of March, 1804 he was installed a pastor of the Congregational church in the town of Northumberland, with its meeting house in the town of Moreau. There he became a pioneer subscriber to the pledge of the first organized temperance society ever known to exist in our land or world.

Though some of his parishoners strongly objected to his thus committing himself to this new and singular movement, he was not to be deterred. His entrance upon this work was brought about by the suggestion of Dr. Billy J. Clark, who found in his pastor, Mr. Armstrong, a sympathetic listener, and a ready, fearless and efficient co-laborer.

On the 20th of April, 1808, there was formed at the hotel of Peter L. Mawney, in Moreau, "The Union Temperance Society of Moreau and Northumberland." Though the idea originated with Dr. Clark, yet its shaping and brilliant success owed much to the practical wisdom and tireless energy of Mr. Armstrong. Happy the parishioner who has such a pastor; and happy the pastor who has such a parishioner! How long Mr. Armstrong remained with this church we cannot say; but his life and labors were mainly spent in Saratoga county. At one time we find him in Edinburg, a town in the north part of the county; and while there throwing himself heartily into another reform.

Like many another unsuspecting young man, he was induced to became a Freemason, and went forward in "search of light," until he had taken twenty-one degrees. Failing in his object, he at length renounced, and like the brave, true man he was, denounced the order as a "Work of Darkness." His published address on this subject is worthy of the reading it has had, and ought to be reprinted. As a reformer, he will not soon be forgotten. Whatever he undertook enlisted all his power. Though he was not the originating mind, yet he had only to see the truth to embrace it unhesitatingly, and uphold it loyally, with a manliness and courage worthy of all praise. And no opposition of friends or foe, or loss of popularity, could shake his determination, or cause him to relax his efforts. His spirit seemed to be fired by these words of the poet:

"Let all the soul within you,
For the Truth's sake go abroad.
Strike! Let every nerve and sinew,
Tell on ages—tell for God."

Mr. Armstrong, during his long life, found time to prepare and publish several valuable books, among which, as might have been expected, was a "History of the Temperance Reformation." This was a very valuable work, used for several years by the writer as a text-book while engaged in lecturing on temperance, as well as in editing and publishing The Mirror of Temperance at Port Jervis, N. Y. The "Signs of the Times" is another work attracting some attention, and highly commended by some of the most eminent clergymen of New York of thirty years ago. A copy of this work, now in my possession, was presented to me at his own door by the author during my last interview with him, a few years before his death—the exact date of which I cannot now recall. He had, however, entered upon his ninth decade.

In his later years Mr. Armstrong gave up the active labors of the pastorate; retired to his paternal home at East Line; purchased a meeting-house; removed it near his dwelling, and preached in it, gratuitously, as he was able, to his neighbors and others who chose to hear him. Here he lived, generally respected, and here he died, after having outlived most, if not all, the friends of his youth—a friend to God, to truth, and to the best interests of his race; deserving a biographer who, with a wider and more intimate knowledge of his life, could render him larger justice.

Though ever a consistent advocate and defender of higher law and human rights in every department, yet it was his temperance work upon which he looked with most complacency. In regard to this, he places himself on record thus: "In conclusion, the following is my temperance creed: Let the temples of Fame declare to succeeding generations the names and mighty achievements of departed heroes. Let the pages of history extol the sanguinary exploits of the great chieftains of the earth, and describe how they conquered and fell. Let Alexander, and Cæsar, and Napoleon, and others of less note, have the glory of all that the world calls great. But be it my humble lot to have it engraved in truth on my unadorned tombstone, 'He was a man of temperance, evinced by profession, precept, example, and consequent influence, founded on love to God, and good will to fellow-men.'"

For the dates with the above facts I am indebted to a little work entitled, "Temperance in Saratoga County," compiled by the late Judge W. Hay.

THE FIRST TEMPERANCE SOCIETY IN AMERICA.

The following facts are derived from a work entitled, "Temperance in Saratoga County," compiled by Judge Wm. Hay, with whom the writer had a pleasant acquaintance some years before his death. In giving us the beginnings of that remarkable organization, whose constitution follows, he says:

"On a stormy night in March, 1808, and after a day of toil and anxiety in visits to his patients, and dripping with rain and covered with mud, Dr. Billy J. Clark entered unceremoniously the parsonage and earnestly addressed its occupant, Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong, with these words: 'Sir, we shall have a community of drunkards unless something is speedily done to arrest the progress of intemperance.'"

These words happily did not fall on listless ears or a calloused heart. Mr. Armstrong, if not a born leader of men, knew how to fall into line and keep step with the right, and his position was always at the front.

This interview was in March. It began to bear fruit on the 13th of the next month, when a preliminary meeting "was held at the house of Peter L. Mawney for the purpose of establishing a temperance society," under such laws and regulations as should be afterward agreed on.

After an organization was effected, it was resolved that a committee of five be appointed to draw the by-laws for said society. On this committee were Billy J. Clark and Lebbeus Armstrong, with Sidney Berry, Nicholas W. Angle, and Ichabod Hawley. They were to report on the 20th of April at the same place, at 12 o'clock. At this meeting they also

"Resolved, That the members of this meeting wholly abstain from all spirituous liquors."

April 20th, 1808, the incipient society met at the house of P. L. Mawney agreeable to adjournment, where the committee presented a preamble and by-laws which were adopted.

Judged by the light of to-day, there are some things here which will excite a smile; but if we could go back to 1808 and find ourselves side by side with the men who prepared these by-laws, we should call it a remarkable paper, emanating from men of heart and brain. The men who prepared, adopted and lived by that paper were no ordinary men; and the work they inaugurated is marching forward to a grand consummation.

One of the original members of this society, Gardner Stow, was the first to advocate legislation to prohibit all traffic in intoxicating liquor as a beverage. This he did in an address delivered in Keeseville, N. Y., in 1834. Though his audience thought him extravagant, they paid him the compliment of publishing his oration in a pamphlet. "I contributed cheerfully to the expense," says Judge Hay.

Ask all your readers to study carefully the following pioneer document:

PREAMBLE.

Considering the prevaleney of intemperance in the exeessive use of spirituous liquors; considering the numerous evils and calamities to which the inhabitants of this and other countries are exposed thereby; considering the immense sums of money needlessly expended in the purchase of ardent spirits; and heartily wishing for a general reformation by the abolition of intemperance, and a more economical and virtuous use of expenditures: We, the subscribers, inhabitants of the town of Moreau and Northumberland, in the county of Saratoga, and State of New York, being convened by previous notice on the 20th of April, 1808, at the house of Peter L. Mawney, in the town of Moreau, do agree, mutually, voluntarially, collectively and individually, to form a society for the purpose of suppressing vicious habits and encouraging moral virtue.

For the regulation of said society and the better to carry its important designs into effect, the following by-laws are unanimously adopted by said society, to the strict adherence of which every member is bound by the penalties hereinafter mentioned:

BY-LAWS

Of the Moreau and Northumberland Temperance Society.

ART. I. This society shall be known by the appellation of Union Temperate Society of Moreau and Northumberland.

ART. II. That the last Monday in October, at 2 o'clock A. M., shall forever, hereafter, be the time for holding the anniversary meeting of the society, for the election of officers, at such place as a majority of the members present at their last annual meeting shall agree. And it shall be the duty of the society to put up written notifications of the same in at least three public places in Moreau and Northumberland three weeks preceding such meeting.

ART. III. The officers of this society shall consist of a president, vice-president, secretary, treasurer, not more than seven nor less than three trustees, to be chosen annually, by baliot, and a majority of the whole number of votes shall be necessary to constitute a choice.

ART. IV. The members of this society shall not be allowed to drink any rum, gin, brandy, whisky, or any kind of distilled spirits, or any kind of composition of the above liquors, except by the advice of a physician, or in case of actual disease, under such penalties as shall be hereinafter mentioned.

ART. V. Any member of this society who shall drink any of the liquors mentioned in the preceding section shall forfeit and pay to the treasurer of the society, for the benefit of the society, the sum of twenty-five cents for each and every offense.

ART. VI. If any member of this society shall be known to be intoxicated, it shall be the duty of the trustees of this society to admonish him of it. If said member will pay to the treasurer fifty cents, and promise reformation for the future, he shall be excused; if not, he shall be considered a fit subject for expulsion.

ART. VII. It shall he disreputable for any member of this society to offer any of the liquors mentioned in article 4th to any member of said society; or to advise or urge any other person to drink of said liquors, except in cases mentioned in article 4th. And if in case any member should so offer, advise and urge any person to drink of said liquors, he shall forfeit and pay to the treasurer twenty-five cents for each and every such offence.

ART. VIII. It shall be disreputable for any member of the society to speak disrespectfully of said society or utter any words with intent to injure or bring said society into disrepute, and shall forfeit and pay to the treasurer thereof twenty-five cents for each and every such offence.

ART. IX. Each member of this society shall pay to the treasurer thereof such sum as he shall be assessed at the annual meeting of the society, provided such sum do not exceed two dollars in any one year.

ART. X. If any member of this society, whose character stands fair and unimpeached, shall request a dismission therefrom, may, on application to the society at their annual meeting, have a certificate from the secretary thereof, that he is dismissed from said society, provided he discharge his proportion of taxes, fines and expenses that have become due previous to such application.

ART. XI. It shall be the duty of the president at a public meeting of the society to appoint one of its members to deliver an oration or address to the society at their next annual or quarterly meeting, whose duty it shall be, if he cannot attend in person, to forward the same to the secretary, to be read before the society.

ART. XIX. That any member of this society who shall remove away from this society at such distance as to be inconvenlent to attend the meeting of said society, it shall be lawful for such member to sell or dispose of his right in the fund or property of said society to any person who is not a member of said society, provided such person will subscribe to the law and regulation of said society.

ART. XX. That it shall not he lawful for any member of this society to drink any wine except at a public dinner (except in cases stated in article 4th).

ART. XXI. That not any of the laws of this society shall infringe on the right (rite) and ordinance of any religious church or society whatsoever.

ART. XXII. That it shall be the duty of any member of this society to accuse any other member thereof for any misdemeanor that he deems contrary to the true inteut and meaning of the law and regulation of this society; and the accuser shall make a statement in writing of the misdemeanor aforesaid, and lay the same before the president of the society, and the president will issue a summons to the accused to appear before the society at their next meeting, stating the time when, and the place where, it is to be holden, to defend if he see fit against the accusation; a copy of the summons and accusation shall be left with him, or at his usual place of abode, at least six days previous to such meeting, and the accuser shall cause such summons to be served and returned previous to a meeting of the society; and if the accused refuse or neglect to appear in person or by proxy, or no satisfactory reason be given to the society for such neglect, he shall be suspended or expelled from the society. And if he be convicted of any of the charges alleged against him, he may be punished by fine, suspension or expulsion, provided the fine for any one offense shall not exceed fifty cents.

ART. XXIII. That the society shall have the power at any of the annual meetings to appoint a committee to examine and report to the society such amendments, alterations and improvements as may from time to time become necessary in the foregoing code of by-laws, and that report shall be taken up and decided upon by the members in annual meeting, provided, nevertheless, that no alteration shall be made without the concurrence of three-fourths of the members present.

ART. XXIV. That each individual member of this society subscribe to the above laws and regulations, and consider himself bound strictly to observe and obey them.

To the above sixty-five names were formally attached, while sixty-five others were somehow inadvertantly omitted who were members of the society; all of whose names are now in my possession. Among these are the names of Billy J. Clark, Lebbeus Armstrong, Gardner Stow and James Mott, still living when I commenced labor as a pastor in Saratoga county, New York, in 1856.

While serving the Greenfield Center Baptist church I became a member of the Greenfield Temperance Society, which came into existence in 1809, one year after the Moreau society. This society was the first to proclaim the principle of total abstinence, in 1814, from which time, and as long as I knew it, there were held semi-annual meetings: one on the 4th of July, celebrating the day on temperance principles; and the other on Washington's birthday, February 22d.

A SCOTCH WOMAN'S CHEESE.

The poet Burns alludes to a Scotch woman who made a good cheese and kept it a year or more that it might become more savory.

In the first place in making a good cheese the essential ingredients must be employed. No articles obnoxious or repugnant should be intermixed. Secondly the changing or chemical action must be awaited. Thirdly, the redundant, watery matter must be eliminated. Being subjected to the necessary pressure it becomes a justifiable cheese. The new cheese under proper circumstances will improve in taste by age. It should be kept in an atmosphere of purity and proper temperature. Time and patience is required.

"A length the housewife, garrulous will tell How, 'twas a tawmond auld sin lin was i' the hell."

The church, like the woman, has a hand in manufacture. The object aimed at is a convert or member which we will call a cheese. Essential ingredients of scriptural doctrine should be employed. Repentance, humility, the leaven, etc., must work as did the chemical action. The watery or redundant doctrine of old time should be eliminated. No alien ingredients should be commingled Pride, avarice, fashion, malice, dishonesty, passion, war, lying, swearing, etc., should be omitted. Evil influences like a foul atmosphere, should be guarded. The dance, theatre, horse race, rink, church fairs and the like amusements. Some think sectarian influences unsavory. They are like Jacob's pilled rods begetting a motley of colors. Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Quakers, etc., beget converts of their own stripe; mold the cheese to their respective liking. The ardent Saul breathed forth threatenings and slaughter. Some of the others wanted fire from heaven to consume foes. Some wanted Jewish rites which were only symbolic. Some would not have the water pressed out, being greater devotees thereto than ever was John, the Forerunner. Methodist Episcopals want the hell-born secret societies commingled. Not they alone, but divers others. Going thus far they can commingle nearly all else. Quakers once made a good cheese. They, however, added the broad-brim, the shad-belly, and some the knee-buckles. Other people thought it unsavory and rejected the cheese. The Catholic, Methodist, and all the rest would make a very big cheese if they had to commingle chaff, stubble, beggarly elements, brick, water, whey, etc. Some are essayists, trying to leave out tobacco, rum, beer, etc., but the cheese is not always wholly devoid of these.

In the case of the woman's cheese that was justifiable, it improved in taste by age. In the case of the church it grows or improves in grace and sanctity with age.

QUAKER BOY.

AMERICAN LEGIONS.

At an early period in the Roman Empire, the Senate was consulted in the choice of emperors, but subsequently these were chosen by the Pretorian Guard, a body of troops stationed at the Capitol, and changed by assassination as often as suited their caprice or desire for a donative. Finally, the British, Gaulic, German and Eastern divisions of the army aspired to the choice and frequently warred with each other for their respective favorites. The successful exterminated the unsuccessful aspirants and their adherents, and unmercifully robbed the people to reward partisans. The result was a total loss of liberty and the rights of property.

Warned by the example the English people were long jealous of a standing army as fatal to constitutional government and none were tolerated until demanded by her growing colonial possessions at the end of the seventeenth century. Following their precedent the American people have also been singularly sensitive about its army and it is universally accepted as an axiom that a large army is dangerous to and incompatible with liberty and free institutions.

But it seems not to occur that the same enemy to popular institutions may exist in an analogous form and be still more pernicious in the same manner that a masked is more dangerous than an open battery. It does in fact exist in the numerous secret societies which resemble the legions in many particulars. Like the latter the majority are recruited from able-bodied men who are sworn to unquestioning obedience to superiors and mutual assistance under death and other penalties and are uniformed and frequently drilled with arms. The demand for the latter has been so great that they have been compelled to establish their own manufacturies.

The Freemasons, Odd-fellows, Knights of Pythias, Grange, temperance organizations, labor unions and numerous other orders and their sympathizers are the equivalents of the Pretorian Guard of the British, Gaulic, German, Asiatic and African legions and their camp-followers, and the whole exceeds three-fold the army of Xerxes. Rome was first conquered by her army but the United States may fall by her dynamiters and kindred associations.

No man can belong to such associations without his vote being sometimes influenced by the connection, and a suffrage thus controlled is as corrupt as one bought by bribery at the polls and in equity should be equally excluded. B. T.

THE REFORM OF A QUARTER CENTURY AGO.

Rev. Joseph E. Roy, D. D., having for some years directed the work of the American Missionary Association in the South has lately returned to Chicago, where he resumes its work as Western Secretary. Sometime before the war he was ordained pastor of the Plymouth Congregational church, resigning to become Home Missionary Secretary for the West. The following reminisences of those days of anti-slavery agitation are from his letter in the Advance:

"Coming back to this new office I was reminded that it is the same to accept which I resigned the Plymouth church pastorate just twenty-five years ago. Then the A. M. A. had in the Interior 112 home missionaries and 145 churches, all white. Among these were those of Charlotte, Eaton Rapids, Allegan and Augusta, Michigan, those of Paxton, Sandwich, Waukegan and the New England of Aurora, in Illinois; those of Cedar Falls, Waterloo and Elyria, in Iowa; also four in Kansas, one in Missouri, eight in Kentucky and two in North Carolina. Those churches had 5,223 members, reported 685 conversions in one year, and contributions to the amount of $1,990. But it was found that the American Home Missionary Society was carrying out its new rule—not to aid any church that retained bona fide slave-holders in them. By this process its fifty-five home missionaries in the South were dropped. And so, after a year and a half the Chicago District Secretary and the mass of his associate missionaries were transferred to that society. It was with the utmost good feeling all around that this change was made, which showed how much love was all the while borne to the old Society by those who for a time had felt constrained to act in another capacity. Then the A. M. A., relieved of the bulk of its work in the Northwest, turned to hug the tighter the border of the slave domain. But the shiver of fright which John Brown had given the South and the bursting of war drove out the missionaries who had broken over Mason and Dixon's line. And this relieved the Association all the more that it, the first of all societies, might plunge into the work opened up among the negroes. That work began within the first six months of the war. It was under the guns of Fortress Monroe, among Gen. Bulter's 'contrabands.' That mission is now Gen. S. C. Armstrong's far-famed Hampton Institute.

"At the annual meeting of the A. M. A., held in the First Congregational church of this city, in 1859, the question was raised about the future of the organization. Some said that as a tug, having helped the other societies out to good sailing, it would have nothing more to do. Pres. Blanchard replied: 'Yes, we'll use it as a tug; and then turn it into a frigate to course all up and down the waters of the South!'

"As I write this on the Fourth of July, the independence of our Western States was naturally suggested. And now I am reminded of the Fourth in 1857. The corner-stone of the Chicago University was to be laid. Senator Douglas, who had given the ten acres of land, and who was president of the board of trustees, was to make the principal address. The president of the University, who was a Democrat, invited to the service of the chaplain for the occasion the Plymouth pastor, who had been in a public controversy with Mr. Douglas upon political matters. The prayer remembered our brethren in bonds and besought that the time might come when they, too, could rejoice in the Day of Independence. The orator, after a few remarks, desisted, stating that his throat was out of order. The next day Long John's paper reported that 'Roy's prayer gave Mr. Douglas the bronchitis.' And years after the president claimed that he had sought the abolition preacher as an offset to the 'squatter-sovereign' Senator."

AT THE LODGE DOOR.

Rap, rap, rap.

Door Keeper.—"Who is there?"

Ans.—"I am the lover of all mankind, the great benefactor of the human race, who died that they might live, and I seek admission to your lodge that your members may receive the benefits I bring."

D. K.—"What is your name?"

Ans.—"My name is Jesus Christ."

D. K.—"You will wait until your request is communicated to our presiding officer, and his answer returned."

Jesus.—"I am willing to wait so long as there is hope of my being admitted."

D. K. [after a pause.] "Our answer to your request is this. There are many of us who do not believe you are what you claim to be; but we all believe in God, and put our trust in him; and we are seeking to inculcate the great principles of virtue and morality, for which we have the greatest respect. If, therefore, you are willing to come in upon this basis, you can talk as much as you please about faith in God and our duty to our neighbors but you must be silent about your peculiar doctrines. We do not want to hear anything about the cross, or about the notion that you suffered death to atone for the sins of mankind, that you alone can bring to man everlasting life."

Jesus.—"But if I consent to be silent on these themes how can I fulfil my great mission as the Saviour of sinners? 'No man cometh unto the Father but by me,' and God will not accept your homage except you render it through me, for it is his will that all men shall honor the Son even as they honor the Father, and though he offers to men the unspeakable blessing of eternal life, it is only in and through me, for 'I,' alone 'am the way, the truth, and the life.'"

D. K.—"Well, as a lodge we entirely ignore these claims of yours; and if you should advance them in our meetings, you would only produce discord; there are proper places and times for you to speak on these themes."

Jesus.—"I ask not to intefere with any other business that is right, or to monopolize the speaking, but only that I may have privilege of using suitable opportunities to invite men to partake of the benefits of my salvation."

D. K.—"You will not be permitted to talk at all on these subjects in our lodge; and unless you consent to be silent, I must refuse you admission."

Jesus.—"To refuse to admit me as your Saviour is to refuse to admit me at all, for where my salvation is ignored, I cannot come; but I must warn you that by rejecting me you reject him that sent me, for I am the salvation which God has provided for you. Your professed reverence for God, while turning from the Son of God, is an insult to the Most High, even as was the offering of fruit and flowers presented by Cain. God hath declared that 'without shedding of blood there is no remission of sins,' and 'I' alone 'am the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world."

The Saviour turns sadly away from the lodge door; and as he does so, one who professes to be a follower of his comes up, but instead of following his Master he obtained admittance upon the terms which Christ himself would not consent to. He agrees to let the cross of Christ sink out of sight, and enters into a covenant of brotherhood upon the basis of a belief in a god, who is not "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," and therefore not the true God at all, any more than is the god the Mohammedan worships. The god of the lodges is said to be the God of the Bible, but it is a false claim. The god of the lodges is a counterfeit of the true God. There is a surface resemblance, as there is between the counterfeit and the genuine coin, but it does not go below the surface. The god of the lodges requires no shedding of blood, no atonement for sin, has provided no Saviour for sinners, and no Holy Spirit to transform the moral nature, but the devotees of this false god claim that their god requires nothing from his worshipers but what every one can provide for himself; or that his righteousness consists of nothing more than conformity to certain right rules of conduct.

True follower of Christ! follow him as he turns away from the lodge door! Go nowhere that Christ does not lead you; enter into fellowship with no company where Christ is not received. Let the refusal to admit your Master be the bar to your own entry. Be not deceived by a talk about fellowship with God. There is no fellowship with God apart from Christ. Only those have fellowship with God who can say: "Truly our fellowship is with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ."—Elder W. R. Young in Bible Banner.

THE THEATRE IN THE COLONIES.

[Edward Eggleston in the Century for July.]

In all communities where Puritanism or Quakerism was strong, the opposition to the theatre was very violent. To soften this hostility and maintain the liberty of playing, the actors gave benefits to many objects—to the poor of various cities, to a charity school, to buy an organ for a college chapel, to assist in building a hospital in New York, and to the Pennsylvania Hospital, the managers of which institution were roundly abused for accepting money from such a source. The actors pleaded their own cause in various prologues; they took a peculiar "benefit of clergy" once by reciting a prologue written for them by a clergyman, and again by acting a play written by a Scotch divine. On the return of the company to New York from the West Indies, in 1758, the opposition broke out in that city, which had been their northern stronghold, and it was only after a severe struggle that the manager succeeded in getting permission to play. Religious feeling had been wrought to a high tension in the middle of the eighteenth century by the labors of Whitefield, Edwards, Tennent, and other famous revivalists. Much of the opposition had its source in a puritanic aversion to amusements, but it was greatly re-enforced by the licentious freedom of some of the pieces relished by the play-goers of that time, a freedom that would be intolerable in any decorous place of amusement to-day. Nor did the loud dressing and irregular lives of some of the players help the standing of the drama with serious people who judged by other than artistic standards.

The managers adopted many ingenious devices for avoiding the legal impediments thrown in their way in several places. One ruse was to advertise a play as Douglass did in Newport, as "a series of moral dialogues in five parts," giving a syllabus of the good instruction to be got out of "Othello," for example. Another device was to announce the opening of a "Histrionic Academy."

The southern colonists were exceedingly fond of the theater, and of all kindred gayeties. Virginians of the highest standing, not content with seeing plays at the theater, and reading them for home amusement, organized amateur companies of their own. In South Carolina it was a sort of article of faith with the upper classes that town life should atone for the irksomeness of time spent "in the swamps." They not only welcomed the American company when it came, but they conducted a series of fashionable concerts, paying in 1773 a salary of fifty guineas the season to a French-horn player, and ten times as much for a first violinist.

The American theater had after a while to contend with a new and unlooked-for enemy. The movement in the colonies against the encroachments of the British Parliament involved an underlying movement toward democratic equality. Nearly all modern democratic movements, especially those of the eighteenth century, have been characterized by what may be called a political Puritanism—an overflow of the reforming spirit. It was this which made some of the French revolutionists so austere in matters of dress and food. In America the outburst against the stamp-act in 1765 brought the destruction, by a New York mob, of a theatre building. This curious logic of feeling was not confined to the vulgar. The patriot Josiah Quincy, though capable of enjoying and admiring Hallam's acting, yet declares that he would oppose the introduction of the theater in any State of which he was a citizen. When at length the revolutionary storm broke, the theatre was one of the first things to go down. The Articles of Association, by which the Continental Congress of 1774 sought to pledge the colonists to put themselves into a state of warlike self-denial, containing a promise to "discountenance and discourage" "all horse-racing, and all kinds of gaming, cock-fighting, exhibitions of shows, plays, and other expensive diversions and entertainments." Peyton Randolph, president of the Congress, wrote a letter to Douglass, the head of the American company, inclosing the resolution. If this had been law, a loop-hole might have been found; but the manager who should have disregarded the expressed wish of the Congress at this time would have looked the lightning in the face. The actors sailed for the West Indies, to return northward, like migratory birds of song, when storms should have blown over.

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

"It was at a big meeting over to the Forks. The Lord was there in power, and he showed himself to me—a hardened, profane, swearing rumseller. That's jest what I was, and do you wonder that I am never tired of telling about his goodness? that I only wish I had a hundred tongues instead of one to praise him with? Now the Bible says the Lord is everywhere beholding the evil and the good, but he don't show himself where men revile and hate him, nor it ain't reasonable he should. Why, he is in lots of places to-day where you might wait till you were as old as Methusalah and never catch a glimpse of the hem of his garment. A man may be standing at a bar or handling dirty cards and be converted. I don't say such a thing hain't never happened, but I do say there's a thousand times better chance of his being struck by lightning. There's one place where I never heard of a man's seeing the Lord—I don't believe the angel Gabriel ever did—and that's the lodge. Masons and Odd-fellows get converted sometimes, but it's always outside of their lodges. Now what's the reason? Why, the lodge hain't got no Jesus Christ in it. It's death to darkness to let in the light, and any lodge that should let him in wouldn't live an hour. It would be changed into a prayer meeting, and all the members would be singing, 'Glory, glory!' as loud as they could sing."

At this point a drunken Freemason made some attempt at interruption, but before the disturbance had time to spread, Captain Snyder—we will give him his Salvation Army title—said quietly, "We will sing it now," and signalling to the drummer the army pealed forth one of their most stirring choruses. The Salvationists have certainly this advantage, if their opponents can make noise they usually know how to make more. But so naturally was it done that the greater part of the audience really thought it only a part of the ordinary exercises. It was a kind of tactics, however, that proved very successful, the would-be disturbers not caring to strain their lungs in such an unequal contest.

Stephen saw through the ruse, and smiled to himself. Certainly he thought, "music hath charms to soothe the savage breast"—when there is enough of it.

"Maybe, now, you want to know what I went to that meeting for," the captain continued, wiping his forehead with a red cotton handkerchief. "I went to hear the preacher show up other folks' sins. I never dreamed he'd put his grappling hooks right into mine, fust thing. I knew my trade was a wrong one; I knew it was destroying my soul; and I had my times of feeling bad about it and promising myself—it was myself, not the Lord, mind ye—that I'd quit it jest as soon as I'd sold what stock I'd got on hand. But when that time come I was no more ready to quit it than the devil was to quit me. He'd stand at my elbow and say, 'Ain't Government in with you in this business, I want to know; and do you pretend to be any better'n Government?' Sometimes the devil speaks living truth. Rumsellers tempt men to drink; who tempts the rumseller? I'd like to ask some of our big men in Washington that question jest to see what they'd say. But the Lord had shet me up in too tight a place for even the devil to squeeze in and try to make me think I was better than I was. Some people say there ain't no sich place as hell. What do you think it is to be shet up where you can't see nothing but pictures of yourself—what you've been and what you are, the meanest, wickedest, most God-forsaken wretch that walks the earth—and know you've got to sit there and gaze, gaze, GAZE forever, and see no way out! What is it to see the faces of all the widows and orphans you've made rise up before you as cold and still as the face of the dead before a murderer; and all the men who have drank themselves into delirium tremens at your bar, like avenging fiends laughing horribly at your misery! Don't tell a man that's been in sich a place as that there's no hell. Oh, there is sich a thing as the bottomless pit! Don't believe the ministers dressed out in fine broadcloth, with gold rings on their fingers, who try to make you believe there ain't; but oh, every poor, wretched soul, living on in sin and despair, there's something else that's bottomless, and that God's love to you. And I've got jest the same right to tell you this that I have to tell you the other thing. A man that's seen the Lord knows what God's 'so loved the world' means. Nobody else can. It seemed to me then if I could be shet out of my misery one second it would be like the drop of water the rich man in hell prayed for to cool the tip of his tongue. There's a mighty sight of difference between feeling you're a sinner, and feeling you're a lost sinner. I jest give up. The Almighty had hold of me, and who can struggle with the Almighty? And jest as soon as I had done that the vision of my sins was gone, but right in the place where I had seemed to see 'em all pictured out, I see a cross, and One was hanging on it, and there was the nails in his feet and hands. I could see 'em jest as plain. And oh, how loving and pitiful he looked at me!—me, that had hated and reviled him all my days. There he was a dying for my sins. Why, I felt as though I'd be glad to go and be nailed on a cross beside him like the penitent thief if that would show how sorry I felt for 'em. How long do you think I held on to my rum kegs arter that? Oh, it is a look right into the face of Jesus Christ that makes the rumseller give up his bar, and the drunkard his cups, and the swearer his oaths. How quick every one of you sinners standing here would throw down your arms and surrender if you could once see the Lord! You may not be bad in your own sight or other folks'. You may not sell rum nor drink it; nor swear, nor cheat, nor gamble, but if you've never seen the Lord Jesus it is because some sin has stood in the way. You know what that sin is and the Lord knows. I don't. But oh, you poor sinner, throw away that weapon with which you are fighting the Lord! It is the spear you are thrusting into his side. When you look on him whom you have pierced it'll be turned against you. The Gospel trumpet is sounding for recruits; bimeby it'll sound for judgment. Come to the Lord and be saved. Come now."

He proceeded for some time in the same strain of earnest, homely eloquence. Stephen, after awhile, assisted by a chance word from some one in the crowd, had recognized Peter Snyder in the impassioned, ungrammatical preacher. But it scarcely made any difference in the effect of the message.

What did it mean—this strange troubling of the waters of his soul? Could it be that he had deceived himself? that he had never seen that glorious thorn-crowned Face? Or why did all his being go out in a strange yearning after that Vision of celestial loveliness? Why this bitter longing as for a treasure he had lost and never missed till now?

With drums beating and banners flying the Salvation Army marched back to their barracks to meet an impediment by the way in the shape of zealous policemen who arrested the leader and several of the musicians for obstructing public travel—a vigilance truly edifying in the light of the immunity enjoyed by other violaters of the law, who did not indeed parade the streets beating drums or singing hymns, but who ran illicit saloons unmolested under the very eyes of these watchful public guardians.

Stephen offered his services in their defense, feeling justly indignant at what he considered an outrage on equal rights by the authorities who freely allowed public parades of firemen, military companies, and secret societies of all descriptions, and of course brought upon himself anew the name among his fellow lawyers of being a legal Quixote, besides causing "the whirligig of time" to bring round some curious "revenges." The man he had prosecuted for selling rum he was now defending for preaching the Gospel!

Stephen did not at first analyze his feelings, or ask why the light of God's Spirit had been so wellnigh extinguished in his heart. But there is a saying of Pascal's in his Provincial Letters which applies equally well to that system of error embodied in the lodge, as proved by the revulsion of feeling with which a member after he has been converted or received a new consecration of the Spirit, invariably regards it: "There are two things in the truths of our religion—a divine beauty which renders them lovely and a holy majesty which makes them venerable; and there are two peculiarities in error—an impiety which renders them horrible, and an impertinence which makes them ridiculous." Stephen was not exactly like Little Faith, robbed by force of his jewel of heavenly hope. He was more like the simple savage, who exchanges his pearl for a glass bead. He knew that his religious affections had grown cold, that he had lost his relish for divine things, and when he found himself turning with a kind of horror from the thought of attending another Odd-fellow's meeting and associating with men of such diversified moral and religious creeds as there assembled; when he remembered the two contrasting visions that had besieged his sleepless pillow, he saw the reason why. What a "beauty" and "venerableness" in the simple ceremonials of the Christian church! and beside them how horrible and ridiculous seemed the masquerades of lodge initiations!

REV. LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG ON THE SECRET LODGE.

FREEMASONRY A TOOL OF SATAN.

Among the various stratagems of Satan in opposition to God and holiness, and for the purpose of destroying the souls of men, the institution of Speculative Freemasonry holds a pre-eminent rank. Whatever may have been the circumstances of its origin, and the modes of its primary existence, the following are undeniable facts: That the claims of Freemasonry are very extensive; that the long-boasted secrets of its nature are divulged to the world; and that the exposure has proved it to be a work of darkness. As long as Masonry could be kept concealed the world was unable, successfully, either to dispute its claims, or to oppose its interests. So deep laid, and strongly fortified by its own internal powers of concealment, was the institution of Freemasonry, that no earthly opponent could enervate its influence, derogate from its professed importance, or impede the progress of its usurpation. * * * But the light of Truth has been permitted to shine in the dark recess, and discover to the world the enormity of the Masonic institution. The diabolical enchantment is broken. The mask of disguise which concealed the turpitude of its nature, has been rent assunder; and the fact is notorious that Freemasonry has fallen before the truth, like the Philistine's Dagon before the Ark of the God of Israel. Like the fallen idol, its head and hands are broken off and dashed to atoms. Like those of Judas, its bowels are gushed out; and instead of being the mystical wonder of the world, it has become the contempt of the enlightened public: an object of the special abhorence of many of its once deluded votaries who have renounced it; and every class of community may possess the means of information, become acquainted with its nature and tendency, and judge for themselves whether it is good or bad.

REJECTION OF CHRIST.

Jesus, the Lamb of God, once despised, rejected and slain by the pretended Jewish builders of the Church of God—Jesus, who humbled himself unto death, and was exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, the head of the corner, the Foundation of the Church of God, the name which angels adore, and which is precious to all the saints on earth and in heaven, finds no place in the Masonic temple. The institution of Freemasonry acknowledges no human depravity which needs a Saviour's atonement, and records neither the sufferings nor the triumphant glories of the Saviour of men. Like the inn of Bethlehem, which afforded no room nor accommodation for his birth. Masonry prefers the keystone of an arch, professedly wrought in the forest of Lebanon, and inscribed with Masonic initials, signifying "Hiram, Tyrian, Widow's Son, Sent to King Solomon."

MASONIC TESTIMONY ON MORGAN.

The testimony to prove, identically, the circumstances of his last struggles, such as the time when, the place where, the manner how, and the person or persons by whom William Morgan was put to death together with all who were accessory to his death depends entirely on Masons. They are bound by oath paramount, in their estimation, to that of the civil law, to keep the whole matter a secret forever. Hence, when called upon to testify on the case, they have declared that they knew nothing about it, or they have obstinately refused to give testimony, and suffered the penalty of two hundred and fifty dollars fine, and from one to three months imprisonment, rather than testify to the truth and expose the enormity of Masonry, as was the well known case of Orasmus Turner, Eli Bruce and John Whitney, in the late trials at the West. But why would not these men testify on a case, the circumstances of which they well knew? Let Orasmus Turner answer for them all: "It will have a tendency to render me infamous or disgraced. It will furnish evidence against me in an indictment for murder."

THE MRS. MONROE BUSINESS.

On any other principle than artifice to conceal Masonic crime, who can account for the facts, that a Mrs. Monroe, from Canada, should journey into the State of New York in quest of the dead body of her husband, with witnesses to prove the claim, and after finding the body which had been so clearly proved to be the dead body of William Morgan, by incontestible marks, should lay claim to the same body, and prove the claim by the color and texture of the clothing only; yet to the full satisfaction of Masons far and near. And on any other principle than device to conceal Masonic crime, which Masons are sworn to do, who can account for the bountiful Masonic reward of fifty dollars, which has been publicly declared without confutation, was given to Mrs. Monroe, by a Mason at the West, with whom had been deposited a large donation from Jerusalem Chapter, in the city of New York, together with sums of money from other Masonic bodies, for the relief of the western sufferers, in consequence of the Morgan abduction? All the apparent mystery which veils any part of this subject, from the most obvious light of truth, is explained in a single sentence: THE WORKS OF DARKNESS ARE ALWAYS EMPLOYED TO CONCEAL THE WORKS OF DARKNESS.

HOW WOULD IT LOOK FOR PRESBYTERIANS?

If Morgan and Miller had been executed privately, by Elders of Presbyterian churches, for cheating their ministers out of the salary which they had promised, and the facts had afterwards been disclosed and sworn to by some of these revolting Elders who witnessed the scene, and confessed that they were under oath to keep the transaction a secret forever, but conscience goaded them to a public disclosure, the circumstances of which was corroborated beyond a reasonable doubt; how long a time would it have required to spread every item of the horrid transaction before the American public and the world, till not a man, woman, nor child, that could read or understand, would be found ignorant of the facts? None would have been uninterested. The story would have been published in every paper; told in every house; and condemned as a deed of darkness by the whole community.

MASONIC ARROGANCE.

As the finishing stroke and topmost point of all its superlative arrogations, Masonry claims an indissoluble affinity to Christianity. It professedly combines the hope of the Christian and that of the Mason, to one common center. Its aim is to inspire the belief, that heaven itself is the superlative Grand Lodge of Perfection; that God is the Great Grand Master Mason of the Universe; that Christianity and Masonry united, will prepare mankind for the eternal celebrations of the upper Grand Lodge; and that all who are thus prepared, will be honored with the chief seats, and be entitled to wear the most precious jewels of the heavenly temple; where the never-ending employment will be to labor with imperishable Masonic implements, and participate the sublime refreshments of an eternal meeting in the "SANCTUM SANCTORUM." Such anticipations, doubtless, have made thousands of Masonic Christians; inspired them with hope high as the throne of God; and filled them with expectations of future happiness, as expansive as the universe, while not a mallet was lifted, nor a stroke employed, nor a step taken, nor a prayer offered, nor a desire raised to the throne of Mercy, for that purity of heart, that holiness of life, and that good hope through the grace of the Saviour, which alone can secure the blessings of a glorious immortality.

WHY MADE A MASON.

Should the question be asked me, why I permitted myself to take twenty one degrees of Masonry before I renounced it, I could only answer, that such is the indescribable power of Masonic infatuation that one step into darkness prepares for another, and onward many press, as I foolishly did, in search for light, and science, and knowledge and wonders, till Satan, the old infernal spider, has wound the web of Masonic oaths and penalties, five, ten, fifteen, yes, twenty times and upwards, round them, binding them by the penalty of death, to continue all their life-time, in the fellowship and practice of the works of darkness. How deplorable would have been the condition of Masonic ministers, and all the Masonic members of Christian churches, thus entangled, had there been no method devised, by which they might lawfully escape the snare of the adversary, and obey the commandments of God!

HOW THE GOVERNMENT MAY BE OVERTHROWN.

After all this preparation, suppose a plot had been formed to overthrow our dear bought Republican Government; to erect a throne in this western world, and place on it a grand, sublime, royal, ten times tnrice illustrious, and absolutely sovereign Masonic king. Suppose the "Thirteenth day of the month Adar" has been selected to blow the trumpet in Washington, and proclaim "God save the Masonic king," while all the members of the grand and subordinate lodges, chapters and encampments in the Union, having been notified by posts to prepare themselves on the day appointed, were well harnessed with sword, shield, and buckler, and commissioned to kill slay and utterly destroy all who would not respond to the sound of the national trumpet, "God save the Masonic king." To defray the expenses of all necessary force of arms, in securing the triumph of a coronation, and unconditional submission to his sovereign Masonic Majesty, suppose the grasp had been made on the vaults of the numerous banks, and money offered in exuberance to all who would enter the field in support of the revolution; under such circumstances, what would have prevented the total overthrow of our national government, and the establishment of an absolute Masonic monarchy? If the government of France was revolutionized in three days, might not the government of these United States have been changed to monarchy in one day, by the mystic power of Masonic strategem? Nothing could have prevented such a revolution, but the interposition of that Divine Providence which has broken asunder the strongly fortified enchantments of Freemasonry, and exposed its works of darkness to the world. The God of Israel has interposed. Glory be to his name; the Lord of Hosts has hitherto prevented our national ruin.

REFORM NEWS.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

ONTARIO, July 13th, 1885.

I spoke twice yesterday in the United Presbyterian church here, and my past indebtedness has been augmented by renewed kindness and a contribution in aid of the N. C. A. work. The house of Elder John Finney was my home where every attention was given to my personal comfort and I leave not only with a grateful appreciation of many favors received, but with an inspiration to renewed effort. Father Finney has passed the eighty-fourth mile-post on the way, and his sun is far down the western slope; but with him it is "light at evening time."

Some I miss, who since my last visit have been gathered by the "reaper", and among the most active and best known was our esteemed brother, Elder Joseph Roe, who fell asleep after a brief illness, January 24th, last. His last moments were tranquil and his life work closed in peace. His widow and the four unmarried children occupying the "old homestead" made me most welcome, and after a restful night I started on my pilgrim way feeling how meager and worthless are the "paid benefits" of the lodge compared with such spontaneous and genuine Christian hospitality.

On Saturday I had hoped to meet Bro. James Auten, but he was away at work on the new farm he has recently purchased. I was partially compensated for a six-mile tramp in the hot sun by meeting sister Obern and also father Biddle, who feels a deep concern and great solicitude for the future of his beloved Zion. Like Dr. Davis he was present when the constitution and confession of faith was adopted fifty-six years ago, and looks upon the effort now in progress to remove the "old landmarks" as ominous of evil to the cause af Christ.

Just before entering the desk on Sabbath morning Bro Auten appeared on the scene, having walked eight miles to see his old friend and join in the services of the sanctuary. It is a feat worth recording for a man eighty-four years and three months on the way. He seemed a little weary but soon regained his accustomed vigor and remained over night sharing with me the hospitality of good Bro. Finney. He is strong in the faith that he shall live to see the twin curse of secrecy and rum swept from the earth, and is resolved to do his full share in taking up the stumbling-stones and preparing the way for Christ's coming. In his room is hung a certificate of life-membership in the N. C. A. and under it is written the following:

"I, James Auten, commenced to work for God for life, January 10th, 1870, desiring to have him rule in and reign over me forever."

Fifteen years on this line has not resulted in recantation or the slightest abatement in zeal for the Master's cause.

MANSFIELD.—I have heard it said that restriction on the liquor traffic promotes drinking rather than diminishes the use of intoxicants. I have not gathered statistics on this point, but my observations of free whiskey since coming to this State, have convinced me that the exact opposite is true. During last week I took observations in Mansfield, Gallion, Dayton and Xenia, with impressions decidedly unfavorable to free liquor. Having to wait at Xenia a few hours for a train to Cedarville and remembering that the "Commercial" was a respectable hotel when I spent a few days in that city seven years ago, I went with Bro. Travis to obtain accommodation and dinner at the "old stand." We found it a miserable "rum-hole," unfit to stop in and undeserving the patronage of any decent person. Inquiry failed to give us knowledge of any temperance hotel and we returned to the depot restaurant for dinner. While luncheing with Bro. Travis I noticed a man step up and lay a dime on the counter which brought out a glass and decanter in response. Pouring out half a tumbler or so the man drank it off, washed it down with a glass of ice water, wiped his mouth and turned away. As the waiter seemed to be the head of the force I beckoned him to come where I was and leaning forward quietly asked: "Do you think you gave that man the worth of his money?" He seemed a little confused but finally said, "He must judge of that." I then explained to him why we had left the "Commercial" and came to his counter thinking we were thereby avoiding an unwilling support of the "accursed traffic." He assured me that we was opposed to the business but said the R. R. companies required him to keep it. I asked if he thought there was less liquor used under the present than the former arrangement, to which he replied, "It is about the same; for men who want it will get it some way." "But," said he, "we sell to sick persons who need it, not to drunkards, minors," etc. Haste to reach the train prevented further inquiries, but I should like to know if these R. R. officials encourage their employes to patronize their bar, especially when the running of trains is peculiarly difficult and hazardous. If it is good for the traveling public why not for the men who run the engines and are entrusted with the care of the company's property and the safety of their patrons? If it was known that any road encouraged drinking habits among its employes the general public would give that road as wide a berth as possible, because the universal verdict is that drink unfits a man to occupy any responsible position.

The most incredulous cannot doubt that the temperance issue is nearing a crisis in Ohio. The deluge of rum flooding this State is hastening on the triumph of prohibition. The Springfield meeting struck an ominous note of warning and the liquor minions scent a battle at hand. And, by the way, President Thompson is authority for saying that Dr. Leonard, Prohibition nominee for Governor, is not and never has been a Freemason, though the evidence that he has never seen the inside of Odd-fellowship is not so conclusive. I am informed on undoubted authority that leading delegates in the convention refused to make the nomination unanimous until they knew his position on the lodge question. This is a hopeful omen and portends a healthy change in public sentiment on the subject. J. P. STODDARD.

MINNESOTA.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Per advice, I am now having a vacation for a month, after which I hope to be in the Minnesota field again.

Since I have been in the work in that State, I find one serious difficulty in lecturing in new places where there are no friends of our reform, or at least not known to be, and that is, lack of funds to hire a hall where churches cannot be obtained. I suggest to the friends of reform in Minnesota, that a contingent fund be raised for that purpose, and that funds be contributed and forwarded to Bro. William H. Morrill, St. Charles, our treasurer. There are important cities in the State which can be reached only in that way. It is difficult to go into such places to let in the light, and nothing in one's hand to do it with. To those who are able and willing to contribute, no further argument is necessary; it is a plain case.

I also request that where work is desired that communications be addressed to Prof. E. G. Paine, Wasioja. J. P. RICHARDS, State Lecturer.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM BRO. EDWARD MATHEWS.

DETRIOT, Mich., July 17, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I thank you for having published my article so promptly. I have not read it, but on the street here last evening was congratulated by one of your readers, and so know whereof I affirm. I leave for Au Sauble, Mich., to-morrow, where I rest for a few days at the home of my counsel, Mr. C. R. Henry, a Republican State Senator. God is helping me, I know. I am making ready my arrows and filling my quiver so that in the near future I can again bend the bow of anti-secret truth and get through the joints of the harness of the Abiffites. Pray for me.

This is a cruel persecution, and I feel like leaping for joy. Should I get behind the bars it will be because of the obstinacy of the court in refusing a fine. Your prayers are being answered. Praise the Lord! Present my case, if you have not, to the daily prayer meeting as well as through the columns of the Cynosure.

The first fuss was caused by an exhortation on Saturday, the 4th of July. The substance is as follows: The word sulking, as commonly used here in America, expresses the same idea as the word pouting I used to hear in my boyhood in England. The mother or guardian would say to the child who refused to take meals, "Don't stand pouting there but come and eat." There is a great deal of pouting going on just now in the secular press and elsewhere. The Grand Encampment of the G. A. R. closed in Maine a few days ago, and during its sessions the nabobs had their feelings badly hurt, for they were informed the liquors consigned them would be seized unless the orders were countermanded. The Maine Law triumphed. Logan and the Grand Encampment are pouting. Salvation is the remedy for generals and privates, and I know of no other.

The disturber of our meetings is a uniformed G. A. R. He also sports the emblems of the Mystic Tie. God is for us. He is more than all that can be against us. I want to provide ahead for the worst, and am now ready to give lectures anywhere in the U. S. of America. Let us hear from you.

E. MATHEWS.

BRO. DISSETTE AT HOME.

SABETHA, Kan., July 1, 1885.

DEAR BROTHER:—I arrived here safely and found my family well and reinforced by the appearance of a young lady who vociferously claims the right to stand up and be counted with the rest of our little folks.

"On my way from the depot I passed the G. A. R. hall. Its doors were wide open; on the steps in its front were the Worshipful Master, Senior and Junior Wardens. As I passed, and being personally acquainted with them, I exclaimed, "Is it possible that the antipodes have met? Is not that old thing (Masonic lodge) dead yet?" The W. M. replied with a sardonic grin, "No it's not dead yet, and it will take a good many such fellows as you to kill it."

By this time I could take in the entire group, and there was not a citizen in the entire company who pays taxes on twelve inches of real estate. Recognizing this state of things I replied, "The tail never dies until the sun is down. I have returned to preach its funeral sermon, but cannot say of it 'Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord.'" This proved too much for them and they gave way in a genuine good humored laugh.

To-day a member of a secret order told me that the above gathering of the remnants of the old Sabetha lodge was an effort at a revival in Masonry here by means of a picnic; that signs of rain had driven them from the grove into the hall where they were waiting for the female portion of the party to set the eatables out for their refreshment, when I passed and the above occurred. I remarked to him that it was surprising to me that enough interest could be awakened in Masonry in this city to get any kind of a crowd together in view of all the reform work done here. He replied, "It does not astonish me at all. The dinner would draw the crowd without Masonry." True: and Masonry could not draw the crowd without the "dinner."

There is an interest manifested of a general character to have me preach on the street in this place on this reform before returning to Illinois. Rev. J. Thompson has kept the two papers published here well supplied with healthful reform sentiment, forcibly expressed. Nearly three years have elapsed since I stated in a fellowship meeting, in the M. E. church in this city, that, from a careful and prayerful investigation of the landmarks of Freemasonry—especially the twenty-first—I had reached the conclusion that Freemasonry was hatched in hell and begotten by the devil. The leader of that meeting advanced toward me, shook his fist in my face, and said, "I've been a Mason for forty years and never saw anything wrong in it yet! You mark my words! You'll regret it! You'll rue it!"

I reminded him then, of the wandering of the children of Israel in the wilderness for exactly the same period because of their rebellion against God and their unbelief. When I was starting to Illinois upwards of three months ago to engage in the active work of this reform, this very individual said to me, "Well, I believe you're right. Go on. God bless you." Since my return he has expressed his anxiety to hear me preach on this subject. I state the above case as an illustration of the influence of "light on Masonry" as reflected by this reform. This man now sees "men as trees walking;" another act of faith on his part and he will realize that Christ is giving him light. GEO. T. DISSETTE.

BETTER THAN A LECTURE.

What is better than a lecture? I answer that a full-fledged Masonic or G. A. R. burial. These worse-than-heathen ceremonies are convincing people of the real character of the secret lodge power who would not be convinced by an Anti-masonic lecture. Let secretists spread their tails. They can't hide the fact that they are forked. Only last week we had such a burial in our little village that occasioned a feeling of disgust and much criticism.

The G. A. R. lodge men recently, with great pomp and expense, (hiring an extra train,) buried one of their number, said to be a worthless loafer. After burial firing their guns across the grave. A sister of the deceased, a silly, immoral and worthless woman, thought it was very grand to have so much noise made over her dead brother. Let them exhibit all they have—the more the better—and it won't be long till they will have destroyed themselves, for the mass of the people seem to love the right. L. D. B.

AN OLD CANADIAN REMEMBERS HOW MORGAN'S KIDNAPPERS DIED.

GALT, ONT.

A correspondent of the Toronto Globe, at St. Catherine's writes: "A gentleman in this city, who has read Thurlow Weed's statement regarding the disappearance of Morgan, says, that when he was a boy he well remembers much of the excitement caused. He says the men who kidnapped Morgan tried to get the following Canadian Masons to bring him into Canada and take charge of him: Colonel Clinch, Dr. Muirhead, Edward McBride, John Brant (the Indian chief), Judge Edwards and others whose names he cannot remember. They declined to have anything to do with the matter, and some of them never went back to lodge meeting again. Our informant likewise states that those who are reported to have kidnapped Morgan all came to violent deaths with one exception, as below: Col. King of Niagara county, N. Y., fell dead in a bar-room; Whitney of Rochester, died a miserable death; Howard of New York, was drowned in Buffalo Creek; Adams, one of the leaders, was drowned in Niagara river; Garside of Niagara, fell from his horse and broke his neck; Col. Jewett died in Lockport, his last years being very miserable, being unable to sit still. The only one who lived out his days was Mr. Chubbuck, who died a natural death at Lewiston not long ago."

I read the above to an old resident of Galt from Scotland, originally a Freemason, but who never entered a lodge since coming to this side of the Atlantic. He had resided at Caledonia, N. Y., about the time of the Morgan abduction and on hearing the above read said, "I could endorse the whole of the above on oath if required. It is all true to my personal knowledge." J. D.

ADVICE TO SOME MINISTERS.

We find in our general mission work a peculiar, unaccountable class of ministers, who say many strange things; will give a few samples with advice free!

Some ministers ask—"What will be the benefit to the nation of having the name of God in the Constitution of the United States?" You poor blind watchman, one word of advice may do you good. Get acquainted with God, and be at peace with him, then you will find the great advantages of having such a companion in the nation, as well as for individuals.

This same class of men cannot see any good in national prohibition! Oh, no! Why? Let me tell them why. It shall cost them nothing. What you want is to get beside the fence, or in some ditch with some poor drunkard (see Matt. 15: 14), and as Jesus passes by, call for mercy, "that your eyes may be open." Then you will not feel the "Woe upon you" as blind guides. Matt. 23: 16. You want your eyes opened. In looking over the dead and wounded as they fall at the hands of the rum fiend, who but blind men can help saying, "This thing must stop?" Yours for truth. R. SMITH.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS.

LESSON V, Aug. 2.—Elijah meeting Ahab.—1 Kings 18: 1-18.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord, and thou hast followed Baalim. 1 Kings 18: 18.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. In times of apostasy and persecution God always saves for himself a remnant. vs. 1–6. As there were saints in Cæsar's household, so we find one in Ahab's, and occupying no subordinate position but the very highest in point of trust and confidence—that of the royal steward. Obadiah could hardly have been a public worshiper of Jehovah and kept his office and his life so near the cruel and idolatrous Jezebel, yet we see him at the risk of both hiding a hundred prophets from her murderous rage. He had faith and courage or Elijah would not have made him the messenger to announce his coming to the furious king. The prophets whom he hid, like the ancient Covenanters, had doubtless their secret gathering places in caves and mountain fastnesses, where the hunted but faithful few among the Israelites, the seven thousand who had not bowed the knee to Baal, could assemble unseen by their enemies, and hear their ancient law read and expounded. Thus the holy fire was kept alive. Obadiah in this evil time did good service for the church and state which he could not have accomplished had he been possessed with the fiery, impetuous spirit of Elijah. Reformers are of two classes, those who favor reform secretly, and those who by their open, bold aggressive front invite persecution and even martyrdom. God has use for both—the Obadiahs as well as the Elijahs.

2. In any character the touchstone is faith—faith to do what God commands in the face of seeming danger. vs. 7–16. "Go, tell thy lord, behold Elijah is here." On Obadiah's ears the command must have fallen like a thunderbolt. He was evidently not ambitious for martyrdom—a lover of the truth but not to the extent of being eager to witness for it with his life. Yet he goes on the perilous errand and thus proves the genuineness of his faith. One Christian cannot boast over another. It was no harder for Elijah to show himself to the king who could command him to instant death, than for Obadiah to bear the message. Their differences of character equalized the test.

3. Sin the real troubler of nations. vs. 17, 18. Opposers of popular evils never escape the accusation of "troubling Israel." Prohibitionists are so accused by liquor politicians, who forget that the murders, suicides, pauperism and other distress among the laboring class, culminating so often in bloody riots, are caused—at least nine-tenths of it—by the drink traffic. They who support for political purposes this giant iniquity are playing the part of Ahab, and the nation will yet recognize them as the true troublers of its peace. Secret false worships are undermining the faith of the people, corrupting national morals and preparing the way for future war and bloodshed; and every one accused of being an agitator and causing strife and division by his or her stand on this question can retort in the very words of Elijah: "I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandment of the Lord; and thou hast followed Baalim."

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

What New Testament characters does Obadiah resemble? John 19: 38; 3: 2; 7: 50. Does God in testing us always make allowances for our peculiar weaknesses? 1 Cor. 10: 13. Will God ever forget a service we do his saints? Heb. 6: 10; Matt. 10: 41.

"The word of the Lord came to Elijah in the third year." Not the third year from the commencement of the drought, but the third year of his sojourn with the widow. The whole period of the drought was three years and a half (Luke 4: 25; Jam. 5: 17); of this, probably about one year was passed by Elijah in the torrent course of Cherith, which without fresh rains must have dried up in that space, and two years and a half at Sarepta.—Cook.

"Go, shew thyself unto Ahab." But let no one suppose that our Lord ever expects what is above human nature from any of his children, without imparting at the same time sufficient grace and strength for the purpose. He leads none of his children into the valley of the shadow of death without becoming to them their rod and staff. Thus Elijah, on this arduous path of faith, was supported by the promise, "I will send rain upon the earth." He could depart from Zarephath as a messenger of joy, and carry a blessing with him; he could be cheered by the assurance of his commission to announce the return of rain, and by the hope that many would at length give up their hateful idolatry and humble themselves before the God of their fathers.—Krummacher.

THE MORAL EFFECTS OF THE FAMINE.—(1) It would lead the people to distrust Baal. He the source of life, was unable to supply their wants when Jehovah forbade the rain and dew to come. (2) It would make them realize their sin in departing from God. They would here read such places in their Bible as Deut. 28. There is nothing like the terrible results of sin to make men feel the evil of sin. (3). It would lead the people, therefore, to a repentant and humble state of mind. (4) It would enable Ahab to resist the influence of Jezebel for a time, so that he would no longer persecute God's people. (5) It would lead the people to seek some remedy. Some would seek help from nature, as Ahab did. Some would call upon God. The minds of all were being prepared for a return to true religion.—Pel.

"Now Obadiah feared the Lord greatly." It is quite probable that it was because of his religion that he occupied this post of trust. Ahab could depend on his fidelity and conscientiousness.—Pulpit Com. Obadiah was religious (1) in time of general declension. He went against wind and tide. (2) In a very difficult place, the very center of idolatry, a frivolous, idolatrous, licentious court. (3) He was very religious. Only a man of strong religious convictions could maintain his religion under such circumstances. But the very difficulties made a strong man stronger, and a good man better.

"Prophets of the Lord." Not men endowed with the extraordinary gifts of the prophetic office, but who were devoted to the service of God, preaching, praying, teaching, etc. (1 Sam. 10: 10).—J., F. and B.

"An hundred prophets." That we find so large a number still in the land, notwithstanding the exodus (2 Chron. 11: 16), and the steady growth of impiety shows that God had not left himself without witnesses.—Spence.

"As Obadiah was in the way." Northwest from Jezreel; probably on the slopes of the Carmel range, along which Elijah would come from Zarephath. Obadiah's meeting Elijah was a divine leading for the strengthening of the one and the proving of the other. That Elijah, journeying on his weary way, should meet the very man who was the only true friend of the prophet at the court, was no more accidental than that Obadiah, going forth in search of provender for the cattle, should find the man who was to test severely his faith and his fear of God.—Lange.

"What have I sinned?" Even those who fear the Lord, and walk by faith, are sometimes in the hour of peril overcome by an agony of fear, which bows them down as reeds before a whirlwind. Peter, who first threatened with the sword, became suddenly terror-stricken before a damsel. It is good for us to recognize our human weakness, for this knowledge preserves us from over-security, and leads us to pray: Lord, strengthen our faith.—Lange.

"Art thou he?" Ahab hopes to abash the Tishbite, and expects perhaps to have him at his feet suing for pardon. He is found at last; he is in his power; surely he trembles at the punishment in store for him; and one strong, stern speech will bring him on his knees before his incensed master. So he accuses him of "troubling Israel."—Cook. He had no word to say of his own sin; he forgot the iniquity of the people of the land, in which he had been the leader; he took no note of the hand of Jehovah in the calamity, and spoke as if the whole matter had been a mere personal difference between him and Elijah. He cast the entire blame of it upon the prophet; much as if one suffering under a painful disease should blame the doctor for producing it, because, knowing the habits of the patient he had predicted that it would come.—Taylor.

STOP MY PAPER.

1. Selfishness said—Do it. You will save by it and be the richer.

2. Economy said—Do it. Your expenses are large. You must take in sail somewhere, and here is a good place to begin.

But I had other advisors and told the above named to be quiet, while I heard others.

1. Intelligence said—In fifty issues of the paper, during the year, you will have every variety of food for your intellect, science, art, commerce, agriculture, manufacturics, learning old and new, history, geography, biography, etc., will spread a very respectable portion of their stores before you, and you cannot but be wiser before the year ends.

2. And Benevolence said—You are not any too large hearted now, and if anything can melt the ice of selfishness, and expand the heart with true and fervent good-will to men, it will be such a picture of the world's sins, wants and miseries as, during twelve months, it will lay before you.

3. And Spiritual Wisdom said—There is scarcely any better Commentary on the Bible than a good religious periodical. Ten thousand bees will bring forth the honey. Prophecies are rapidly being fulfilled, divine promises are being performed, Bible doctrines confirmed, providences, illustrating the Sacred Record, constantly occurring, missionary operation in all lands successful, etc.; all these bright clouds will sail over your horizon, so that in fifty weeks, you will get fifty times that number of the lessons of that wisdom that cometh from above.

4. Personal Piety said—A higher type of the Christian life should be the history of the year; and you cannot get anywhere, save from the Bible, more varied and pressing and affecting appeals for the higher life of the soul than are contained in the weekly sheets of a good religious periodical.

5. Conscience here appeared, and gave Selfishness a frown that caused a hasty exit of that personage, and bade Economy be wiser in council next time, sustaining all the above appeals in behalf of the cause they plead, and making me feel that I must do something for Jesus and for my own spiritual wants, so I will go out among my neighbors and persuade at least five of them to send with me for the Cynosure for a year. I have the conviction upon me that the editor needs just such endorsements from me. With a list of 10,000 names he can devote all his precious time to the editing of the paper. Therefore to withhold my support would be to hinder the Gospel of Christ which is so dear to my heart. What? Stop my paper? No! Never! As a good brother said the other day, I will sooner live on two meals a day.—Adapted from Zion's Watchman.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile hands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships inveuted by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following. as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our governmeut, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.

4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.

5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited hy law.

6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.

7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.

8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.

9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.

10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.

11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.

14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.

15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

THE CHURCHES VS. LODGERY.

The following denominations are committed by vote of their legislative assemblies or by constitution to a separation from secret lodge worship:

Adventists (Seventh-day.)

Baptists—Primitive, Seventh-day and Scandinavian.

Brethren (Dunkers or German Baptists.)

Christian Reformed Church.

Church of God (Northern Indiana Eldership.)

Congregational—The State Associations of Illinois and Iowa have adopted resolutions against the lodge.

Disciples (in part.)

Friends.

Lutherans—Norwegian, Danish, Swedish and Synodical Conferences.

Mennonites.

Methodists—Free and Wesleyan.

Methodist Protestant (Minnesota Conference.)

Moravians.

Plymouth Brethren.

Presbyterian—Associate, Reformed and United.

Reformed Church (Holland Branch.)

United Brethren in Christ.

Individual churches in some of these denominations should be excepted, in part of them even a considerable portion.

The following local churches have, as a pledge to disfellowship and oppose lodge worship, given their names to the following list as

THE ASSOCIATED CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

New Ruhamah Cong. Hamilton, Miss.
Pleasant Ridge Cong. Sandford Co. Ala.
New Hope Methodist, Lowndes Co., Miss.
Congregational, College Springs, Iowa.
College Church of Christ, Wheaton, Ill.
First Congregational, Leland, Mich.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JULY 23, 1885.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

NIAGARA FALLS, July 9th, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—It is now but three years short of half a century since, with my young wife, I came to view these Falls. My wedding day has not left a clearer, more distinct impression on my memory than the sight of this cataract and the sound of its roar, seen and heard forty-seven years ago. When yesterday, the Michigan Central halted five minutes on the Canada bluff "to see the Falls," it seemed to me that half a century had dwarfed Niagara and diminished its thunders. Is it because the world has grown large and its wonders small? or is it because > "I am not what I have been and my visions flit > Less palpably before me?"

Or is there truth in the guesses of scientists, some of whom have constructed a register by which they claim proximately to know how fast the waters wear away the rock, and how long it will take to empty the shallow Lake Erie by sinking the river bed, and making a new State out of the lake bottom?

Certain it is that Table Rock is fallen, and the huge black boulders, the debris of the cataract, are climbing up higher every year toward Goat Island at the top; which seems to one's fancy, to be growing giddy and waiting its turn to plunge down into the abyss,

> "The hell of waters, where they howl and hiss
> And boil in endless torture, while the sweat
> Of their great agony wrung out from this
> Their phlegethon curls round the rocks of jet
> Which gird the gulf around in pitiless horror set."

And as one stands on the high Canada bluff and looks down on the water-shed above the Falls, the roof of white caps seems steeper and more foamy and wrathful than they did forty-seven years ago; as if the wall where the water takes its final leap had indeed sunk down some feet, making the rapids above more rapid than they were. But the treasurer of New York State has this week been buying up properties on the American side to make a magnificent State park, and it may be the deeds contain a guarantee that the Falls shall not disappear, though a small earthquake, of which there are many, might defeat the whole transaction by opening a crevice and letting the deluge sweep the rocky barrier into the myrtle green waters below, where the channel is 180 feet deep, and thus wipe out this seventh wonder of the world.

A traveling companion who stops here at the Falls, has given us vivid word pictures of other world wonders, beside Niagara. Born in Harrison county, he has traveled the world over; stood on the rims of volcano-craters in Hawaii and at Vesuvius; and it has been half as good as a journey through Spain and Italy to hear the man talk.

He had just come from the Sandwich Islands. "Their volcano crater," says he, "is shaped like a huge wash-basin, several miles around, with a huge pot of black pudding boiling at the bottom. This mass of stone pudding cools, sinks, and crusts over, and then rises, breaks up its crusts, melts the fragments over, till the time of eruption comes, when the crater boils over and runs down toward or even into the sea." "Vesuvius," said he, "is different. Once in forty-two seconds, regularly by the watch, it sends up jets of red-hot lava, high into the air, showing like fire-rockets. Then forty-two seconds of blackness again, and so it keeps alternating.

Our portly friend wore a Knight Templar's badge, which he said a friend gave him. He had no other church-connection but the Masonic, but said if he did as well as he could, that that was enough.

We took a half-hour's sail on The Maid of the Mist over the writhing waters, through wind-sprays and rainbows below the Falls. Then off for Saratoga.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, July 15, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—To-day I learn the State Park at Niagara is dedicated to the people. The papers will give such particulars as I should write. It is to be dedicated to THE PEOPLE. Mankind have been cursed by their rulers, chosen to get rid of God. He has given them "kings in his anger and taken them away in his wrath." Now we are to be ruled by skeptical law makers through our legislatures.

Three bodies have met and are meeting here at Saratoga, viz., the New York State Teachers' Association, the National Educational Counell of fifty-one members, and last night the National Educational Association, which includes all educators who will pay two dollars a year.

These meetings are managed and made up by men of a decidedly superior stamp, and one gains a thorough belief in the practical utility of the organizations. But one cannot help seeing at every turn that there is a strong tide in them setting toward secularism and infidelity. This trend crops out in essays, speeches, and the loud and warm applause given by a portion of the crowd when a speaker like Dr. Hall, of Johns Hopkins University of Baltimore, has the platform.

This Dr. Hall defiantly declared that moral education must be based on the condition of the brain; that good morals are impossible, allied to a bad condition of the physical system. He cited Herbert Spencer's bald materialism with approbation, and sneered at one of the speakers the evening before, as "dull" and "stupid," when it was manifest to all, that the religion of the piece was what excited his contempt. Prof. Stearne, of Wisconsin University, who preceded Hall, was little better. He claimed moral education "through recognition of the moral order of the Universe," was entitled to be considered "secular;" and he gave the audience, through the chairman, a printed abstract of his speech on "Moral Education," in which even the name of God did not appear.

Dr. E. E. White, late of Perdue University, Indiana, gave a beautiful reply to this materialism; though even he spoke sotto voce, as realizing that he was speaking to men paid by legislatures, where infidels denounce the Lord's Prayer and Ten Commandments as "sectarian." "I would as soon," said Dr. White, "shut out the light of the sun from a conservatory, and undertake to raise flowers by artificial light, as to teach morals without a higher than human sanction. How is a man to teach a child reverence and veneration, who has none himself?" The crowd, some dozens of skeptics excepted, warmly applauded Dr. White.

The National Council of Education whose sittings are closed, was suggested in July, 1878, and the proposition was endorsed by prominent educators in Nebraska, in Washington, D. C., by Pres. Shaw of Syracuse, N. Y., and Pres. Brooks of Pennsylvania. It was organized in July, 1880, and is thus five years old. It will not live long. If it should meekly advocate putting up the Ten Commanments, as a moral standard, or the Lord's Prayer for the children in schools, a clamor would at once be raised by haters of God and Christ, which would be quieted by nothing but by giving infidelity the control of the schools which Christian taxes support.

Even the able and excellent Dr. Mowry, of Boston, prefaced his good report on academies, by saying "We are an educational body and have nothing to do with religion!" The skeptics' hope is, that the high schools will exterminate classical academies, and that the Bible and religion will be driven from the high schools; leaving them without standard of law or morals, like stores of goods without a standard of money, measure, or weight.

The lodges are looking from their secret burrows on children in schools, as wolves look on lambs in their folds, or, rather, as on antelopes which pass their dens on their way to the springs to drink! A pious professor of forty years standing in a New England city, who was an active boy when Morgan was murdered, asked the writer: "Do you not think Morgan's story was a myth?" His State legislature had suppressed Masonic oaths during the Morgan discussion; and those oaths were published in John Quincy Adams's book, as certified and given up by the Grand Lodge officers of his State! And yet this learned professor and good man asks if "Morgan's story was a myth?"

But the truth of God is "marching on." Pres. C. A. Blanchard and myself preached in the Congregational and Free Methodist churches here, attending love-feast and communion, and attentive and intelligent congregations received our testimony against the lodge in both churches, as a matter of duty and of course. Rev. Mr. Smith and Rev. Mr. Jones are both earnest and successful ministers of Christ.

THE NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

July 16, 1885.

The large auditorium of the Methodist Episcopal church is filled with an intelligent crowd of men and women. A woman is now speaking or reading a lecture. Forty years ago, while Mrs. Jane Swisshelm was "switching" her way where gentler women were to follow, every woman orator spoke with sharp tones of defiance. She knew she would be ridiculed and took her revenge as she went along. Now, woman (thanks to brave Mrs. Swisshelm) are treated with candor and respect, and they are candid and respectful: and public meetings like this carry our thoughts back to Eden where woman was joined with her husband, he to "till" the garden and she to "dress" it. The discussion of what is vaguely called "the modern method" of education is constantly cropping out. So far as we understand it "the modern method" means, no Bible, and no religion of Christ. The study of psychology is the study of dead men's brains to learn how those brains while living secreted thought. Yet these brave champions of liberalism and materialism, are really the most intolerant, narrow, and bigoted men here. They hate Christ and they hate Greek because his four Gospels are written in that tongue. They hate Latin (for all but Romish priests) because Romans crucified him, and the very language is witness of his death. So they cry up "science," "methods," "new education," and whatever fine words are used to cover and conceal the intended complete divorce of education from God and his Word. The champion of the "new method" here is Gedney Stanley Hall of Johns Hopkins University. This gentleman, and measureably, his school, make here bald, simple, direct statements (that have no other foundation) that physiology, that the shape of the brain, shapes the man; so that crime is nothing but diseased anatomy; and yet when questioned by Pres. White, they deny there is anything new in their crudities but the "method."

The discussion moves on to more practical matters, and the Association have voted the women fifteen minutes to the ten allowed to men.

There would be less objection to the "new" or infidel "method," were it not for the fact that its advocates never start and support schools of their own, but fasten on the public school system, and insist that a Christian nation shall support them by our taxes.

It is curious to observe that this great body of educated and refined men and women, almost all of whom draw salaries from State taxes and funds, while super-sensitive lest Christianity should be taught in the schools, are not at all alarmed by the numerous badges of the secret religion of the lodge sported by members.

A paper from Ann Arbor, Mich., is now being read. Opinions on "Physics in Common Schools" had been gathered by the Commissioner of Education, Washington, D. C. The speaker has received these opinions. He begins without definition or explanation of his subject, and is giving a long, dry argument on the importance and neglect of physics in common schools; and makes a quite feeble impression on the audience. His best work is done by quoting generalities from distinguished writers. Members are leaving the audience; but the lecturer's perseverance and downright honesty gain on his hearers and they applaud at the close.

The above sketches must suffice the Cynosure readers for an account of the school-teachers doings at this place, at this time. The first common-school congress was "The American Institute of Instruction, formed in Massachusetts above fifty years ago. The Legislature gave it $300 a year to publish its proceedings. It stimulated the invention and sale of school apparatus; improved the wages of teachers; and gave rise to common-school conventions, teachers' institutes, etc., and did much to relieve the dreariness of school teaching in the little old school houses at the forks of the roads, by the side of the woods, and in solitary field corners. When the National Association was formed, the trifling State appropriation was withdrawn, and a motion was made to disband the Massachusetts Institute. It lives, however, and has now 1,200 members. The anti-Bible, anti-prayer, anti-Christian "new method" is only one branch of the attempt to dechristianize the United States. The effort is succeeding when schools are supported by legislatures which are governed by Masons; and Christianity speaks now in whispers in common school associations and State universities.

ANTI-MASONRY AND TEMPERANCE.

Some months ago, when the facts of the early history of the temperance reform began to be dug from the rubbish heaped on them by a seven decades of lodgery, the Cynosure believed it possible to prove to the American people that the reform against the drink curse began with men who were also opposed to the lodge curse. In this number begins the fruition of our hope. Inquiry, providentially directed, has uncovered the history of the first temperance society in America, and of the man who must be considered its founder, LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG. For a future number is reserved a history of the useful life of Dr. Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and father of Hon. Richard Rush, the accomplished diplomatist and experienced statesman, whose powerful letters against the lodge power some fifty-five years ago were among the memorable documents of that era. September 23 and 24, 1885, a National Centennial Temperance conference is to be held in Philadelphia to commemorate the publication of the famous treatise on "The Effects of Ardent Spirits on the Human System," by Dr. Rush. The National W. C. T. Union will also celebrate the great anniversary upon the date of the Woman's Crusade, December 23.

Elder Barlow's recollections of Lebbeus Armstrong in this number are written with all the charm of a warm personal acquaintance and a hearty endorsement of the Christian reform work for which the old hero deserves to be forever remembered; nor is there much remaining to be said, since papers and documents of half a century ago are difficult to find. A pamphlet, lately issued by the National Temperance Society of New York, in honor of the Temperance Centennial contains a brief account of the Moreau Society, and an address in full by Mr. Armstrong before the organization August 25th, 1808, and repeated by special request at an annual meeting in 1843. The pledge of the society, given by Elder Barlow in the transcript of the by-laws, continued, says this pamphlet, until October, 1843, when the society was reorganized on the basis of total abstinence. At a meeting at that date the following record was made:

"On motion of Dr. B. J. Clark, 'Resolved, That the constitution adopted April, 1808, be amended by adopting the pledge of total abstinence from all that can intoxicate.'

"Resolved, That the subscribers to this constituion hereby pledge themselves not to use, traffic in, or furnish intoxicating drinks to any in their employ, except as a medicine."

A volume of the Tocsin, published at Cooperstown, N. Y., dated from June 8th, 1830, now in possession of Philo Millard, Woodhull, N. Y., contains Mr. Armstrong's renunciation of Freemasonry in full. It is too long a document to copy, filling six columns of the paper. It is a powerful arraignment of the lodge, and was delivered in the Baptist church in Edinburgh, Saratoga county, N. Y., August 13th, 1829. About the same time Mr. Armstrong preached a sermon into which he threw all the force of an energetic character, the subject being: "Freemasonry, the Subject of Divine prediction," and the text, 2d Thessalonians 2: 8: "And then shall that wicked be revealed, whom the Lord shall consume with the breath of his mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of his coming."

This sermon was printed, as appears in a catalogue of books for sale in New York in 1854 by Wm. Gowans, thus:

THE MAN OF SIN REVEALED; or the total overthrow of the Institution of Freemasonry. Predicted by St. Paul, and now fulfilled. Illustrated and proved in a Sermon on Thessalonians 2d and 8th. To which is prefixed a Correspondence touching the Renouncement of Masonry. 48 pp. (Curious plate in front.) Saratoga, N. Y., 1829.

In Gowan's list appears also "Masonry a Work of Darkness," from which some characteristic selections are made elsewhere. This work was published in Hartford in 1835, and has since been reissued in various forms.

These facts are evidence that the founder of the first American Temperance society was equally attached to the church of Christ which the Babylon of lodgery is continually endeavoring to draw into captivity; and his efforts against intemperance were matched if not surpassed by those aimed at the destruction of the great curse of secretism.

—A Chicago correspondent writes of Dr. Kittredge of the Third Presbyterian church, as having taken the Royal Arch degree of Freemasonry. This is a mistake evidently made by confounding the terms "Royal Arch" and "Royal Arcanum."

—President Warrington, of the Iowa State Association, sends out a letter from Rev. T. A. Shaw, of the United Presbyterian church of DesMoines, tendering his church to the association for their annual meeting, and asks if the invitation is satisfactory to the Iowa friends.

—Secretary Stoddard returned from Ohio Thursday much cheered by the outlook in that State, and ready to take hold in earnest to carry out the plans of the N. C. A. Board, and determined with the help of God to make them a success.

—Rev. Henry Cogswell, of Mansfield, O., visited the Cynosure again last week. He is as youthful and joyful in his feelings as when years ago he faced the lodge in Ohio with the story of his deception by them.

—The Iowa Greenbackers are making another vain attempt to thrust themselves into political notice. Their platform, says the Birmingham Free Press, contains attacks on money lenders, on the Republican party, on Gov. Sherman for removing Brown, defends the Oklahoma settlers, praises the Knights of Labor and is weak on the whisky question."

—The fine offer of the publisher is being accepted by many friends who wish a valuable selection of cheap and useful books to read or circulate. Look it through and make a selection. See last page.

—The mails have fallen into some tribulation between Saratoga and Chicago. The editorial letter from Niagara Falls was a week on the way, and last week closed without further word either from the editor or another correspondent from whose letters we had fondly hoped our readers would happily derive much profitable information. We have reason to hope that the editor, Pres. C. A. Blanchard and Prof. O. F. Lumry are well.

—The friends in southwestern Iowa are arranging to secure several addresses from Pres. C. A. Blanchard during the last of this month. The Blanchard Record editor, Rev. Rufus Johnson, says of the speaker, after having heard him several times: "We have never before or since heard his equal, for point, fairness, and consummate skill. His efforts are intelligent, clear, logical and conclusive. His manner of bearing toward his opponents is kind and conciliatory in the highest degree.

—Rev. Henry Avery and Prof. A. R. Dodd, of College Springs, presented the protest of the citizens of that place to the Iowa State commissioners, praying that the lodge performance over the corner-stone of the State Insane Asylum at Clarinda be forbidden. The public had no warning of the Masonic business until too late to reach many who would have been glad to enter their names against such an evil.

—George W. Clark and Lewis G., his brother in reform labors, had a busy time last week. Sabbath evening they sang and spoke to a crowded house in Englewood just south of the city. Monday evening they were in DeKalb, two hours ride to the west. Wednesday a full audience in the Baptist church, Wheaton, greeted them; and on Sabbath afternoon in the Wesleyan church, same place they assailed the vile tobacco curse. It is wonderful what great enthusiasm they create in their visits and the lodge and liquor get no mercy from them. George W. Clark was 73 years old July 5th, instead of June 29th, as noted last week.

—Mrs. Mary B. Willard of the Union-Signal, lately resigned her editorial charge, which was with the utmost unanimity not accepted. The publishing board of the paper voted her a year's vacation, but retained her services. Miss Mary Allen West, of Galesburg, Ill., a noble worker in the cause of temperance and education, and heartily opposed to the secret work of the lodge, will take editorial control of the Signal meantime. Mrs. Willard goes to Europe in August. Miss F. E. Willard, we regret to learn was severely injured lately by a fall from her tricycle.

—The Galesburg corner-stone business will not profit the lodge very much, since it gave the other side the advantage of getting some solid argument and startling fact before the people. Hundreds of copies of the Cynosure of last week have been circulated throughout Knox county, and the letter to Judge Craig was published in the daily Republican-Register of Galesburg.

—In the storm that visited the vicinity of Highmore, Dakota, almost the only fatality reported in the papers was the death of E. B. Thompson, who was living north of the place. Bro. Thompson was for two or three years a member of the N. C. A. Board and for many years on the Board of Trust of Wheaton College, to whose funds he was a large contributor. He was an earnest and uncompromising foe of the lodge, the saloon, the tobacco shop and war, and gave freely to sustain reform movements opposing these evils. He attended the State and national conventions of our reform, and was one of the party from Chicago who attended the memorable Boston meeting and enjoyed the hospitalities of the mob. His wife, four sons and a daughter survive him. His old neighbors at Wheaton were shocked by the news of his death, and such expressions of regret were heard on every hand as showed the uniform respect of the people for a man who always stood by his principles.

THE WORK AND THE WORKERS.

Bro. Bancroft writes from Monroe, Wis., "I expect to leave next Monday for Wheaton, to attend the Anti-masonic institute and to work on my way, getting there in time to attend all its sessions."

Rev. W. W. Ames, writing of the action of the Board, says, "I think it a step in the right direction, The training school idea is just the thing."

Rev. J. P. Richards, president; Rev. W. W. McMillan, secretary, and Rev. R. Loggan, agents of the Kansas association all write approvingly, and urge an onward movement.

Bro. Edgar Wylie hopes to attend.

Bro. H. A. Day, of Michigan, is in full accord with the objects of the training schoool, but thinks it hardly possible for him to attend.

Rev. Geo. T. Dissette writes enthusiastically from his home in Kansas of the meeting and the prospects.

Bro. Warrington, president of the Iowa association is never lacking in zeal or wanting in labors, and writes suggesting a man for Iowa, but is not sure that his services can be secured.

This is a good beginning and only needs following up to insure, with God's blessing, a pronounced success. I hope to give more definite notice about details next week. Meantime I want to hear from all officers of organizations, State or local, from any who intend, or have a desire to attend this class, and from any one, male or female, who is interested and has anything to suggest in the matter.

J. P. STODDARD.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

THE TRADE UNION LODGES ARE SHARPLY TOLD THE TRUTH.

In the Police Court to-day, Mr. Thomas called the attention of the court to a charge of threats preferred against Max and Morris Rosen. Mr. Thomas said he understood that it resulted from a strike amongst some of Mr. Keen's hands, members of the Tailor's union.

"I will teach these fellows to mind their own business," said the judge. "This is a land of freedom, and if they interfere and threaten workmen I will give them the full extent of the law."

"This is a free country," said the judge, "and foreigners come here to enjoy what they term American freedom. Just as soon as they get here you (looking at the prisoners) propose to rule them, and to intimidate them if they do not belong to your labor unions. The time will soon come when persons in this country will be able to employ laborers as cheap as they can, and pay them in proportion to their work, without the interference of labor unions. The greatest nuisance we have in this country are these infernal unions, and the sooner we get rid of them the better. These men are made tools of by the unions, and go to non-union men under the pretext of giving friendly advice. They are sent as messengers, just the same as by the old ku-klux mode." The men were released on their personal bonds.—Evening Star.

Calamities are not without their compensatory results. The riots in Chicago, Cleveland and Michigan, with the determination everywhere manifested to outride all personal rights and all respect for law and public safety, are gradually opening the eyes of the people to the great evil and danger of the secret trades unions.

In Cleveland the mayor preserved order and saved life and property by assuring the rioters that if necessary to secure obedience, he would tear them in pieces with Gatling guns, and when an anarchist urged his fellow conspirators to put dynamite cartrages under the wheels of the street cars, he was promptly arrested. I do not say, "Let the experiment proceed," but if it does proceed we shall soon find that all secret combinations and esoteric obligations are a standing menace to liberty and good government, and must be suppressed.

The National Republican of this city is making itself notorious by its opposition to any prohibition of the liquor traffic. In a recent editorial on the Ohio campaign it held that not only does prohibition nowhere prohibit, but that it actually increases the amount of intemperance. It declared that in the city of Portland there is more drinking and drunkenness than in this city with its 1,200 licensed saloons. It would be sufficient answer to say that the people of Maine, after more than thirty years' trial, are substantially unanimous in upholding the law, and that James G. Blaine, Hannibal Hamlin and other eminent men flatly contradict these statements. But there is a more positive evidence in the report of the superintendent of the police of this city.

During the year ending June 30th, the whole number of arrests in this city was 23,189, which is a larger number in proportion to the population than in any other city in the nation, being 80.5 per cent of the adult males. The next city is Chicago with 60 per cent. Surely such a state of things is most deplorable, and the falsehood and wickedness of the Republican in giving its sympathy to the liquor interest will soon be apparent to all.

The President has called a halt in the business of dismissals except for cause. This is well, and will add to the respect in which he is held by all parties. It is commendable, too, that he sets the good example of Sabbath observance, and that on his recent trip up the Potomac he remained quietly at his hotel until Monday, when he enjoyed a day's fishing.

It is a matter of thanksgiving, too, that the good work goes on at the Central Union Mission, 909 Pennsylvania avenue, where meetings are held each day and night, and many persons are being hopefully converted. The Salvation Army are also doing an excellent work in the northern part of the city. There is much that is deplorable, but the outlook is in some respects hopeful. H. H. HINMAN.

THE HOME.

"AND GIVE GLAD HEARTS THEIR INNING."

What troops of flowers in emerald deeps,
By summer suns attended!
The purple-eyed that slyly peeps,
The queen magnolia splendid,
The dainty star, the fairy-bell,
The sad creightonia paling,
The crowfoot of the mossy dell,
The maiden-hair, low trailing.

And from the trees the dog-wood sheds
Its dazzling snows; the cherry
Blooms forth in skyey, billowy beds,
With apple-blossoms merry;
The royal oaks, in purpled brown,
The coral maple vying,
Now stretch their leafy foils, half blown
To woo the breezes, sighing.

The woodbine sends its creepers out
As if for picket duty;
The ivy winds its toils about;
The trumpet blooms to beauty;
The lilac floods the air with scents,
The sweet wisteria mating;
Awhile the deeper tints intense
Within their cells are waiting.

The season weaves its wilds among
The greens, in glowing passions?
The carpet of the earth, ere long,
Reveals its wondrous fashions,
When all the floral shrines, upborne
Shall spread their tiny graces,
With blessings for the melting morn
That lights their dewy faces.

Down in the glen the thrushes call,
The bluebird thrills its lover,
And round some cranny of the wall
The busy sparrows hover;
The oriole skims the crystal streams
That heedless laugh; and, yonder
The redbreast wings its airy dreams,
Or hides its nestlings under.

Why marvel that the earth is fair,
That joys, like June flowers, springing—
Full-blossomed—deck the grave of care,
And give glad hearts their inning?
Why marvel that the world is won
By beauty such as this is?
I, too, my garland-crowns would don,
And revel in its blisses!

ABOUT MARRYING.

Many an example of the great truth—that the error of a moment may be the sorrow of a life—has been seen since the error of Esau. His history has been on the pages of sacred Scripture through these long thousands of years for the warning and instruction of mankind; but young men and young women who have read it from their childhood, and have often said, "What a great fool Esau was," turn out to be as great fools as he, and all the rest of their days lament that the error of a moment made the sorrow of a life.

I read the other day the very sensible remark, that in the most serious and important matter, one that involves more intimately and completely than any other the happiness or misery of a lifetime, young people exercise the least judgment and act with the greatest possible precipitation. That is, the matter of marriage! It is quite likely that most men take far less pains to be sure they are right before deciding the question of a wife, than they would if they were buying a house for her to live in. And many a young woman answers the question that fixes her state for life with less reflection than she gives to the choice of a dress or bonnet. These matters of the heart are, with the young, determined intentionally without the cool exercise of the faculty of reason, the highest of human endowments, and which has no nobler and better opportunity for its employment than in coming to a wise decision as to the choice or acceptance of a companion for life. Yes, it is an affair of the heart, and, if the heart is not in it, all other things go for nothing. Call it a love affair. Let it be a love affair. And if you can not make it a love affair, by all means give it up. For be assured of this, if the heart is not in it, the whole heart, all the strong and tender passions that help to make up the world of human affection such as every true man or true woman lavishes on the partner of life joys and pains, if the whole heart is not in it, it were better to hang a millstone around the neck of that contemplated union and drown it forever in the depths of the sea than to make it a reality. The error of the moment that completes the engagement with no heart in it, becomes the sorrow of a life. The twofold nature of every human soul is made up of reason and emotion; both are inseperable from the being. They ought to be equal in power. Nobody is complete without both in lively exercise; in some natures one is in excess, and in other natures the other; one is more frequently dominant in man, the other in woman. If both have not their highest and intensest development in the decision of this question, then all the future is the result of blind chance, or, what is more, the mercy of Providence that is far better to us than our deserts.

I do not care to consider the vexed question of the comparative number of happy and unhappy marriages. In the church and in those circles of society by whom we are surrounded, there are doubtless hundreds of happy households to one where the married state is long drawn out in misery. But the records in the daily newspapers of separations, fights, murders, divorces that project themselves upon the public horizon so that they smell to heaven in their wickedness and shock humanity by their wretchedness, are so many, so tragical and deplorable as to prove beyond all denial and doubt that these marriages were made unwisely, and the error is punished with sorrow that no tongue can tell and no imagination conceive.

And underneath the surface of fair society, smooth and pure to the eye of the world, how many fearful tragedies are performed! A husband converted by wine into a fiend; a wife with unconquered temper turned from a ministering angel into a fury; homes with skeletons in every closet, and walls echoing forever the sighs of crushed affections and blighted hopes. Over these the pall is thrown to hide them from the sight of men.

Now, I abhor the advice of that cynical London newspapers which says to young people about to marry, "Don't!" The satire it implies is unserved and despicable. To all young people who have the means of being comfortable in the married state, I say, "Do it!" It is the ordinance of nature, the voice of God, who sets the solitary in families, and who will bless the basket and the store of them who walk in the way of his commandments. Get married by all means! But if your reason and emotions are not in it, then, with Punch, I say, "Don't!"

The wisest of men under the inspiration of the Almighty, said, "With good advice make war;" and I say, "With good advice make love.' And in this I think I have the mind of the spirit.

When I took my pen in hand to write this epistle, it was not even in the thought of my heart to speak of mistakes in marriage as one of the examples of those errors that beget life-long sorrows. My eye was fixed on the young man who, in an evil hour, was tempted by his friend to go into a saloon where the wine and then the game allured him to drink and gamble; and in one moment of folly and madness he threw away his birthright of virtue and, like Esau, forfeited immortal hopes.

I was thinking of another youth who put his hand into the treasury of his employer and stole a little money that he might indulge himself in pleasurable sin. From that moment he saw a thief whenever he looked into a mirror. It blazed right out on his forehead, and it seemed to him the world must know he was a villain. Self-respect was gone, and so was honor and honesty and enjoyment. That error of a moment was the sorrow of his life.

I was thinking of the young woman of whom we all read in the daily papers last week, "the foolish virgin," who, in a moment of unspeakable folly, mistaking hot passion for love, and trusting to the seductive words of a scoundrel in the garb of a lover, flung away the joys of parental affection, the wealth of brother and sister's hearts, and all the sweet endearments of fireside and home, and, alas! made wreck of body and soul. Thousands of such poor, lost creatures are weeping and wailing and gnashing their teeth in the anguish and remorse because of the error of one moment!

O, that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider the end! Better is the end of a thing than the beginning. At first it is sweet, but in the end it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder. One blunder, one mistake, one error, one sin, makes the sorrow of a life. It is a little sin; what does God care for that? Is it not too tiny for the Infinite to notice? It is a mere speck on the surface of the character. Yes, but it is sin, and all the waters of the ocean cannot wash it away. You will weep over it, but it is beyond the reach, though you weep bitterly, of tears. It is to be the sorrow of a life. God grant it may not be the sorrow of eternity!

To err is human. But there is One who sticketh closer than a brother—One whose arm is about you in the time of temptation. You feel it as you struggle to get away to do what you know is wrong. It is against that love you go in the first step of the downward way. Trust him, cling to him, hold him closely to the heart. So Joseph did. "How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?" So you will stand. Temptation will not be your destroyer. And the triumph of that moment will be the joy of a life, and immortal glory its great reward.—N. Y. Observer.

SWEET-MINDED WOMEN.

So great is the influence of a sweet-minded woman on those around her that it is almost boundless. It is to her that friends come in season of sickness and sorrow for help and comfort. One soothing touch of her kindly hands works wonders in the feverish child; a few words let fall from her lips into the ear of a sorrowing sister do much to raise the load of grief that is bowing its victim down to the dust in anguish. The husband comes home worn out with the pressure of business and feeling irritable with the world in general, but when he enters the cozy sitting-room and sees the blaze of the bright fire and meets his wife's smiling face he succumbs in a moment to the soothing influences, which act as the balm of Gilead to his wounded spirit. We are all wearied with combating with the realities of life. The rough school-boy flies in a rage from the taunts of his companion to find solace in the mother's smile; the little one, full of grief with its own large trouble finds a haven of rest on its mother's breast; and so one may go on with instances of the influence a sweet-minded woman has in the social life with which she is connected. Beauty is an insignificant power when compared with hers.—Sel.

CHRIST AND THE LITTLE ONES.

"The Master has come over Jordan,"
Said Hannah the mother one day;
He is healing the people who throng him
With a touch of his finger, they say.

"And now I shall carry the children,
Little Rachel, and Samuel and John,
I shall carry the baby Esther,
For the Lord to look upon."

The father looked at her kindly,
But he shook his head and smiled:
"Now, who but a doting mother
Would think of a thing so wild?

"If the children were tortured by demons,
Or dying of fever, 'twere well;
Or had they the taint of the leper,
Like many in Israel."

"Nay, do not hinder me, Nathan:
I feel such a burden of care;
If I carry it to my Master
Perhaps I shall leave it there.

If he lay his hand on the children,
My heart will be lighter, I know;
For a blessing forever and ever
Will follow them as they go."

So over the hills of Judea,
Along by the vine-rows green,
With Esther asleep on her bosom,
And Rachel her brothers between;

'Mid the people who hung on his teaching,
Or waited his touch and his word,
Through the row of proud Pharisees listening
She pressed to the feet of the Lord.

"Now, why shouldst thou hinder the Master,"
Said Peter, "with children like these?
Seest not how from morning to evening
He teacheth and healeth disease?"

Then Christ said, "Forbid not the children,
Permit them to come unto me!"
And he took to his arms little Esther,
And Rachel he took on his knee;

And the heavy heart of the mother
Was lifted all earth-care above,
As he laid his hand on the brothers,
And blest them with tenderest love;

As he said of the babes in his bosom:
"Of such is the kingdom of heaven;"
And strength for all duty and trial
That hour to her spirit was given.

WEE JEEMSIE.

A SCOTTISH STORY FOUNDED ON FACT.

[Rev. David MacRae, in the Independent]

Wee Jeemsie was one of the little boys that ran about the railway station in Greenock, selling the Evening Telegraph. He had a peculiar way—quite his own—of crying "Eve-nan Telegraph, a ha'penny!" It was familiar to everybody near the station, and to all the regular passengers arriving by the afternoon trains. Many knew the cry who had never observed Wee Jeemsie himself.

He was not very much too see. His companions called bim "Wee Jeemsie" because he was so very small. He looked all the more minnte from his tattered habiliments having all belonged to bigger people. His wee, pinched face was almost hidden under an old greasy cap that might have been thrown away by a railway stoker. From the trousers he wore the original legs had vanished; but what was left was enough to eome down to Wee Jeemsie's knees, where they terminated in a ragged fringe, from under which appeared his spare limbs and little, hacked feet, bespattered with the mud of the dirty causeway. An old jacket—probably his father's once—hnng loosely about him, like a ragged coat. Had you tried to button it, the button-hole would have gone round his shoulder to his back. But, probably, there was no button anywhere upon it. Here and there it was fastened with bits of string. When the weather was wet Wee Jeemsie had plenty of room under his ragged coat to keep the papers dry. And there he always was, running about the entrance of the station on the arrival of the afternoon trains, crying, with his peculiar cry: "Eve-nan Telegraph, a ha'penny!"

There was a little shop near the station, where Wee Jeemsie ran when he wanted change. The girl behind the counter—Betsey Barr by name—a young damsel, about head and shoulders taller than Wee Jeemsie, was very kind to him, as she saw that he was sometimes cruelly treated by the bigger boys. As Betsey went on Sundays to a mission school that had been opened in the Vennel, she got Wee Jeemsie to go with her; but he was so restless and mischievous, and made the other boys laugh so much, that after being warned again and again by the superintendent, he was at last dismissed as incorrigible, greatly to Betsey's distress. But, poor boy, he had no one to encourage or train him at home. His mother was dead, and his father was given to drink. Betsey, however, behind the counter of the little shop, was as kind to him as ever.

That was the time when the Greenoch bus used to run—before the days of the tramway. The gnard of the bus seemed to have a general aversion to newsboys, and a special aversion to Wee Jeemsie. But, when the bus was waiting for the train, and the guard was not looking, Jeemsie would dart up, mount the back steps, and cry eagerly in: "Eve-nan Telegraph, a ha'penny!" Sometimes when the guard went into the neighboring public house, and there was no immediate danger, Jeemsie, when he failed to find any purchaser for his paper, used to sing. His favorite performance in this line was a song called "My Cuddie and me," the chorus of which involved the imitation of a donkey's bray, which Jeemsie achieved in so amusing a fashion that the people in the bus used to laugh, and sometimes one or two threw out a ha'penny for him.

Jeemsie, however, began to be afflicted with a cough, caught through exposure. His father, when drinking, used to take poor Jeemsie's coppers from him to bny drink. Jeemsie, when he had failed to sell his papers, was afraid to face his father without any money, and wonld lie out in some close all night. This exposure brought on a severe cold and cough, which became so bad that he became unable to sing his favorite song—the imitation of the donkey provoking the cough and compelling him to stop. Still, however, he plied his trade with the evening papers, though his voice began to lose the cheerfulness of its old tone when he cried: "Eve-nan Telegraph, a ha'penny!" There was an effort now, and something even of sadness in it.

About this time his friend, Betsey Barr, was taken to Glasgow, by her employer, for several months. Betsey was more attached to the friendless little boy than she knew, till she was away from the daily sight of him and the daily sound of his familiar cry.

When she got back to Greenoch, arriving in the afternoon, her first thought on reaching the station was about Wee Jeemsie. Descending the broad step toward the street, she expected every moment to catch sight of him, or at least to hear his "Eve-nan Telegraph, a ha'penny!" She had a penny ready in her hand, intending, when she saw him, to bny a paper and give him the other halfpenny to himself, "for auld lang Syne," as she sdid. But, thongh she heard the other boys shonting, she watched in vain for the familiar cry of Wee Jeemsie.

Turning up the street, with eye and ear on the alert, she at last accosted another boy, whom she had often seen racing with Jeemsie from the newspaper office with fresh editions of the paper, to see who would reach the station first. This boy, in answer to her inquiry, said he heard that Wee Jeemsie was ill; "lyin' with the cough," he said. Betsey was concerned at this news, and was about to put some further questions, when the boy catching sight of a likely customer, darted away.

Betsey felt so anxious about the friendless boy that she went straight to the plaee where he lived. Reaching the dark and miserable close, she saw his father sitting smoking in a back court; and, though his faee was turned from her, she could see that he had been drinking. Ascending the narrow and dirty stair to the attic, she met Jeemsie's little sister at the top, crying bitterly, and apparently hesitating whether to go back or down.

"What ails you?" said Betsey, in a tone of sympathy. "What's wrang, Gracie? Is Wee Jeemsie here?

"Ay; he's in there," sobbed the child, pointing; "but, oh! he's far through. Betsey, Betsey," she cried, "wha'll I dae? I'm feart to go doon to faither; he's awfu' cross; and I'm feart to bide."

All the time she was speaking Betsey heard a painful coughing in the garret behind. She took the child's hand and went in.

There, in the wretched garret, lying on some straw, lay Wee Jeemsie, wasted away to a skeleton and evidently dying. His coughing had ceased, and he lay back utterly exhausted, looking as if he were dead.

Betsey bent over him and said, "Jeemsie!" and again, "Jeemsie!"

He raised his head with difficulty, as if to listen, and then sank back again. Betsey knelt down beside him, and called him again and again by name. At length he opened his eyes and looked vaguely toward her.

"Din ye no ken me, Jeemsie?" she said, bending close. "Din ye no mind Betsey Barr, at the station, when ye was sellin' the papers, and crying Eve-nan Telegraph"?

The dying boy recognized her now, and lookiug up into her kindly face, smiled.

"Ay, Betsey!" he said faintly. "Eve-nan Telegraph, a ha'penny. I'll never be there again, Betsey.

"Dinna say that, Jeemsie. Maybe ye'll get better."

He tnrned up his weary eyes, as though he said: "No, no, Betsey, I'll no' get better, noo."

Betsey waited, but as he did not attempt to speak, and was evidently very weak, she began softly to sing one of the hymns they used to sing in the Sunday School. When she had finished he said:

"O Betsey! That's nice; very nice." He looked at her silently for a time, and then said: "The wee book. Will ye read a bit oot o' the wee book, Betsey?"

Not knowing what he referred to, Betsey turned to the child.

"Ay," said the little girl, "the wee book ye gied him in the Sunday-school. He's rale fond o't."

The child had searched in the straw and brought out a little book of Scripture passages and stories that Betsey had used in the Sunday-school. It brought tears into her eyes to see it again, and to find that Wee Jeemsie had kept it so carefully.

She opened it and said: "What would you like me to read, Jeemsie?"

"Read," he said, "about the bonnie land, and the folks in the white claes."

She knew the portion he was thinking of, and, turning to it, began to read about the land where there is no sorrow, nor pain; and about the shining gates, and the streets of gold. When she looked at him he was listening earnestly.

"Ay," said he, "that's nice. Betsey," he added, looking eagerly into her face, will there be any Telegraph boys there?"

Not knowing what she ought to say, Betsey, with tears in her eyes, turned to the little book again, and read abont the great multitude all in white robes and palms in their hands. And how the man said, "Who are these?" And the other answered: "These are they that came out of great tribulation, and washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

When she paused, the dying boy said: "Isn't that Jesus, Betsey?"

"Ay, Jeemsie," she said. "And ye ken how kind he was, and how he took the weans in his arms, and never turned naebody awa'."

Suddenly a fit of coughing seized the dying boy, and when it passed he sank back utterly exhausted.

Betsey took his hand and put her other arm tenderly around his neck to bear him np. "O, Jeemsie!" she said. "I'm afeared ye're far thro'."

He looked at her, and she saw a change coming rapidly over him.

"O, Jeemsie!" she said, pray to Jesus."

He tried to speak, but could only gasp, "I canna—I canna pray."

"Haud up your hand then, Jeemsie!" she said. "Maybe he'll see you."

The dying boy lifted up his wee, thin hand, all trembling. Suddenly, as he looked over it, his face brightened with a strange and wondrous light. "Oh!" he cried, joyfully, "I see him! I see him!"

His hand fell, the light faded from his face, his head sank back, and Wee Jeemsie had passed away.

TEMPERANCE.

A Boston saloon-keeper sprinkles liquor on the sidewalk in front of his place for the purpose of tempting the appetite, through the sense of smell, of some poor victims.

The editor of the Las Vegas (N. M.) Daily Optic has won a wager of $1,000 that he would drink no intoxicating liquor for a half-year. His experience is told by himself in a sketch with the startling title, "Six Months Out of Hell," an argument for total abstinence.

The London, England, temperance societies held a monster demonstration at Hyde Park. Fully ten thousand people were present. They were addressed by several prominent advocates of the cause, who spoke in high praise of the Government's policy in increasing the tax on liquors, and urged the abolition of duties on tea.

A Milwaukee paper reports that there is in that city one saloon for every twenty-six voters, and as half the people do not drink, every thirteen drunkards must support one saloon. This suggests the question, "How many women take in washing to support the thirteen drunkards who support each saloon?"

On Wednesday, July 1st, 1885, between the hours of four and five o'clock, a gentleman walked up to my desk, remarking, "Scott, do you want an item?" Replying "Yes," I walked with my friend to the front door, and he pointed to a man leaning against a fence, almost opposite, in a state of intoxication. What made it of more than usual importance was the fact that the man thus situated was a policeman in full uniform, club in hand, and about all that was sober was his weapon of defence. Soon a poor drunken tramp came along, and a hearty hand-shaking ensued. The representative of the law and the despised outcast for once were on good terms. Both had drank from the same source, and they looked, acted, and talked alike; for whisky is no respecter of persons or stations in life—it is democratic twenty-four hours in the day.—N. Y. Witness.

In the city of New York alone they drink between 10,000,000 and 15,000,000 gallons of excellent California and other native wines under the belief that they are imported from France, being duly accredited with a French label. The proportion of European wines imported as against American wines produced is about 5,000,000 gallons European as against 35,000,000, the products of our own vineyards.

Fifty people drink at the free ice-water fountain near the New York Postoffice every minute, and 3,000 pounds of ice are used every day to keep the water cool. The fountain is supported by the Moderation Society, and affords the only place for half a mile where a thirsty man can get refreshment without paying for it. Thousands of dollars are saved annually to the poor by this establishment, which would otherwise be spent for whisky and beer.

From May 1 to June 24 there were 3,336 licences issued to saloon-keepers in Chicago, at the rate of $500. In that manner the large amount of $435,812 has been paid into the city treasury. In the year 1882 there was 3,849 licences issued at $52 per year, bringing a revenue of $195,508.97. In 1883 there were 3,682 licenses issued at $103, creating a revenue of $379.246; in 1884, when the Harper bill was in force, 3,411 licenses of all kinds were issued, with a revenue of abont a million dollars, or at least such is claimed by the city collector.

Upon the railroad trains, steamboats and streets, in and around New York, drunken men, and even women are to be seen. Liquor is a tyrant, whose chains moderate drinkers are eagerly pntting around their necks at all the numerous saloons and "sample rooms." The "samples" that are there mann-manufactured are sots, paupers and demons, made of deluded men. One would think that these samples wonld check the manufacturing, bnt the more samples the more demand. "Hell Gate Brewery" is a large and suggestive sign one sees as he sails up and down the East river, in New York, opposite Blackwell's Island.

LITERATURE.

In the North American Review for August, Hon. George W. Julian, who has given special attention to the acts disposing of our public lands, tells the story in brief of our public lands and their wasteful disposition by the government.. The American nation has a double birthright—liberty and land. Its liberty it has guarded jealously, but until very recent years it seems to have been indifferent to the loss of its landed estate and ignorant of the methods by which it has been diminished. In the same number five medical authorities discuss the question, "Can Cholera be Averted?" Felix L. Oswald contributes a suggestive article on "The Animal Soul;" and the Rev. M. J. Savage, in "A Profane View of the Sanctum," brings an indictment against the daily press. The other artieles are on "The Price of Gas," by Charles H. Botsford, and on "Temperanee Reform Statisties," by Prof. W. J. Beecher, eritieising severely the stock figures of the professional temperance leeturer, and the chapter of "Comments," by various writers, on articles in previous numbers.

Friends of the late Rev. David A. Wallace, D. D., LL. D., are publishing a memorial of his life. In addition to a biography, the volume will contain addresses, sermons, letters and other matter from his pen, and will be of interest to every friend of the honored man, who was for over twenty years president of Monmouth College. The edition of the volume will be limited, and persons desiring to obtain a copy can subscribe for the same at the office of the Herald, Wooster, Ohio. Price for cloth binding $1; morocco, $2.

THE CHURCHES.

—The Rev. Joseph Hartmann, for thirty-four years pastor of a German Evangelical church in this city, has resigned on ae count of ill-health.

—The first national eamp meeting of the Salvation Army opened at Old Orehard, Me., Sunday, with 2,000 people in attendance.

—S. Ireneus Prime, D. D., long and well-known as the editor of the New York Observer, died last week at Manchester, Vt.

—Dr. R. S. Storrs, of Brooklyn, says the present efforts of the Christian church are much like an attempt to drive a great steamship across the ocean with tepid water instead of steam, and he thinks that with proper enthusiasm it might soon conquer the whole earth.

—The Rev. W. S. Holt, late a Presbyterian missionary in Shanghai, is now laboring among the 4,000 or 5,000 Chinese in Portland, Ore., a foreign missionary on the home field.

—Pastor Israel Goldstein, once a rabbi, but since his conversion to Christ, a missionary among the Jews on the Rhine, has been called to Bessarabia, to labor among the Israelites there, who in great numbers are inquiring after the truth.

—But a few years ago the Karens were wild jungle-dwellers, despised by the Burmese. Through the labors of the Baptist missionaries they have been Christianized, and now the Burman Government employs them in introducing new industries into the country.

—The king of Belgium, the president of the African International Assoeiation, has decided to open an African Seminary in connection with the University at Leyden, at which young men will be prepared for missionary work in the newly opened distriets of the Dark Continent.

—Ten of the graduates of Prineeton Theological Seminary propose to go out as foreign missionaries.

—It is estimated that within the past twenty-five years over 100,000 copies of the Bible have been circulated in Greece, besides many thousands among Greek residents in Turkey. The Government permits the free dissemination of the Scriptures, and affords protection to colporteurs against the opposition of the clerics in the Greek church. The four Gospels are used as a reading-book in the high classes of the primary schools throughout Greeee.

—The Freeman's Journal of Cooperstown, N. Y., in a eomment upon the late meeting of the Otsego Baptist Association, says of the large non-attendance upon public worship—nearly one-half the people: "Too many, of late years, seldom if ever put in an appearance at any religious serviee, except occasionally to attend a funeral. The churches are sustained by the few, and for the benefit of the many. Close their doors for one year, and all the material interests of Otsego county, agriculture included, would deteriorate and in time be utterly ruined."

—Rev. Edward Judson, pastor of the Berean Baptist church, New York city, son of Rev. Adoniram Judson, pioneer missionary to Burmah, India, has just decided to go with Stanley for several months on missionary explorations in Afriea.

—The Baptist Missionary Union has appointed the Rev. Dr. Edward Judson, of this city, and the Rev. Albert Loughridge, of its Telugu mission, to visit its new Congo mission, explore the field, acquaint themselves with its character, needs and workers and select sites for new stations.

—The French are pushing their advance in Madagasear, having taken Vohimarina, through the help of the native allies. These are the Antakaranus, a tribe in Northern Madagascar, who owe the Hovas an old grudge of a generation back, when thousands of them were ruthlessly massacred. The fall of Vohimarina is the heaviest blow that the Hovas has received at the hands of the French; still their courage is unconquerable, though fighting at so great odds. That the French may not be permitted to blot out the missionary history and suecess, and the promising eivilization of Madagascar, should be the prayer of all Christian men.

—The new United States census gives 72,653 Protestant churehes, 71,662 Protestant ministers, and 9,903,830 members of Protestant churches. According to the census the entire population of the United States was 52,152,866. Deduct from this 6,174,202 Roman Catholics; and 114,283 Mormons, and we have a remaining population of 43,364,381. This gives one church for every 473 persons, including infants and ehildren, one minister for every 612 of the people, and nearly one professing Protestant for every five of the entire population outside of Roman Catholicism and Mormonism.

—As a result of the revival in Nashville, Tenn., four hundred and fifty persons were received into the churches in one day. Liquor men, both wholesale and retail, have closed up and joined the church. An owner of a steamboat line on Cumberland river, has closed the bars on all his boats, and has headed a subscription to erect a suitable building for the Young Men's Christian Association with $1,000.

—The National Council of bishops of the African Methodist Episcopal church convened in Columbus, O., June 22nd. Bishop W. F. Dickerson has died since the last meeting of the General Conference in Baltimore in 1884. These bishops and ministers represent 400,000 communicants, 2,500 traveling preachers, 200,000 Sabbath-school children, 4,000 Sabbath-schools, 10 colleges, 25 parochial schools, $8,000,000 or $10,000,000 worth of property.

—The Rev. Sam Jones, the Georgia revivalist, is at Waco, Texas, and is carrying on a series of revival meetings, to last over two weeks. There have been ample preparations made for the accommodation of the vast crowds pouring into the city from every direction. The extensive sheds of an oil-mill and an elevator company have been fitted up to serve as a tabernacle, and these will seat 6,000 people comfortably, if neeessary. The evangelist states that "he intends to give the devil such a tussle as he had never before engaged in on the banks of the Brazos since he had been kicked out of heaven."

—The little kingdom of Wurtemberg, in the southern part of Germany, has always been famous for its scholarship and the faithful Christian character of its people. At present, also, when, nearly throughout the empire, a large majority of the people are not only non-churchgoers, but are positively and actively anti-churchly, Wurtemberg is true to its historic reputation. Of every hundred who are down on the civil list as belonging to the evangelicals, 52.-35 are actual communicants, a larger per cent than is found in any other country, with the possible exception of Sweden and Norway.

—King George, of the Friendly Islands, who is not only a devoted Christian, but a zealous preacher, with one European minister, twelve ordained ministers, eight hundred local preachers, six hundred school teachers, seven thousand members, with eleven thousand adherents, have withdrawn from the Wesleyan Methodist church and formed the "Free Church of Tonga." The cause of withdrawal was of a local character, involving nothing of a doctrinal or ecclesiastical nature. The new church is to teach Wesleyan doctrine and enforce Wesleyan discipline. An effort is being made to restore harmony, and remove the cause of difficulty. The conference had repeatedly refused the request of the Tonga people, before they withdrew.

—A New York letter in the Watchman, of Boston, gives the following as the number in attendance on a recent Sunday morning at certain churches in this city: "The Fifth Avenue, Presbyterian, Dr. Hall's, 1,350; the Broadway Tabernacle, Congregational, Dr. Taylor's, 1,264; St. George's, Episcopal, Mr. Rainsford's, 1,232, and Calvary Baptist, Dr. McArthur's, 1,040. The same evening Dr. McArthur had 1,168, while the others averaged a thousand each. Dr. McArthur's evening congregation is made up only in small part of the attendance in the morning. It is doubtless much the same with the other congregations named, so that the aggregate number of hearers is very large. While in each of these churches there are people of wealth, the congregations would, on the whole, be called "demoeratic" in character. The success of each of the preachers named, must be attributed not to "sensationalism," but to practical, common-sense teaching.—Independent.

MISSIONARIES WITH THE SPIRIT OF PAUL.

Rev. Henry Blodgett writes to the Independent from Pekin, China, May 8th, of the graeious results attending the preaching of some new missionaries from England. Such power is the gift of the Holy Ghost. Oh, that it might come upon the whole church! Mr. Blodgett says:

Among the seventy and more missionaries who have recently eome to China from England, in connection with the China Inland Mission, are five graduates of Cambridge University and two young officers who have resigned their commissions in the British Army. One of these Cambridge graduates, Mr. Stanley P. Smith, had the stroke oar in the University boat race in 1882. Another, Mr. C. T. Studd, was a well-known member of the cricket club, which played against the Australian club. These young men now enter, with the other members of that mission—about one hundred and fifty in all—upon the great work of evangelizing the Chinese people. On their arrival in China they assumed the Chinese costume, and had their heads shaved, preparatory to braiding in the Chinese queue, as is customary in that and in some other missions. Thus appareled, they made their preparations for leaving western civilization on the shores of China, and taking up their abode in the city of Hang Chung in the remote province of Shensi, in the northwestern part of China, thence to Szchuen, or to what other region the necessities of the work might call them.

Before leaving Shanghai, these brethren held a series of evangelistic services, at which all the English-speaking people were invited to be present. Large numbers attended, attracted by the report of what these men had been in England, as well as by the fact that two of them were so well known in athletie contests. The audiences listened most attentively to their earnest and powerful addresses, and quite a number were converted. The chaplain at the cathedral in Shanghai acknowledged that now for the first time he had come to know the Saviour.

At Tientsin the same blessing followed their labors. Some who had long halted between two opinions were brought to take a decide stand for Christ. At Pekin their circular letter, inviting all to attend evangelistic services, brought together many who seldom or never before had been found in such places. Among them were Roman Catholics, a Greek Catholic, and Protestants of various denominations. All listened most attentively while Mr. Stanley P. Smith set forth, with great eloquence and power, the simple truths of the Gospel. The services lasted for ten successive evenings, while meetings were also held each afternoon in different parts of the city. The simplicity and earnestness of these young missionaries won all hearts, and their preaching of the Gospel was with unusual power.

They preach and teaeh the old Gospel in the spirit and power of such men as Finney and Kirk, Moody and Spurgeon. They have no new notions in regard to eschatology. They give themselves wholly to their work. The most remarkable thing in their preaching is their familiarity with and dependence upon the Bible. Their mouths are full of the most apt quotations from the Old Testament and the New, and they use these with great power. Their lives are marked by self-denial and prayer, with fasting. They visited no remarkable places in Peking, saw no sights, wondered at nothing, but made it their one object, while here, to seek for themselves and for Christians the power of God's Spirit according to his promise.

There are now in Cambridge University, forty men or more who are looking toward missionary work in the foreign field; a large number, also, in Oxford. From these old universities fresh streams are issuing forth to gladden the desert wastes. One can but think in this connection of Yale and Harvard. Is this kind of religion dying out in these universities? Have the officers and students in these seats of learning nothing to learn from the parent universities in the mother land?

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

—The "International Order of Odd-fellows" is a new wrinkle. It has a "Sovereign Grand Lodge" which met the other day in Boston. Odd-fellowship is now represcnted by an "Independent Order," an "International Order," the "Manchester Unity" and the "Patriarchal Circle." The Independent order has what they call a "uniform rank"—a kind of military department.

—Aratus F. Pierce, who died in Denver lately was buried with flaming Masonic honors in Lockport, N. Y. He was formerly a leader in Masonic circles in the latter place, and when he shot the betrayer of his sister the lodge got up a great demonstration on his acquittal.

—The Illinois Grand Temple of Honor met last month at Rockford, and meets next year at Galesburg.

—The American Protestant Association, the anti-Catholic secret society, held last month its thirty-sixth annual meeting in Pittsburg. Delegates were present from Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, Kentucky, and Mississippi. The order is not very extensive.

—In a trial at Lexington, Ky., lately a woman was before the court for being an accomplice in the murder of her husband, who was insured in the grange, Knights of Honor, an several other like societies.

—The Detroit Freemason says that "W. M. Grand Master of Massachusetts, Bro. Abraham Hathaway Howland, jr., addressed the Grand Lodge of this jurisdiction, in very impressive and forcible language, in condemnation of the use of written or printed ritual, so called, and especially of a publication styled 'Ecce Orienti, or Rites and Ceremonies of the Essenes,' a work pretending to give the Masonic ritual by letters and characters. He pointed out most clearly the serious consequences resulting from the use of such inaccurate and unauthorized catchpenny affairs, and enjoined it upon every member of the fraternity to exert every means in his power to prevent their circulation." This reads as if the book were on the whole accurate and the lodge is afraid of it.

THE PILLOW-INHALER!

Cures CATARRH, HAY-FEVER, ASTHMA and CONSUMPTION, by enabling the sufferer to inhale powerful, healing, soothing and curative vapors ALL-NIGHT—eight hours out of the twenty-four—whilst sleeping as usual, and without any discomfort. Used the same as an ordinary pillow. No pipes or tubes. Concealed reservoirs in the Pillow hold the liquid and volatile balms. There is no dosing the stomach, no douching or snuffing, but, just as a smoky lamp will leave a deposit on a whitened wall, so the PILLOW-INHALER, for eight hours at a time, spreads a powerful healing balm or salve on the inflamed inner coating of the diseased air-surfaces, from the nostrils to the bottom of the lungs, and hence into the blood. It is a constitutional and local cure at the same time. Its success is wonderful—a success that is changing despair into hope, and filling homes with joy. It is inexpensive and can be used by any one. Call and see it, or send for pamphlet and testimonials.

A WOMAN'S VICTORY;

OR

BY JENNIE L. HARDIE.

This simple and touching story which was lately published in the Cynosure is now ready for orders in a beautiful pamphlet. It is worth reading by every Anti-mason —and especially BY HIS WIFE. Get it and take it home to cheer the heart of your companion who may desire to do something for Christ against great evils, but is discouraged from making any public effort. PRICE, FIFTEEN CENTS. Ten for a dollar

EIGHT MONTHS FREE!

THE "CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE"

Will be sent to any address free for eight months providing you remit $2.20 for

"THE AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST," and a new Portrait of GENERAL GRANT.

The American Agriculturist has just issued a magnificent stipple-style line portrait of General Grant, executed by one of the very first artists of the country. The great warrior is sitting in an easy chair in his now famous library; the expression on his countenance is exceedingly life like, and the whole picture is grand and striking in appearance, far surpassing any previous likeness of the General. Its great merit is due to the fact that it is from General Grant's last sitting; that is, it presents him as a picture of health as he was just before his present and probably fatal malady overtook him. Other portraits, while presenting him in health, do not show his features and general appearance at a late period.

The regular price of the American Agriculturist is $1.50 per year. We have made arrangements with the publishers whereby we are enabled to send, postfree, in a tube specially made for the purpose, this portrait of General Grant, the American Agriculturist from now until the end of the year (eight months) and the Cynosure for the same time, all for the sum of $2.20.

The portrait alone sells for $1 in New York, we are reliably informed; no copies have been disposed of at less than that figure.

A Wonderful Woman, A Wonderful Life, AND A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quict, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Elizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

REVISED ODD-FELLOWSHIP ILLUSTRATED.

The complete revised ritual of the Lodge, Encampment and Rebekah (ladies') degrees, profusely illustrated, and guaranteed to be strictly accurate; with a sketch of the origin, history and character of the order, over one hundred foot-note quotations from standard authorities, showing the character and teachings of the order, and an analysis of each degree by President J. Blanchard. The ritual corresponds exactly with the "Charge Books" furnished by the Sovereign Grand Lodge. In cloth, $1.00; per dozen, $8.00. Paper cover, 75 cents; per dozen $4.00.

FARM NOTES.

DO TREES INCREASE RAINFALL?

That forests preserve moisture in the soil and water in the springs; that mountains covered with timber protect lowlands from destructive freshets, is true, and cannot be too strongly impressed on the public, but it is not necessary to mix error with truth, and try to make people believe that by planting a few trees they can change the climate of a whole continent.

In Virginia the drouths of the last ten years and more are disheartening to the farmers, and they talk of the good old times before the war, when seed time and harvest never failed; lamenting the dry seasons that now prevail in the well-wooded mountains as well as in the low country. Yet the whole country is growing up to trees, the "old fields" being quickly covered with pines. On my own farm, a field that was in corn eleven years ago, is now an almost impenetrable thicket Surely if trees affect rainfall, the Virginians may well say, "Down with the trees for they bring drouth!"

We really know very little about the causes that bring about an increase or diminution in the annual rainfall. Two French philosophers, Fautrat and Sartriaux, found that about one-twelfth more rain fell over a piece of forest than on the adjoining country. This fact went the rounds of the papers as proof that the foliage of trees attracted rain, until it was pointed out that the experiments extended from February to July—about half before the leaves opened, and half afterwards, and that the trees received quite as much rain when entirely bare as when covered with foliage, and even one-sixth more in March when there was no foliage to invite rain or condense the vapor.

A few years ago when spending some time in Utah, I noticed that Great Salt Lake was rising. Some fences, once on dry land, were under water, and the rise was said to average one foot a year. The inhabitants said the annual amount of rain was increasing. Some attribute it the orchards and shade trees they had set out, forgetting that for every tree planted a hundred or more were cut down on the mountains. Others thought it was due to plowing and cultivation; others were sure that the iron rails of the Pacific railway brought electricity and rain from the East! A like increase of rain prevailed and perhaps still prevails in Western Kansas and Nebraska. Forgetting their destructive drouths the papers asserted that rain followed civilization, with its clearing, plowing and harrowing. This was certainly a pleasant view of the subject to an incoming population, and for those who had lands for sale.—American Agriculturist.

HOW TO BE WEATHER-WISE.

John H. Tice, the weather prophet of St. Louis, used to give the following directions to those aspiring to be weather-wise:

As everybody is interested in the weather, so each one should qualify himself or herself to read the sky, and to interpret the sky, wind and clouds.

An intensely blue and serene sky indicates heavy rains and severe storms in from twelve to forty-eight hours. A gray, hazy sky indicates continuous dry and generally hot weather.

A southcast wind indicates the existence of a low barometer, if not a storm center in the northwest The aspect of the sky and clouds will tell whether it means mischief or not. An almost immediate cessation of rain may be expected as soon as the northwest wind sets in. It matters not what the aspects of the sky are when the west wind sets in; fair weather will ensue, and continue from three to four days. The passage of a storm center from the Gulf and southeastward of our locality is a partial exception only that it clears off more tardily. There really are but two primary kinds of clouds namely, (1) those that float at a great height above the earth's surface, and (2) those that float low. Those that float high, say from six to nine miles, are of a fibrous and gauzy structure; they are hence called cirrus, that is hair or tuft clouds. The clouds that form in the lower strata of the atmosphere, say from one to three miles above the earth, are irregular in structure, and of a more or less modular form. They are called the cumulus, that is the heap or pile cloud.

While the cirrus remains nebular in structure and indistinctly defined against the sky, no rain need be expected. Under the low barometer, however, they develop by accretion, become smooth and compact in structure and much enlarged in volume. They now sink lower and become sharply defined against the blue sky. Rain may now be expected, especially if they unite with the cumulus forming the nimbus rain-cloud. If the cirrus, instead of forming the nimbus, reascends, it dissipates, and no rain need be expected, until it lowers again, which generally is in twenty four hours.

WEBSTER'S PRACTICAL A NEW DEPARTURE IN DICTIONARIES.

An Industrial Revolution.—In a large Connecticut manufacturing establishment there is in operation a new style of furnace which produces more steam-power from a consumption of 1,000 lbs of coal than can be generated from 20,000 lbs burned in the ordinary way. In other words, the new contrivance already saves nineteen-twentieths of the fuel, and it is believed that before being publicly announced it will be so improved that the saving will reach 49 fiftieths! The facts already developed are simply incredible to one who has not actually seen them verified.

A Remarkable Coincidence.—While the new Furnace was in process of construction, the editors and publishers of Webster's Unabridged were engaged upon their new work which is as great an improvement upon all previous Dictionary productions, and just as valuable in its way as is the incredible fuel economizer above alluded to. Webster's Practical is not only a now compilation by the leading Dictionary House of the world, but it embodies several new features which, for ordinary use, render it pre-eminent among dictionaries—not excepting even the Unabridged.

1st, Condensation—By grouping all derivative and compound words under their root or leader (as in the "Book" example quoted below), such words are adequately treated in one-third of the space required by the old arrangement. By this means nearly all the desirable material of the four and five-dollar dictionaries is presented in a convenient and handy form in Webster's Practical.

2d, Association.—We comprehend as well as remember things chiefly by their associations. For this reason any one who shall carefully read the "Book" paragraph which we reproduce from Webster's Practical Dictionary, will not only comprehend it more readily, but will be able to remember two or three times as much as would be gained by reading about the same words when treated separately as in other works.

3d, Ready Reference.—Not only do we comprehend and remember more readily by the new grouping method, but we do it in less than a fourth of the time required when the words are classified in the old way. Hence, no one who values time would hesitate to pay one dollar for Webster's Practical rather than accept the best of the older dictionaries as a gift.

4th, Derivative Terminations.—Only the larger dictionaries hitherto published give the derivative terminations. The New American Dictionary, for instance, does not give any of the four variations of so common a word as forbear, while they are all given in Webster's Practical.

5th, The Illustrations in Webster's Practical are more numerous and better executed than those of any other abridged or low-priced dictionary.

6th, Prefixes and Suffixes.—Another important feature of Webster's Practical is its peculiar treatment of prefixes and suffixes, which is believed to be more desirable than a separate department of two or three hundred pages which is sometimes allotted to them.

7th, Compendium Matter.—Still another invaluable feature of Webster's Practical is its compendium matter, over one hundred pages of which is devoted to the most complete Pronouncing Vocabulary ever compiled of Biblical, Classical, Mythological, Historical and Geographical Proper names. With Webster's Practical Dictionary at hand, one need not be at a loss to correctly pronounce or spell the most difficult words.

8th, An Invaluable Book.—The importance of supplying every child with Webster's Practical for his very own, is not generally appreciated. As an educator it is worth a hundred times its price, and a little self-denial to provide one or more copies in every family will prove a better economy than an endowment of hoarded bank-stocks later on in life.

The following paragraph is reproduced from Webster's Practical.

Book, bŏŏk, n. A collection of sheets of paper, etc., bound together; a literary composition, written or printed; a subdivision of a literary work. (Mer.) A volume in which accounts are kept. — v. t. [BOOKED (bŏŏkt), BOOKING.] To enter, or register in a book. — Book'ish, a. Given to reading; more acquainted with books than with men. — Book'-bind'er, n. One who binds books. — -bind'ery, n. A place for binding, etc. — -bind'ing, n. Art or practice of, etc. — -case, n. A case with shelves for holding books. (Bind.) A book-cover. — -cov'er, n. (Bind.) A case for a book; a cover of cloth or other material prepared for casing a book. — -keep'er, n. One who keeps accounts. — -keep'ing, n. Art of recording mercantile transactions and keeping accounts. — -learned, -lĕrnd, a. Versed in books; ignorant of life. — -learn'ing, n. Learning acquired by reading,—esp. as opp. to practical knowledge. — -mak'er, n. One who writes and publishes books; a compiler; a sporting man who makes a record of bets. — -mak'ing, n. The practice of, etc.; compilation; systematized betting. — -mark, n. Something placed in a book by which to find a particular place. — -plate, n. A label indicating ownership, place in a library, etc., usually on the inside of the cover of a book. — -post, n. The post-office arrangement by which books are mailed. — -sell'er, n. One who sells books. — -shelf, n. A shelf to hold books. — -shop, -stall, -store, n. A place for selling books. — -stand, n. A stand for selling books in the streets; book-stall; a support to hold books. — -worm, n. A worm or mite that eats holes in books; one excessively addicted to study.

THE QUANTITY TEST.

Webster's Practical Dictionary, ($1) 600,000 Words and 1,400 Illustrations.
New American Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Popular Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Standard Dictionary, ($1) 210,000 Words and 612 Illustrations.

Quality Test.—Aside from all advantages above alluded to, there is still another and very important feature of the new work to be considered, viz.: its quality as compared with the cheap dictionaries which have had the largest sales, and which have been compiled chiefly from the old editions of Webster on which the copyrights have expired. Hence Webster's Practical contains more matter than any other dollar dictionary. Its quality, to say the least, is the very best, while its arrangement and all other new and desirable features, including first-class illustrations, paper, printing and binding are added without extra charge.

A Subscription Book.—As Webster's Practical is not for sale at book-stores, our readers will be able to procure it only from canvassing agents, unless it be ordered in connection with this journal in accordance with our special offers.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

Thurlow Weed's Great Letter

On the abduction and murder of WILLIAM MORGAN in 1826, which has been the most widely published of any Anti-masonic document. The dedication of a noble granite monument to the memory of Morgan, and the able and eloquent addresses of the Convention make this a most valuable pamphlet.

SEE WHY.

It contains—
1. Portrait of Morgan.
2. Portrait of Thurlow Weed.
3. Fine picture of the Monument.
4. The great letter of Thurlow Weed and his affidavit—almost the last public act of his life.
5. Address by J. E. Roy, D.D.
6. The monument oration by Pres. C. A. Blanchard.
7. Addresses on "Christian Politics" by Pres. J. Blanchard, on the Character of Freemasonry by Prof. E. D. Bailey, on the "Freedmen and Secret Societies" by Rev. H. H. Hinman; and very interesting personal and historical reminisenees.

IN BRIEF

It is estimated that the losses from fire in the last five years amounted to $500,000,000.

The conflagration at Toyama, Japan, May 20, destroyed 5,917 houses.

Paris has undertaken to drive the swarms of beggars from her streets.

In all South American countries Sunday is a big holiday, on which occurs the military and other parades, and the theatres and circuscs give extra matinccs.

Boston, if her authorities give the needed consent, is to have an elcvated road on which trains will be run fourteen feet above the strect surface and upon a single-rail track.

Carlotta, thc widow of Maximilan of Mexico, has been deranged ever since the execution of her unfortunate husband, but her physicians now say that with the tardy restoration of her physical health, reason has also come back to her. Carlotta will awake to a melancholy study of history.

A curious historical document concerning a Panama canal exists in the archives of Venezucla, bearing the date of 1780. It records that a canal project was broached in the reign of Philip II., and Flemish engineers surveyed the territory and declared the obstacles to be not insurmountable.

Volcanic eruptions have begun again in Java Sumeru burst into activity late in May, destroying a great coffee plantation and its force of eighty laborers. Karkatoa, in the strait of Sunda, famous for its outburst of last year, is again making itself heard; and Blietar, another volcano, is giving warnings which may portend, either an earthquake or an eruption.

The Bartholdi Pedestal Fund which the New York World has been collecting, footed up on Saturday night the handsome sum of $90,765, the result of contributions from 101,662 persons. The $100,000 needed to place the statue of Liberty ou a firm foundation is, therefore, in a fair way to be obtained.

Ethel, a Jersey cow, 2½ years old, owned by Mr. McEwin, of Columbia, Tenn., according to an official test produced in seven days thirty pounds fifteen ounces of butter—beating all records for the same agc.

At Ionia, Mich., Wednesday afternoon a man in a saloon attempted to light a match by scratching it against an empty whiskey barrel. The barrel immediately exploded with terrific force, dashing the man against an opposite wall, and blowing two others into the street. The blazing fragments of the barrel fired the saloon, and for a time there were fears of a general conflagration.

Charles Williams who has been a terror to the women of Highland Home, N. C., his scheme being to stop them on the roads and by threats secure locks of their hair, entered the chamber of a young lady a few nights ago and when her screams brought help he ran, but was captured and while being taken to jail by officers a band of masked men met them and riddled Williams with bullets.

A laughable affair occurred in the Tombs Court, New York, one day, which kept the bench and bar on a broad grin for a week. Counselor Barrett was employed to defend a young man for picking a woman's pocket, and there was not a doubt of his guilt, but on some legal quibble, after a hard fight, the counselor got his client off. The trial has been watched by a number of young thieves with a good deal of interest, as they expected to see their friend and companion go up for a couple of years at least. But Counselor Barrett succeeded in clearing him, and after he was discharged the crowd of the prisoner's friends gathered around the barrister to congratulate him on his success; there was a good deal of handshaking and many personal compliments on his eloquence and legal ability, but when the crowd parted the lawyer's watch was gone. Counselor Barrett is no saint, and it is unnecessary to say that he did not at ouce repeat the Lord's Prayer or the Apostles' Creed. The thieves scattered and Mr. B. has not yet recovered his temper or his watch, and says he'll be non suited if he ever attempts to defend a pickpocket again.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

WASHINGTON.

For the first eleven months of the past fiscal year the exports from the United States exceeded the imports by $161,285,259.

Lieutenant Commander W. H. Webb, with the Alert on the Asiatic station, has been found guilty of drunkenness, and suspended from rank and duty on furlough pay for two years.

The deficit of the postoffice department for the quarter ended March 31 was $1,665,533. It is estimated that the deficit for the present fiscal year will reach fully $6,000,000.

At present there are 327 distilleries in operation in the United States, producing daily 164,424 gallons of spirits.

COUNTRY.

The buildings and machinery of the Brighton Park Cotton Manufacturing Company, at Brighton Park just outside this city, were totally destroyed by fire Thursday afternoon, a spark from a passing locomotive igniting the roof of one of the buildings, from which the flames rapidly spread to the adjoining structures.

The Illinois State Board of Agriculture say the prospects for the oat crop are that it will be the largest ever raised in the State. The yield in 1884 reached 105,000,000 bushels.

Mrs. Jones of Buffalo fell into the river at Bath Island, Wednesday, and was carried over Niagara Falls.

The formal opening of Niagara Falls Park occurred Wednesday. Ex-Lieutenant Governor Dorsheimer made the presentation address, after which Gov. Hill accepted the reservation on behalf of the State of New York. The Governor General of Canada sent a letter expressing regret for not being present as also did S. J. Tilden. Twenty-five thousand people were present.

Joseph Palmer (colored) was hanged at Cincinnati, Wednesday morning. Under the new law this is the last execution that can take place in Hamilton county. Palmer was an accomplice of Berner, whose escape from the gallows was the leading cause of the riot in 1884.

Twelve thousand acres of tobacco have been planted in Rock county, Wisconsin, an increase over last year of 5,000.

The dwelling of Josiah M. Evans, near Grahampton, Pa., was burned Thursday night and six of his children perished in the flames. Evans, his wife and three other children narrowly escaped.

Friday was the hottest day for five years in New York, the temperature averaging 99. Eight deaths from the heat occurred in Hudson county, New Jersey.

Grasshoppers have made their appearance in northwestern Dakota near Fort Buford. Prof. Riley does not believe they are the migratory species, and has sent Mr. Berner to investigate.

A lynching party attempting to secure a negro named Wallace at Marion, Ind., confined for criminal assault, was fired upon from the jail Monday night and a young man named Kiley was killed. The mob then dispersed.

Forty-two inquests were held in New York Sunday on the bodies of persons who died directly or indirectly from the effects of heat.

General Grant, who is yet at Mt. McGregor near Saratoga, passed a very quiet Saturday night, and the day following he was much improved.

Storms and cyclones, accompanied at times with fatal results, visited Highmore and Holabird, Dakota, last Wednesday. The week before southern and western Minnesota, Oshkosh and Waupaca, Sparta and Madison, Wis., and the vicinity of Allegan, Mich, were swept with great damage to crops and buildings. Many persons were injured; some fatally.

Sixty persons were taken violently ill at Momence, Ill., Friday and two deaths occurred, from eating dried beef. A microscopic examination revealed thousands of worms to the square inch.

The plant, buildings and machinery of the New Orleans exposition were sold at auction Monday for $175,000.

George Johnson, a farmer near Eldora, Iowa, Thursday night murdered his sister-in-law, Grace Rand, with a razor. Johnson and his wife had quarreled and it is supposed that in the dark he mistook the unfortunate lady for his wife.

Oil creek at Titusville, Pa., was flooded so by a cloud bursting that bridges were wrecked and houses washed away, many persons having narrow escapes for their lives.

A cyclone passed over Rock Dell, Minn., last week Monday evening, destroying farm buildings, crops, and other property. No lives are reported lost.

Mary Clemens, aged 103 years and 2 months, died Tuesday at Youngstown, Ohio. Her father and mother lived to the age of 106 and 110, respectively.

An Indian raid was reported near Eagle Pass, Texas, in which fifteen Mexicans were killed. The cavalry having been sent to the Indian Territory, leaves that section unprotected.

Violent hailstorms at Forest Lake, Minn., River Falls, Wis., and at Saybrook, Ill., seriously damaged crops. In some instances hailstones were found measuring two inches in diameter. The losses are very heavy.

While hoisting the center of the new gasometer into position at Albany, N. Y., Tuesday, the gaff gave way, precipitating three men to the bottom of the shaft, 105 feet, killing them instantly.

Within a few days myriads of frogs have appeared at Eagle Pass (Texas) and vicinity, and have multiplied so rapidly that at present they cover the surface of the earth. Superstitious Mexicans anticipate some dire calamity.

John Roach, the ship-builder, made an assignment on Saturday, with preferred claims amounting to about $122,000. The recent decision of the Attorney General that no valid contract existed between Mr. Roach and the government was the leading cause of his failure. He expended a great amount of money on the Dolphin and the three new steel cruisers, the Boston, Atlanta and Chicago, and sees no way by which he can be reimbursed. It is also said that the trouble with the government has preyed so heavily on his mind that it has been necessary to keep a constant watch on him. When he found that there was no prospect of being reimbursed by the government he decided that the best thing he could do would be to make an assignment. He had $31,000 in bank which he drew out and paid to his employes, who number 2,500.

At Cleveland, O., last week large numbers of strikers armed themselves with shot guns and muskets and engaged in regular military drills in their settlement. The authorities ordered the Fifth Ohio Infantry, a battery of artillery, and a corps of Gattling guns to be in readiness for the first sign of an outbreak. One man died from heart disease, induced by fright in Wednesday's riot. Seven hundred Polish and Bohemian strikers attacked the plate-mill in Newburg, Wednesday night. They were met by fifty policemen, and a fight ensued in which two policemen were hit with stones and fifty strikers badly clubbed, one perhaps fatally. In Bay City 50,000 feet ot lumber was destroyed by an incendiary fire for which the strikers are supposed to be responsible. The military was required at several points to suppress the riots, but all is now quiet.

FOREIGN.

Severe shocks of earthquakes were felt Tuesday night at Smyrna and other points in the Levant.

In Spain Tuesday there were 1,555 new cases of cholera, and 653 deaths. On Thursday there were 1,406 new cases and 664 deaths. It is now admitted that cholera exists also in the provinces of Albacite and Navarre.

Paris Tuesday celebrated the anniversary of the fall of the Bastile by a grand army review, a civil societies' procession, and a parade of 10,000 schoolboys in military uniform.

A public meeting, held at Toronto Wednesday night, passed resolutions that the further admission of Chinese into Canada should be rigidly restricted if not totally prohibited.

The famine now prevalent in Kordofan, Africa, is daily claiming hundreds of victims. In certain circles at Cairo it is believed that the False Prophet is dead.

In a battle at Tamalameque recently 300 Colombian rebels were either killed or wounded.

A report in London Wednesday that the Russians had advanced in force to Zulfikar Pass caused a panicky feeling in the Stock Exchange, consols and Russian securities showing a marked decline.

A Vienna paper publishes a semi-official dispatch from St. P[illegible]burg to the effect that Russia cour[illegible]on French aid in case of a war wi[illegible]gland. The war crisis created a p[illegible]on the Paris Bourse, values experi[illegible]g a heavy fall.

The death of Judge T. Lyle Dickey, last week, makes a vacancy in the Illinois Supreme Court, and the press is already warning that care be taken in selecting candidates in view of the granting, by Judges Craig and Shope, of a supersedeas to the perjurer and election thief, Mackin. Storrs, his lawyer, has shown a persistency and energy in saving this villain from his two just sentences which should hereafter condemn him among honorable men. Mackin is possibly not a Mason, as he has a nominal connection with the Catholic church; but his master, McDonald, the great gambler and local manager for the Democratic party, is a member of the lodge. So also is Judge Craig, of Galesburg. The effect of this judicial decision is to delay the punishment of a clearly-proven and outrageous crime, if the fellow Mackin does not get clear altogether. Such travesties of justice on the part of our courts may need many bloody Cincinnati riots to counteract.

Washington has been regarded as a moral sink-hole compared with Boston, yet how honorable is the action of her authorities in respect to street preaching, when even a policeman is an open-air exhorter. Our letter this week from the political metropolis gives another encouraging fact: that President Cleveland has not only the manliness to observe the Lord's day when recreating, but even has become a publisher of evangelical literature in a small way. We hope that in the contemplated vacation which he is about taking among the Adirondacks, the President will adhere to the rule he has lately honored by observing.

If it is not constitutional with many of our great religious journals to speak plainly and to the fact concerning every evil that assails society, yet we must rejoice and continue to hope for a better spirit among them when we read such downright words as the New York Independent uses toward the Young Men's Christian Association of Tennessee. If that is "an infidel body" for rejecting Christ in the person of one of his poor followers, what, let us ask the Independent, is the character of that body which by law casts out the name of Christ from its ritual and prayers, and even from the very quotations it makes from His Word? Which makes the Bible a mere lodge-tool; and in its higher degrees practices the blasphemy of swearing infidels and vicious men to protect the Christian religion with their swords; performs the rite of baptism; and keeps Good Friday and Easter, and has a Paschal Supper as a kind of joke? The lodge is eminently religious, but the young men of America are being destroyed wholesale by the lodge for want of such an honest sentence as the Independent gives to the Tennessee Y. M. C. A.

The Boston courts are not so liberal as we were led to believe from a report which stated that the authorities had given permission for preaching on the Common, after having arrested Dr. A. J. Gordon, H. L. Hastings, W. F. Davis and others. When the trial of William F. Davis, the Michigan lumberman evangelist, came off, the law was rigidly applied and the fine fixed. An appeal was taken and a higher court may decide according to truth and righteousness that the city ordinance is contrary to State and National Constitution. A second attempt at a religious meeting when only hymns were sung and passages of Scripture were read, was made the occasion of another arrest and the imposition of a fine thrice as great as at the first. Verily the glory of Boston has departed since a Romanist mayor, born in Ireland, seconded by a rum-seller as chairman of the committee on public grounds, can prevent the proclamation of the Gospel in its simplest form. H. L. Hastings, the editor of the Christian, has powerfully attacked the Boston authorities in his last paper. He says: "A city government which supports Sunday band concerts on the Common, licenses Sunday Buffalo Bill exhibitions and Pawnee war-dances on Beacon Park, and allows Sunday rum-shops and gambling dens to flourish like green bay trees, naturally has conscientious objections to open-air preaching, and so has for a long time utterly refused to grant any one permits to preach the Gospel upon any of the public grounds of the city of Boston."

The committee on the French budget has been figuring at the cost of the campaign in Tonquin and set the figure at 470,000,000 francs, or 23,500,000 dollars, only about one-half of which has been voted. One administration has already gone down under this load of foreign war, and if another does not, under the present financial distress of the nation, in raising the entire sum, it will be an unusual time in French politics. This, too, is but a small part of the cost, since the sacrifice of life to an unhealthy climate has been even greater than that made by the enemy. The French have cemeteries in many climes. To go back no further than the accession of Louis Napoleon in 1851, upwards of 120,000 Frenchmen are mouldering away in the Crimea; 40,000 died in Italy; 35,000 in Mexico; and 10,000 in sundry other distant expeditions. These figures do not touch upon the immense sacrifice made upon the altar of imperialism in the war with Prussia.

The death of General Grant removes from the scene of his activity and success one who has had the best that the world could offer of honors and titles and fame and wealth and power. That toward the close of his long sickness he turned to the consideration of another life is a relief to those who had reason to fear that the affairs of this had left him no place for those far more important. The universal eulogy which is poured forth from press, pulpit and rostrum is evidence that years must pass before a just and honest judgment will be given upon a life so useful to his country, so successful in war, and yet so often failing in other public and private positions. One sentimental Methodist preacher has already placed his name on the saints' calendar, who probably a few years ago was savagely denouncing his public acts. There is no doubt that months of suffering have atoned in the public mind for whatever the past might criticise, and there is no discord in the voice now raised in universal eulogy.

THE REIGN OF LAW.

BY REV. H. H. HINMAN.

The security of liberty is law. All governments have the same general objects, namely to provide for the general defense, promote domestic tranquility and secure the blessings of liberty to the people. This is the object of law, nor can it be accomplished except the laws are faithfully executed. The form of government is of less consequence than its stability and efficiency. No government is perfect, and even the worst is better than the rule of the mob. True patriotism coincides with true religion in demanding that every soul be subject to the higher powers." The great Master gave us the example of paying taxes to the Roman Empire, and has commanded us to render unto Cæsar (human governments) "the things that be Cæsar's and unto God the things that be God's." Nero was a tyrant, and yet Paul exhorted men to obey him, for his government was manifestly better than none, and they that resisted it resisted "the ordinance of God."

Nor does the doctrine of a higher law at all interfere with this great law of subjection. Daniel in refusing to worship the king offered no resistance to his authority, but patiently accepted the alternative of penalty in the lion's den. When Peter and John affirmed that "we ought to obey God rather than man they proposed no resistance to authority, but practically reaffirmed the rule of human law when its requirements were not in conflict with the commands of God. Those who have held to the doctrines of the "higher law" have ever been the firmest friends and supporters of human governments.

The greatest apparent danger to this nation is a want of reverence for the authority of law. In Cincinnati, Chicago and Cleveland great masses of people set the law at defiance and the authorities are forced to compromise. Life and property are held at the mercy of the mob and there seems to be no great and general protest against this breaking down of all authority and law. Violations of the liquor law are everywhere winked at. This spirit of lawlessness is world-wide. Just now the most shameful and terrible violations of the laws of Great Britain are being brought to light and instead of favoring the exposure and punishment of these abominations of the aristocratic and wealthier classes, the authorities are making every effort to prohibit and punish the exposer. A similar state of things exists in this city. There are streets full of houses of infamy and where but a small percentage of the families are living in a legal relation, and yet a prompt exposure would be met as in London, with a most powerful resistance.

Doubtless the prevalence of secret orders has much to do with this general lawlessness. They are a law unto themselves, and bound by oaths which they do or do not keep as shall seem most convenient. This leads to a weakening of the bonds of all laws and all oaths, and opens the way for the flood-gates of crime and the overthrow of all legitimate authority.

I can conceive of no reform more needful than an awakening of the public conscience in this matter, and an earnest demand in the name of all that is valuable to national peace, as well as to individual well-being, that the laws made by our National and State legislatures shall be executed, and that all resistance must be put down.

Washington, D. C.

In a sermon published in 1760, John Wesley says: "Drams of spirituous liquors are liquid fire, and all who manufacture or sell them, except for medicines, are poisoners generally. They murder his Majesty's subjects by wholesale—they drive them to hell like sheep. The curse of God is in their gardens, their walks, their groves. Blood—blood is there. The foundation, the floor, the walls, the roofs of their dwellings are stained with blood!"

—The report comes from Madagascar, which we are unwilling to credit, that the Prime Minister, who has shown such an earnest attachment to Christianity, has been strangled through the intrigues of the French emissaries whose aggressions he has so patriotically withstood.

LETTER FROM ASIA MINOR.

BISHOP RRYENNIOS PRACTICES A NEW DIDACHE.

ADA BAZAR, June 26th, 1885.

The earnest efforts of our church to evangelize the villages around Ada Bazar have, with God's blessing, been very successful in a village four miles from Ada Bazar. This is a destitute Greek village where ignorance has reigned for centuries, where the tidings of salvation were never preached and where superstition and licentiousness abound like the weeds that grow in a fallow ground. To this village our brethren frequently went, some for trade, others to sell Bibles; so that many of the villagers heard the Gospel, and for two years a small number of Greeks used to meet for reading the Scriptures and mutual edification. Of late their number was increasing. In fact, within the last year the influence of the Gospel has immensely increased while bigotry, prejudice and drunkenness have very much diminished in the village.

But Philotheos Bryennios, bishop of Nicomedia, and publisher of that famous book, the "Teaching of the Apostles," being apprised of this movement went to this village and called before him one by one the Protestants of this village to answer to him the reason of their hope. He asked them foolish questions, such as: "Why, if you are orthodox Christians, do you not kiss and worship the pictures of the saints?" and as they could not even listen to such claims he excommunicated them, saying to the priests "not to allow them to enter their church, nor to bury their dead and nobody should salute them. They are anathematized."

In thus excommunicating them the bishop thought to stop the progress of the truth; but he was mistaken. After the excommunication one of the villagers was heard saying, "Now half of the village will become Protestant." We ask the prayers of the people of God for these persecuted brethren.

We all enjoyed very much the services of Dr. Somerville in Ada Bazar. When we invited him we thought few will care to attend his preaching and the chances of success are small. But our surprise and delight was great when we found an audience of from 400 to 550 Armenians, with a few Greeks, Mohammedans and Jews, listening with profound interest to the truths he preached and to interpreters translated into Armenian and Turkish. Those who heard him were highly entertained at the same time that they received his instruction and counsel. The Rev. Doctor's interesting way of telling stories and expounding Scriptures, his addresses so full of love to Christ, so free from reference to points of controversy, will not be soon forgotten. They were received with cordiality and thankfulness—even with kissing his hand. This visit is a new thing in Bithynia. Here is an old minister of the Gospel from Scotland who "assayed to go into Bithynia" and the Spirit suffered him, and he did a world of good to the people there. ALEXANDER DJEJIZIAN.

LEAVEN.

BY ELDER ALBERT SIMS.

The grace of God is compared to leaven for three reasons:

1. Because of its changing properties. The property of leaven is to change, or to assimilate to its own nature, the meal or dough with which it is mixed. This is its legitimate work or use. In precisely the same manner, only to an infinitely greater extent, is this true of redeeming grace. Its office is to change the soul into its own likeness, and God intends that this spiritual leaven shall remain in the soul until the whole shall resemble his own image. Mark you, leaven never changes the substance of the meal or flour, but only its quality. So with divine grace; physically and mentally we remain the same. In this sense, the "new creature" is the same after conversion as before; but in his character there has been a transformation, just as great and visible as there is in dough, after the yeast has been put into it.

Leaven possesses an extensive capacity for changing. This is intimated by the great quantity of meal spoken of in the parable of the leaven; which, according to our computation, would be a little over four pecks and a quarter. So with the Gospel leaven; a very small quantity of it can change a whole mass of sinners.

"A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump." Gal. 5: 9. Only a few illiterate fishermen went from that upper room in Jerusalem to scatter the knowledge of full salvation; but what a tremendous revolution they soon accomplished! With this mysterious influence—this divine power—they soon got individuals, then families, then whole neighborhoods, and by and by whole nations, in a state of fermentation. So universal was the influence which they exerted, that when they entered a certain place, the inhabitants cried out, "These men, who have turned the world upside down, are come hither also." But it was not the men—it was the leaven they carried with them—leaven which worked on in spite of men and devils, that did the blessed work. Emperors tried to put a stop to it, but they could not destroy it by force of arms, fire or water. An invisible spiritual power cannot be annihilated by physical force.

2. The grace of God is like leaven, because it commences its work from within, instead of from without. It would be almost useless to name the multitude of human schemes that, for ages, have been adopted to reform and save men. Philosophers, and wise men of every class, have drawn up their systems of morality with the avowed purpose of making men pure and good.

Wild enthusiasts and false prophets have sent forth their rules for the renovation of the human race, and the prevention of sin. Buddhism, Mohammedanism, Mormonism, Rationalism, and a numerous host of other human systems, have each in their turn tried to bring about the moral reformation of depraved man; but what has been the result? Why all of them, without any exception, have signally failed.

Not a single individual can be pointed to as having been raised up out of the gutter of sin, and made a new creature by their instrumentality. But why these blank failures? Our answer is, because morality is totally unable to reform and save man; his disease lies deeper than it is possible for human rules to reach and remove; and unless his heart be first made clean, vain are the attempts to improve and regulate his life. Yet this has been all that any system of morality has ever been able to accomplish. While it has sought to purify the streams, the corruption of the fountain, from whence they proceed, has been left untouched.

As well may we try to make a watch give right time, while the works are all in confusion and out of order, as attempt to mould the conduct of a man after a Divine copy, while his soul is steeped, yes, dead in sin. Unlike all human remedies, the Christian religion commences within—it begins with the fountain—it strikes at the very root of the sinner's corruption, and casts out the foul disease. His heart is first renovated and cleansed, and then his life, of a necessary consequence, becomes beautiful and Godlike. It is not said of the woman that she put the leaven around the meal, but in it, and, commencing there, it operated upon the whole quantity of meal.

3. The grace of Christ is distinguished by the thoroughness of its operations. It accomplishes an entire re-construction, a radically new creation, "till the whole is leavened."

No more striking illustration of the thoroughly effective power of Christianity can be given than this. Let the grace of God be implanted in the soul of man, and it will permeate and purify his whole being. It will not only make his external conduct upright, but it will also purify his very thoughts, motives and intentions. It will not only save him from actual sin, but take away his love for it, and implant a disposition to be holy in its stead. Human systems may point out the road, but they can never help us walk in it; they may give us directions for the regulation of our conduct, but they are entirely unable to assist us in observing them. The Gospel of the grace of God not only tells us what life we should live, but it enables us to live it. It not only prescribes duties, but it gives us strength to perform them. The Gospel comes to the poor, helpless sinner, and, pointing out to him the way of light and life, it sets his feet on it, and sends him on to glory. Glory be to God forever!

What has this Gospel done? Why, that which no man, or any number of men, will ever be able to relate. It has done work that will never be chronicled in the annals of the world, and it will be made manifest only at the judgment day. It has lifted up thousands from the deepest depths of infamy and vice, yes, millions of the depraved sons of Adam, and transformed them into pure and Christ-like beings! It has reformed tyrannical governments, civilized the barbarian, and enlightened the dark and superstitious. It has changed the man-eater into a worshiper of Christ, and abolished the bloody, cruel practices of the Hindoos. It has taught the thief to be honest, and the drunkard to be sober. It has taught the selfish benevolence, and the proud humility. It has brought light into regions of darkness and death, joy into hearts stricken with sorrow, and peace into the troubled soul. It has raised institutions for the instruction of the ignorant, homes for the destitute, hospitals for the sick, and refuges for the outcast. It has studded the land with houses of prayer, Sabbath-schools for the young, and it has sent men into every part of the habitable globe, to proclaim liberty to the captive, sight to the blind, and life for the dead.

SPEAK, TELL, SING!

BY REV. J. P. HUTCHINSON.

To Lewis G. Clark ("George Harris"):

Speak, George, speak!
Speak of freedom thou hast won,
Speak of slavery which is done,
Speak of sins that we must shun,
Speak, George, speak!

Tell, George, tell!
Tell the story of thy race,
Tell the wonders of God's grace,
Tell them out in every place,
Tell, George, tell!

To George W. Clark:

Sing, George, sing!
Softly as the morning light,
Loudly as the thunder's might,
Of the surely coming right,
Sing, George, sing!

FALSE WORSHIPS.

[From the Republican-Register, Galesburg, Ill., July 18.]

The last scripture lesson of the international series gives an account of the setting in Bethel and in Dan the golden calves, or the imitations of cherubim, by Jeroboam, and thereby establishing idolatry in his kingdom. No comments we have seen, upon this passage, ascribe any intention on the part of Jeroboam of introducing image worship into Israel, but the cherubic forms he meant only for symbols of Jehovah. Yet having adopted the form of idolatry it soon led to the sin itself. However gladly he might have seen his people engage in the true worship of God, still for mere considerations of expediency he astutely maintained the dereliction, so that the man and his state policy have been characterized and handed down to all subsequent time by the phrase, "Jeroboam, the son of Nebat who made Israel to sin."

In comparing the act of this worldly-wise monarch with some recent events imposed upon the citizens of his county, we would like to know in what respects his motives or his acts in setting up the golden calves and having his nation worship Jehovah before them was worse than the motives and acts of those who joined in invoking the blessings of the Great Moral Governor of the Universe with the attendant pagan rites of scattering corn and pouring libations of wine and oil at the laying of the corner-stone of our new court house. The form of worship in the one case is no more false and unchristian than are the rites in the other. If the former provoked the Lord God of Israel to anger," why would not the latter? If one leads to idolatry, why does not the other? The conscientiously careful Canon Cook evidently believes that they do; and that even the cromlechs, the ancient Druidical altars for human sacrifice, may have had their origin in this practice of anointing the stone with oil.

> There are vast numbers of our best citizens and Christians whose consciences are deeply offended, not at what other people do, but at what they themselves have been compelled to do in this matter. A vast number will not inquire into nor care about the significance of those "mystic rites," but a vast number do care, when they are made parties to them; ask them what they understand by this scattering of corn and pouring libations upon the ground and they will promptly answer—"Devil worship." That may sound like a harsh and uncharitable judgment, but there is no mistaking what it did mean up to the time of its abolishment by Christianity, and what it does now mean in pagan lands—whatever it may mean in the Masonic ritual. It is a very ancient rite—doubtless the most ancient of all religious rites, except, possibly burnt offerings. Its object was to placate the spirits below, as the burnt offerings were to placate the spirits above—hence it was demon worship. It was found fully established in Western Asia and in Greece and Egypt at the dawn of history. Whatever may now be meant to Freemasons—they speak of them as 'emblems'—they constitute a religious rite."

But the idea will no doubt be scouted as puerile, that we of this enlightened nineteenth century are in any danger of being led through these rites to image worship, or to the gross idolatries to which they have led before. Possibly so. But let us see to what the votaries of the fraternity which practice these rites have already been led. Beyond all question the method established by Jeroboam, brought none of its devotees into communion with God in the sense of a true and accepted worshiper. How then can these rites do more? Especially as they, and all the ritual, including even the prayers, used at the recent ceremony here, ignored all intimation of Christ as the way of access to the "Supreme Architect," or any mention of his merits as the ground for bestowing the bounties and blessings invoked. In such a service and worship we beheld them engaged. Of such methods of worship "the great and good Dr. Edward Beecher" has faithfully and trenchantly testified. After mentioning a certain fundamental and vital principle of Christianity, he then states two more and continues as follows, viz:

"2. There is access to the true God only through Christ. 'I am the way, and the truth, and the life. No man cometh unto the Father but through me.'

"3. Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father; but he that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also."

"All Christian churches are based on these truths, and the center and culmination of their worship is this recognition of Christ in the sacrament as the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world. Christ, too, is the center of the worship of heaven. Hence, if Christians associate with others in worship, it can rightly be only on the ground that the worship centers in Christ, and acknowledges him as Lord to the glory of the Father.

"Hence, if for the sake of extending an organization, men are admitted of all religions—Pagans, Mohammedans, Deists, Jews, —and if, for the sake of accommodating them with a common ground of union, Christ is ignored, and the God of nature or of creation is professedly worshipped, and morality inculcated solely on natural grounds, then such worship is not accepted by the real God and Father of the universe, for He looks on it as involving the rejection and dishonor, nay the renewed crucifixion of his Son. As to Christ, he tolerates no neutrality. He who is not for him is against him. These principles do not involve the question of secrecy. They hold true of all societies, open or secret.

"If, on such anti-Christian grounds prayers are framed, rites established, and chaplains appointed, ignoring Christ and his Intercession, God regards it as a mockery and an insult to himself and his church. In it is revealed the hatred of Satan to Christ. By it Christ is dethroned and Satan exalted."

In the light of such a declaration how does the service and worship just alluded to appear? The order that professedly through its calling is led to contemplate and worship the Creator, that longs to "look through nature up to nature's God," and then purposely diverts attention from Him who said that to know him was to know the Father; from Him "who is the outshining of his Father's glory," "and the very image of his substance," is, to prove, notwithstanding its lofty professions, "that the light is come into the world" indeed, but it loves the darkness rather than the light, for its works are evil. Yet such crafts may not come to cromlechs, to be sure, while Fort Niagaras and Niagara rivers are at hand. However, some may think the animus and the religion of the lodge is not the same now as in Morgan's day.

Had a union soldier, but now a clergyman, a former citizen of Knox county, been a spectator of the recent corner-stone ceremony, he would probably have looked on with one eye bandaged, as the emblems of royalty filed by into the court house campus. For, only the month before, at the county seat of a county in this State, which boasts the first martyr to the cause of free speech and a free press, he was felled to the ground by a stone, hurled from a pro-Masonry mob, while delivering a public address against the order which practices the ritual we are discussing; and while he was particularly referring to the interference of Masons at the trial of the murderer of Ellen Slade, which Judge Whitney exposed, and then renounced Masonry. But as it may be claimed that they were not Masons who engaged in the dastardly outrage upon the Rev. George T. Dissette, yet the lodge at Tuscola has consented thereto by not publicly expressing its abhorence for a method of defense, which no good cause needs; and in an adjoining town, avowedly Masons justified the deed, and said he ought to have been murdered.

Thus as the State policy, and the religious practices of Jeroboam, cleverly obtained that permanent secession of the ten tribes which he sought, yet they corrupted the public virtue, and became the fruitful source of the conspiracies which destroyed in his own family the succession to the kingdom, and eventually wrought its destruction, so may we well fear, that the false and anti-Christian worship of the lodge —which has already become the foster-mother of a brood of secret orders and unions from which come outbursts of mobs, assassination, riot, and revolution all over the world, may yet corrupt our national life to the total subverting of the ends of liberty, and justice. and equity, for the establishing of which our government was instituted. E. P. CHAMBERS.

A CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION WITHOUT CHRIST.

A few months ago three colored women purchased first-class tickets on a Chesapeake bay steamer, but were denied first-class sleeping apartments. They brought suit against the steamboat company in a district court, and were awarded $100 each damages. The decision was appealed to the circuit court, which, however, a few weeks ago, reaffirmed the decision, and ordered the damages to stand. This settles the question of a negro passenger's rights on all Chesapeake steamers. But, more than this it honors the constitutional law of the land.

Just about the same time that the circuit court in Maryland was honoring the law by the righteousness of its decision in respect to the rights of colored people as citizens, a body of professedly Christian men in Tennessee were dishonoring the Gospel by the unrighteousness of their decision in respect to the rights of colored people as Christians. A Young Men's Christian Association Convention was to meet at Murfreesboro. Previous to the meeting, it was noised abroad that colored delegates were to be present. This created considerable uneasiness, not only on the part of the Y. M. C. A. committee, but also on the part of the church in whose house the meetings were to be held. Finally the church committee announced that, if colored delegates were to be received, the church building could not be had under any circumstances. The Y. M. C. A. committee assured them that the negroes would not be received. When the time came, however, a colored man from Nashville, indignant at the treatment he had just received on the train, made his appearance at the church. He was advised by a "brother" that he was not wanted on the inside, that he had better go away quietly, and not try to force his way in. Considerable conversation took place, during which the colored brother wanted to know how about his railroad fare back to Nashville, if he did not attend the convention. The white brethren assured him that they would "arrange" that matter, if he would only go. A member of that convention, on his return, reported to a public audience the way in which he had handled the matter. "I took him aside and said to him: 'You surely want to do in this matter as Christ would have done. And what would Christ have done if he had come to a place where he was told plainly that he was not wanted? He would not have forced himself into such a place, but would have gone quietly away and let them hold their Christian Association without him.'" It is needless to add that the young colored man withdrew. A gentleman who heard the above report, says that it was made seemingly without the slightest sense on the part of the speaker of any incongruity.

Incongruities indeed! The state gives equality to the negro, and the church denies it. The church which ought to lead the state drags behind it. The Young Men's Christian Association, of Tennessee, is an infidel body. In denying that poor, black man it has denied Christ. It cast Christ out of its membership, told him he was not wanted, and thrust in his hand a return ticket to Nashville. When Christ comes back, he may be expected to come in judgment, with a whip of small cords to the hirelings and money-changers that infest his temple; for Christ does come sometimes when and where he is not wanted.—The Independent.

A GRAND ARMY INSTALLATION.

The Sandy Lake, Pa., News editor, Rev. L. I. Crawford, lately attended an installation of a G. A. R. post, and thus describes it:

Space and time will not permit a review of the formalities gone through in the ceremonies. To one not familiar with the red tape routine of army regulations many things seemed more boyish than manly. The oath of office was slowly mouthed, clause by clause, by those taking the oath, at the dictation of the administrator of the ordinance. Each oath ended with "So help me God," a phrase plainly implying a solemn appeal to the Almighty and clearly proving, when taken with uplifted hand as in this case, that it is a religious oath. Where the G. A. R., a purely human and voluntary association, acquired the moral and legal right to administer the ordinances of the oath, we never could find out. Neither church nor state seems to have given this ordinance of religion that may properly be administered by both over into the hands of any unresponsible human organization. Such able writers as Junkin and Cheever do not grant that any but the church or state may administer this ordinance of the Christian religion. Those who do so usurp undue authority. A long history of the origin, aims and objects of the G. A. R. was read by Capt.—— Barr. Its excellencies, which were many, were much marred by a weak attempt to defend secret societies in answer to the objection raised that the G. A. R. is such an association. The sophistry of the Captain's reading on this part was the common one used of confounding privacy and secrecy and trying to show that while good things may be done in private for prudential reasons, people may go into the secret lodge where is done much evil. Christ taught his disciples privately and yet he said, "In secret have I said nothing." Why did he make and mention this distinction if there was no difference between privacy and secrecy? There is a world of difference between them. The argument was weak, and while it started out apparently to defend the G. A. R. from the charge of being a secret oath-bound order, had the logical effect of leaving the impression that it is open to the serious objection of being such an organization.

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER XXVI.—Concluded.

To apply for a demit and leave the lodge forever was the one desire now in Stephen's mind. "Come out and be ye separate" seemed to sound like an audible command in his ears. "What concord hath Christ with Belial? or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?"

His request, however, was received with strong demurrers, which in the case of a few of the members took a form nearly allied to threats.

"Now what should you want to leave us for?" asked one. "Haven't you always been treated well by the lodge?"

"I have no fault to find on that score," said Stephen, briefly. "My reasons for withdrawing have already been stated."

"Now I tell you, in your peculiar situation as a temperance lawyer fighting the liquor party all the time, you need the protection of the lodge, and if you leave it you run more risk than you think."

This warning came from a man prominent in the Van Gilder clique, and Stephen, considering the source from which it proceeded, did not mind it much till it was repeated in various terms by others of much higher social respectability. His naturally independent spirit cared very little for these undisguised attempts at intimidation, but it showed him still another side of this many-sided order. It was willing then to protect an honest man in his warfare against evil, but he must buy that protection in the same way a rogue buys his immunity from the grasp of justice—by paying dues and learning signs and grips! He wrote a long letter home—a letter which caused much astonishment in the Howland homestead—in which he thus alluded to his experience in the lodge on the night he took his withdrawal card:

"I only did what I had a perfect right to do, yet many in the lodge have taken great offense at the step. To be sure they are the least respectable members, but they are the very ones with the will to do me harm. Honestly, such were the looks and demeanor of some of those men towards me that I should extremely dislike the idea of meeting them alone in the woods on a dark night."

"To think Stephen should have joined the Odd-fellows! Who'd have thought it! Would you, mother?"

This was Mr. Josiah Howland's first observation.

"Not that exactly," answered Mrs. Phœbe, as she folded the letter with hands that trembled, "but you know, father, we've both of us been a little troubled for fear Stephen might have backslidden, and lately I have been filled with such deep concern, and my whole soul has been so drawn out to agonize with the Lord for him that I have felt sure he was in some kind of a snare."

There is such a thing as spiritual second sight. Mrs. Phœbe was one thus gifted, and her husband reverenced it in her as something he did not himself possess, and did not quite understand. He had "lathered" his face preparatory to shaving, and now he stood before the little ten by twelve looking-glass thoughtfully "stropping" his razor.

"But I never dreamed Stephen would ever be trapped into any of these godless secret societies," he repeated, the idea every time he thought of it seeming to come with a fresh surprise.

"Why not Stephen as soon as any one?" queried Mrs. Phœbe Howland, as she put the letter away, and went quietly about some household task.

"Well, I don't know why," returned Mr. Josiah in a kind of startled fashion, as if this was a new way of looking at the matter; "only I thought we had trained him better than that."

"Maybe the Lord is training him now, father."

Mr. Josiah pondered this over while he was shaving, as was his fashion of pondering his wife's sayings. These expressions of her finer spiritual nature that would never in the world have occurred to him, found a ready soil of appreciation in his heart where they blossomed in higher faith and profounder trust, for he had a timid and doubting side, and with all his New England patrimony of shrewd common sense it was beautiful to see how in every difficulty he turned to her clearer insight for counsel. "Somehow Phœbe could always see into things," he would say.

"Maybe that's so, mother. But I can't help feeling afraid for Stephen. Perhaps he stands in no danger from the Odd-fellows, but one can't tell in these secret societies, and I do wish he'd kept clear of them. They may do something to him yet. And there's the liquor men, they are dreadfully rampant out there. I was reading in the paper only yesterday how they set on a young temperance attorney in one place and beat him most to death with cudgels."

Mrs. Phœbe Howland grew a trifle paler at these words, and drew her breath quick like one stabbed by sharp and sudden pain. Then she stood straight up before her husband with a deep, solemn light in her dark eyes.

"Father, you and I gave Stephen to the Lord as soon as he was born. When did we ever take back the gift?"

Mr. Josiah finished shaving in silence.

CHAPTER XXVII.

THE AVENGER.

Jesse Dukes was sitting in his low cabin door. The river flowed past with a sweet, hardly definable murmur; the woods were a ring of emerald set against sapphire; a soft wind just stirred their leaves with a faint spirit-like motion; the light wreaths of smoke which ascended from his pipe seemed only a part of all this tranquil beauty; and the figure of the trapper himself as he sat leaning back, his eyes half-closed, and every muscle relaxed in lazy enjoyment of the fine weather, presented no disturbing element in the scene. In fact Jesse Dukes came of a race who are gifted with far more of the Italian dolce far niente than of the Yankee restlessness and vim, and think nothing of taking their time to smoke and sleep out of any part of the day which suits them best. He knew that one his traps needed mending, and by and by he was going to attend to it. Meanwhile he felt in no hurry. The summer days were long in his little cabin, and there would be plenty of time to smoke his pipeful of tobacco before he set to work.

He was not ill-supplied with reading matter, such as it was. Copies of some ancient magazine lent him by the neighbors lay piled up on his rude table, and from the same source he often received the loan of an old newspaper. If a month or even a year had intervened since the date of publication, it made no difference. He read it with as much interest.

The mountaineer of the Southwest is by nature a fierce political partisan, and retains the freshness of first convictions to an extent apt to waken a smile in places where the mail comes daily, and the constant shifting of factions, reversing to-morrow the positions they hold to-day, and uniting to-day on questions at which they were at sword's points yesterday, so often makes the average voter doubtful of his real standing place. Nowhere else can be found the genuine Andrew Jackson Democrat, who, in his fealty which is, like that of an old French Legitimist, less to a person than an idea, cannot be made to realize that the party has chosen new gods to go before it. And it has its pathetic as well as its amusing side—this stubborn tenacity with which he will hold on to principles which that party has long cast out of its platform, and be ready to fight to the death for a political leader, years after that leader has stepped out of the ranks of the living. Jesse Dukes came of such a family. He was one himself and gloried in it. At the same time we must confess that he would have been a most inconvenient member to take active part in a Democratic convention of the present day.

Finally he rose up and stretched himself with a mighty yawn—he was over six feet and his head reached nearly to the cabin roof—laid his pipe carefully away on the shelf, and was about to turn his attention to the broken trap, when, in his search for some paper to clean it with, he came across a part of a Democratic political speech. To the majority of newspaper readers it would have been like a piece of very stale apple pie, but Mr. Dukes proceeded at once to devour it with a keen appreciation of what seemed to him the most telling points. He was a prohibitionist, but like thousands of Southern Democrats who lean that way, he could not see how inextricably his beloved party had mortgaged itself to the rum power; and if anybody wonders at such benighted ignorance on the part of this simple Tennesseean, the blindness of the average Republican will present him with as great a marvel. He was also, as we have seen, an Anti-mason of the intensest type, but he was entirely ignorant—an ignorance shared however by the mass of historical students—of that bit of American political history in which the lodge played so important a part when it made Andrew Jackson President, and thus prevented its inveterate foe, John Quincy Adams, from filling the Presidential chair for a second term.

He had finished it, and was about to appropriate the paper to its intended use when his eye rested on a local paragraph in which occurred a name that had not crossed his mind for ten years save linked with a curse. His face changed terribly when he saw it. The lazy, shiftless, good-natured trapper had the failings as well as the virtues of the mountain race from which he sprung—grateful for the smallest benefit, quick to avenge the smallest affront, a trusty friend and an implacable foe.

REFORM NEWS.

THE LECTURERS' TRAINING SCHOOL.

The plan of a Training School at Wheaton is meeting with general approval and bids fair to be a success. It will probably commence on the 17th of August, and continue two weeks, more or less. Some who are especially interested and experienced with whom I wish to consult are absent, but expect to return soon, in time to make up the programme for next issue. It is safe to say that the opening day of the convention will be observed as a day of fasting and prayer, in which friends are earnestly requested to unite. Evenings will be devoted to public lectures by different members of the convention and probably a portion of the time may be used in canvassing Wheaton and neighboring towns with anti-secrecy literature. Let all who wish to enter the reform work of the N. C. A., or as agents of any State Association write me at once. The fields are ripe for the harvest, and prayer unceasing should be made to the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers. Who will go work in the vineyard? and who pray the Lord of the vineyard?

J. P. STODDARD.

THE OHIO CONVENTION.

The Ohio State Association, opposed to secret orders, held a convention in Cedarville, Ohio, on the 7th and 8th of July. Delegates from abroad were not numerous, but enough were present to make it lively and interesting. There was a good attendance of citizens at the sessions when addresses were delivered. At such conventions secret order men are generally conspicuous by their absence. Strange that men who profess to be "seekiug light" should be so regardless of opportunity for finding it. But I suppose "lodge light" is about the only kind that suits them. Addresses were delivered by Rev. J. H. Wright of Xenia, Dr. J. G. Carson of the same place, J. P. Stoddard, General Agent for the National Christian Association, and others. The meeting was more particularly for the purpose of organizing the State forces against secretism, some time having elapsed since any effective work has been done in the State against the secret empire. A State agent was selected to labor part of the year, and a State Convention was appointed to meet in the city of Columbus on December 15, 1885, at which some of the best speakers in this and adjoining States will deliver addresses. It is thus intended to carry the war right into the very seat of the dark beast, and by a sharp and decisive campaign, endeavor to make the influence of the convention felt in high places. There is no influence in our land more detrimental to true reform than secretism. "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father" can never have its perfect and universal manifestation in the world, until the secret empire of darkness is overthrown and rooted out.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted by the convention:

Whereas, Our land is filled with a host of secret oath-bound societies, whose members are pledged to each other for certain ends and purposes, by obligations and secret oaths and penalties which are false and blasphemous in their character;

Therefore, We denounce their secrecy and darkness in the name of him who said, "I am come a light into the world," "I spake openly to the world, and in secret have I said nothing," "Ye are the light of the world."

2. Because, in this land of light and liberty, where avenues to material, intellectual, ecclesiastical, and political advancement are open to all, secret orders, with their efforts to advance the interests of a certain class only, are absolutely unnecessary and an insult, and dangerous to free government.

3. We denounce their oaths and penalties as false and blasphemous and unlawfully administered.

4. We denounce their unbounded selfishness and clannishness as utterly opposed to that Christian charity which is as broad as the world.

5. We denounce the whole system of secretism as wrong in itself and hurtful in its tendency.

(1). It is hurtful to the best interests of civil government, in that it hinders the ends of justice in courts of justice, and places political power in the hands of many who are utterly unqualified to exercise it.

(2). It is hurtful to the best interests of the church of Christ, it keeps men out of the church and away from the Saviour by satisfying them with an emasculated, Christless religion, and brings Christians into unlawful covenant relation with the world, which is the enemy of Christ.

(3). It is hurtful to the best interests of temperance and sobriety. It is the friend of the saloon, and sustains and encourages the liquor traffic by its banquets, and by its rites and ceremonies in which intoxicating liquors are used.

(4). We are opposed to the principle of secrecy in temperance organizations, as not only unnecessary but hurtful to the cause of temperance.

(5). It desecrates the Sabbath and destroys its sacredness, by its processions with bands of music and by its ostentatious shows; and we enter our solemn protest against the action of the National Encampment of the G. A. R. at Portland, Maine, in authorizing Sabbath, May 30th, 1886, to be observed as Decoration Day.

(6). We denounce secretism because of its essentially unchristian character, and we hold that it is the duty of the church of Christ to disfellowship all those who swear its false oaths and take a part in its heathenish ceremonies.

(7). We denounce the whole system of secretism as a gigantic fraud, both as to its pretended history and empty promises—a training-school for falsehood.

(8). We hereby resolve that we will continue to labor and pray for the protection of the nation, the church, and our families from the baleful influences which must ever flow from institutions organized upon the basis of a false charity and a false religion.

CAMPAIGNING IN CANADA.

BRIGHT, Ontario, Canada, July 21, 1885.

When last you heard from me I was on the way to

to speak on Odd-fellowship, at the invitation of brother Shultz, the E. L. minister. He is of that branch of Lutherans who court discussion and refuse fellowship to secretists. He is a native of Konigsburg, Prussia, but understands English very well. He has the Cynosure carefully bound in yearly volumes and and extensive and well-selected library of Anti-masonic works. For some years, at first, his field was infested with secretists, but he bought Anti-masonic works and preached constantly on the subject till there is not one in the communion of the church who is not OPPOSED TO FREEMASONRY. He has peace within and presents an unbroken phalanx to the enemy without. In addition to a work in a large congregation he edits the church paper in German, and through the press as well as the pulpit is spreading light. But he needs rest for he is working very hard. May God sustain him.

The chief tavern-keeper was boasting that he "would go lively for the lecturer should he dare to speak against Odd-fellowship." I was asked if it would not be better to desist. But that was not to be thought of. So we went forward with the meeting. A large representative meeting of the Anti-masonic community assembled in an old school-house. All went well. The lecture was appreciated by friends of the cause and placed the church in the true light that refused communion to deistic secretists. The village paper, the Elmira Advertiser, boasts that "taken all in all, the lecture is likely to do more good than material harm to the lodge." Yes, all the Christians who see that they buy "charity" of secretists at the expense of the "Pearl of great price," will leave their material benefits behind to those who love their money better than their eternal interests. They shall in the end be no losers for the loss. The recipients will also be no real gainers by the gains.

From Elmira I hastened to Port Credit, some miles west of Toronto, the commercial capital of the province of Ontario to attend a FREE METHODIST CAMP-MEETING.

Here we met a host of fellow-laborers from the United States, who surprised the small flock with their powerful help. There were three Anti-masonic addresses. The last by Bro. Leonard was admirable, on 2 Tim. 3: 1–7. A young Mason, more zealous than prudent, backed by confederates, called the preacher a liar, and continued to interrupt the meeting. This brought out a Master Mason, who said he had been through the mill and knew that everything that the preacher had said about Masonry was true, and that the unseemly intruder it was who was the LIAR. Next morning two others came out and publicly declared their abjuration of Freemasonry. Among these was Dr. Fraser Brown, a dentist from Woodstock, who bids fair to be a bright and shining light to warn the unwary. Thus Ontario is coming to the front.

I shall now briefly sketch last week's work if it is not too tedious for you. On Monday at in the Methodist church, Charles Henry, a wealthy and well-known Mason, came to the meeting and gave all the interruption he could. He is said to have learned drunkenness in the lodge, and had seasoned himself for the occasion. He is not likely to be ever so much respected again in this neighborhood. His questions and denials only brought out the evils of Masonry in a more vivid manner. But he took care that no collection could be taken up for the lecturer.

WINTERBOURNE.

Next evening I lectured in the Presbyterian church on the History of Freemasonry. Here Mr. Henry followed me, and about the middle of the lecture, when it would be near time for the females to begin to leave, he became very abusive. I showed the people his dishouest trick to rob me of a collection as he had done the night before, and make my family pay my traveling expenses, also to serve them for nothing. The light got in among the people.

Next day Rev. A. M. Hamilton drove me ten miles towards a village four miles distant. The minister had made no appointments, but urged me to stay over the Sabbath and assist him at his Communion. He had been disappointed in promised assistance. He gave up the three preparatory week-day services to me and the two Sabbath sermons. God sustained me under a severe bilious fever which only culminated on Monday. Though I had suffered during the whole night and could partake of no food or drink, I allowed him to drive me to Berlin, the county town, fifteen miles, and by railway got to my home in Galt—a very sick man, took to bed and slept it out. Rose this morning and took the cars to Bright, a small village where are three churches, twenty-two miles west of Galt. I lecture to-night in the Mennonite church, and am the guest of Deacon Strickler, a Pennsylvanian, and embrace the few minutes allowed me to let you see the kind of work the Lord is opening up to me here in Ontario.

I was refreshed with the communion services. The Rev. A. R., though a Freemason, accepted my explanation that I could not accept the communion elements with them, as I thought God would be honored more by my fasting than feasting meanwhile. I hope that my intercourse with him and his people will be greatly blessed in the end. Had frequent opportunities of laying the subject of Masonry before the members of the pastor's family and am not without hope of good results. Yours truly,

JAMES DONALDSON.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

DR. J. A. BINGHAM.

While waiting for a train at Sterling, Ohio, on the 13th instant, I had a lively time at the depot. Some twenty persons were present, and I gave an illustrated lecture of an hour or more. There were only two persons present who showed any sympathy with the secret orders, while several spoke encouragingly of the work I was doing.

One little incident is perhaps worthy of note. While I was speaking some one said, "Hold on a few minutes, there is a man over here who has taken the degrees, and we want him to come and tell us whether these things are so." The man was produced. "There," said they, "is a man who knows, for he has been there." I looked sharply at the man and said, "Yes, he knows, for he has been raised from a dead level to a living perpendicular and has the Master's word, Mah-hah-bone. He's a good witness." This brought the blood to his face in such a way as to attract much attention, and after listening a few moments he retired without uttering a word. After I took my seat in the car he came and took my name and address and asked where I would be that night and for a few days. I willingly gave the information, but have not had the pleasure of a second meeting with this "Widow's Son."

I was sorry not to have met Mrs. J. A. Bingham at her home, but was glad she was able to visit her brother and obtain much needed rest after years of faithful and almost ceaseless care of her now deceased husband; but I am greatly indebted to brother and sister Bishop for their kindness.

Of the life of Dr. Bingham I learned many things of interest, which, if written by a skillful hand, would make a useful book. To say of Dr. J. A. Bingham that he was born, that he lived and died, is saying simply that he shared the common lot of mankind. To reproduce that life of toil and sacrifice which he invested with so much of the grand and heroic, and make it replete with inspiration to those coming after him, is more than simple biography.

March 13th, 1793, was the date, and Windsor, Conn., the place of his birth; January 18th, 1885, his last earthly trial and triumph came. On the 20th, after an impressive discourse by Rev. J. W. Thompson, his remains were laid in the cemetery at York, Ohio, he waits to welcome Him who is "the resurrection and the life" at his coming. I trust, when facts can be gathered and arranged, the portrait of this brother and a sketch of his eventful and useful life will find a place in the Cynosure, which he read with interest.

At Oberlin I called on Rev. James Brand, successor to Pres. Finney in the First church, on Pres. J. H. Fairchild and five members of the College Faculty, who all very cheerfully signed the request to Joseph Cook, and will interest themselves in obtaining names of other members of the Faculty who were absent at the time. The old friends who are always at the front in reforms cheered me much and bid me God speed as I left on my way.

J. P. STODDARD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

KOSSUTH NATIONAL REFORM CONVENTION.

BLANCHARD, Iowa.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Dr. Sloane was once at an annual meeting when a number of us gave in our reports of a year's labor in national reform. We stated how little opposition we had encountered, and how favorably the cause had been received. The professor shook his head and remarked that before the cause would take hold of the public mind, it must strike fire and awaken opposition. The farther we press the issue the more determined grows the opposition. The enthronement of the Divine law in the national conscience and legislation sweeps the whole field of moral reform. It cuts down to the last taproot of every evil system. And when a certain class of men get their eyes open to the true logic of the movement, they oppose it with all their might.

We held a convention June 29th and 30th in the M. E. church, Kossuth, Iowa. The subject had been agitated here ever since before the war. The anti-secret question had also been agitated at Mediapolis two miles distant and the lines on these issues were closely drawn. Our programme was confined mainly to the Sabbath and Prohibition questions, but early in the discussion several of the speakers struck bedrock by declaring that the foundation of the government was defective, because in the Constitution the will of the people was the highest law recognized.

Those who argued for the national reform idea were Rev. T. P. Robb of Sharon, Rev. C. D. Trumbull, of Morning Sun, Rev. J. W. Dill of Mediapolis, M. L. Peck of the M. E. church, Kossuth, Mrs. M. J. Dill, of Mediapolis, and Mrs. C. A. Dunham, of Burlington. The last two are earnest workers in the W. C. T. U., and did good work at our last State anti-secret convention. But we seldom have more bitter and determined opposition than we have had at Kossuth from a Methodist minister, G. M. Tuttle, and two Presbyterian ministers, A. S. Leonard and E. B. Newcomb. They left the topic assigned them on the programme and turned aside to argue against the duty of the government to recognize Christ. Mr. Leonard even attempted to show from history that when nations acknowledged Christ they speedily went to ruin. Why not use such an argument against the individual recognizing Christ? Certainly this principle will apply to one as well as another.

But the argument used against the nation acknowledging Christ was, that in it were so many Jews, Unitarians and infidels that it would be unjust to recognize One in whom they did not believe. But can Christians consistently take part in a government which excludes Christ? Suppose, for illustration, a convention assembles. In it are a number of Jews, infidels and Unitarians. Christ stands at the door asking admission, but is refused because some of his enemies are inside. Could a friend of Christ consistently remain a member of that convention? This objection is the one frequently raised by the ministers who are members of Christ-excluding lodges. I am convinced that the same principle excluding Christ from Masonic lodges, excludes him also from the United States Constitution.

In my three years' experience in the National Reform field, I have yet to find a Masonic minister who is a reliable, intelligent friend of the movement. Mr. Tuttle who antagonized our cause so bitterly at Kossuth, was a delegate once to a national reform convention in Chicago, and went home and expressed his sympathy with the movement. He attended Mr. Ronayne's expositions of Masonry at Morning Sun, and was heard to remark during the course of the lecture, "If he will let me off I will promise never to join the Masons." Yet strange to say a few years after he joined the lodge at Winfield, Iowa. In our last State convention a seceded Mason described before a large audience how he had assisted in imposing the oaths and horrid penalties of Masonry on their professed minister of Christ.

Two ladies brought up from childhood in Mr. Leonard's congregation, said to me, "Do you know that it is Masonry that makes those ministers oppose your movement?"

Others in these congregations complained how their churches were declining, how they were almost deserted by the young men; how, when they had a revival, and young men were brought into the church, they were afterward beguiled into the lodges, and then they were lost to the church.

Mediapolis is one of the worst lodge-ridden of towns. The Methodist and Presbyterian churches there are crawling with them. The former pastor of the Presbyterian church, Mr. Martin, was an Anti-mason. He allowed Prof. C. A. Blanchard to lecture in his church. He was the best friend of National Reform we have found among the Presbyterian ministers of Iowa. But he voted for Mr. St. John and soon after had to give up his congregation.

We are more and more convinced that our National Reform work in laboring to enthrone Christ in the national conscience has no more determined enemy to fight than Masonry. This false religion is a conspiracy against Christ. It rules him out of its government for the same reason that many oppose his recognition in the Constitution of the United States, for fear some Jews, Unitarians and infidels would be offended. This is simply bowing to the mob who shouted, "Away with him! away with him! Crucify him! crucify him!" and denying the now exalted King whose right it is to reign.

M. A. GAULT.

A SIGNIFICANT MOVEMENT IN TENNESSEE.

MEMPHIS, Tenn., July 16, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Probably no town or city in the United States can boast of more societies for "benevolent" purposes than Memphis, among the colored people—men's societies, women's societies, children's societies. That much good is done there is no doubt, in care of the sick and burial of the dead, but if credible witness may tell the story there is good reason to conclude that the evil far exceeds the good. The work attempted can doubtless be done in some other way, and at much less cost to the people.

But it seems that now if ever, the time has come for a revolution on the society question here. A year or more ago, a Baptist pastor, an intelligent and able leader in his church, came out boldly from adherence to Masonry, and told his people his reasons in public lectures. It cost him in popularity but he has persevered. Recently he found that while the church was dragging heavily under its debt and failing to meet its obligations (the pastor himself being personally responsible for several thousand dollars until the church could relieve him,) quite a number of the members, men especially, were devoting time and money to keep up standing in secret orders. The pastor, faithful to his convictions, told the church that he desired such members to do one of three things—(1) Abandon the societies and sustain the church; or (2) give up connection with the church and remain in the lodge; or (3) dismiss him from the pastorate.

A meeting of the interested parties (some twenty-five persons) was called, and half of those present were in favor of the last proposition; the chairman's casting vote turned the scales the other way. But this was not the church. The pastor's hold upon the majority of his people is strong. The end of the matter I have not heard.

Another and still more significant event is a similar movement in another Baptist church of over 500 members. The pastor, until recently, was a prominent member of nearly every society to which he was eligible. When sick last summer his income from the various societies was $48 per month. I have the statement at first hand. He has, therefore, created no small stir by openly declaring his conviction of the false practices, and great evils propagated by these fraternities. He is convinced that the church and world have locked arms in them, and his people have heard from him in no muffled tone his decision to "come out" and to bring them out. A meeting has been held inaugurating a system of mutual aid within the church, not in the name of a society, but as the church, and every church member may share in the plan if he will. At the first meeting about eighty members of the church signed the agreement, viz: to pay $1.00 each annually and twenty-five cents per month to form and maintain a mutual aid fund. In other words an organized plan for carrying out the work which the church ought to do.

That this movement will call down the wrath of men both in and out of the church, and secret vengeance, there is no doubt. These pastors are as intelligent men and as associate editors of a paper in the interest of the Baptist church and as prominent pastors, they have been committing themselves to the advocacy of needed reforms, and when we consider that they depend for a living upon the people, many of whom in these societies are so easily led by a love of parade, the glitter of regalia, and high-sounding titles of honor, to say nothing of the gains in money to many of these titled "men of degrees," surely this is a work of the Holy Spirit, and moral courage is not wanting in these pastors. May God help them and all of us.

Yesterday a Methodist pastor told me of his convictions on these things. He is a member of the lodge; has spoken against the evil practices, and so keenly did he feel the effects that for prudence sake he has since held his peace. His mouth is closed because, as he says, "Our prominent ministers are all members of the Masons or Odd-fellows or both, and a man is not looked upon as being of much account if he is not in the lodges; and for a humble fellow like me to come out and protest openly it would soon seal my fate." In other words a man of honest purpose and clear convictions is bound (unlike the word of God, "which is not bound") and for prudence sake dare not speak the truth as he understands it, and as the fire of God burns in his soul.

Thus I might go on and tell you of the private words of ministers, intelligent and thoughtful men in these two mentioned denominations, who see and confess and deplore the evils, practiced under the name of benevolence. Families divided, poor people robbed and deluded by outward glitter and show. Religion debased by preparing souls for heaven by means of their own works. When men get their eyes opened to these things and dare to speak against them, their view of the iniquity grows so rapidly upon them and the opposition to be met is not an open, fair discussion, but secret plotting and revenge, there is great danger that harsh speaking and invective denunciation, may crowd out the spirit of love and tender faithfulness in dealing with men's souls.

But what are we to think or say when so large a part of the religious press and so many pulpits are silent on this question? Have we not the right of free discussion? Is there any other question upon which men may not speak freely? Our sense of propriety may be strong, but who does not throughout his whole nature revolt at the assumed despotism of the lodge? We are well aware that on account of its sentiment against secretism, the work of the A. M. A. meets with constant, and in the aggregate, a powerful opposition in the South, at the hands of influential leaders among our people. It may be a wise policy to quietly pursue our work refraining from those aggressive measures which will more directly array the lodge against us; but the people need light, and so long as the truth is kept back they must continue to be imposed upon by the false religion, the empty show and pretended benevolence of the secret orders.

At different times I have spoken from the pulpit, as well as in private, against secretism, but have been much in doubt as to whether the many things which ought to be said could now be borne by the people. The way grows more clear. May God give us all great wisdom and the Spirit's power.

B. A. IMES.

THE ILLINOIS CONVENTION.

GALVA, Ill., July 20th, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—As to the holding of the State Convention in Galva, I know not what to say. I am only one, and a small one, too, and cannot speak for others. I would be more than glad to have it here; but whether enough of the good citizens would be willing to "face a frowning lodge" and support an Anti-masonic convention, to make it a success, I cannot say. The lodge is king hereabouts and whatever does not submit to its rule is cast out to be trodden under foot of men. But few seem willing to put themselves in the way of this Juggernaut car. I think the anti-secret element is not so strong here of late as in former years. Many are opposed to lodgery but don't care to have it generally known.

I have not had an opportunity as yet, of consulting with any one about this matter; and have thrown out these few hints for your consideration. I think Bro. Hinman formed a better opinion of the "anti" element here than the facts (better understood than he had opportunity to understand them) will warrant. What would be expected of the friends of the reform if the convention should meet here? Affectionately yours.

R. CANNING.

TOUCHED IN THE RIGHT SPOT.

GOODWINE, Ill., July 20, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—My heart is moved within me when I read how Mr. Matthews and our lecturers are being treated by the Hiramites. We have fallen upon evil times—the Morgan times are being repeated and now, as then, we must meet the foe, and I hope hundreds of others will be moved as I am. So put me down $12 for the general lecture fund, being $1.00 per month for one year. Of above amount I remit $5.00 to defend Matthews, and let us not show the white feather but get good council, and then defend. Do you know we can show up the lodge a little better and easier on the defense? Will pay part or all of above at any time.

J. S. HICKMAN.

WHAT CHURCH CAN DO BETTER?

NEW IBERIA, LA.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I am actively engaged, doing my little towards teaching others the principles you urge. I have, by persuading earnestly, kept six young men from joining the Knights of Pythias and by reading to three members of the church Lev. 5: 4, 5, and explaining the same, have caused them to withdraw from the lodge. There is also another degrading lodge here called the "Tabernacle," the secrets of which I have been, as yet, unable to get into. A few of my members are yet in these lodges but I think they will quit soon. After sufficient persausion has been used we expect to be plain and ask them to "choose this day whom they will serve," and require them to give up the lodge or we will give them up.

I persuaded the pastor of a Baptist church of this place to leave his lodge and am now trying to get him to denounce it publicly from his pulpit. When I have it entirely out of my church I expect them to adopt plans by which lodgery can never again enter it. Great success to you. Yours truly,

BYRON GUNNER.

THIRD QUARTER.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS.

LESSON VI, Aug. 9.—The Prophets of Baal.—1 Kings 18: 19–29.

GOLDEN TEXT.—If the Lord be God, follow him; but if Baal, then follow him. 1 Kings 18: 21.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The undecided class is the greatest obstacle in the way of the progress of religion and true reform. vs. 19–21. This is because (1) they are greatly in the majority, and (2) they act in the moral world like the force of inertia in the physical. Baal's open and avowed servants were few besides the thousands in Israel who were not decided whether to serve him or Jehovah. For one blatant follower of Ingersoll we shall find hundreds who halt between atheism and Christianity. The church has one Mason who glories in his Christless creed to scores who have not made up their minds that Masonry is heathenism. For one man who believes in free whisky there are thousands who want to license and "restrain" it. Nothing is so discouraging to reformers as this halting, compromising spirit on the part of the masses. The blank silence that followed his wonderful appeal must have fallen on Elijah's heart like a leaden weight. What were the angry words and threats of Ahab to this chilling indifference!

2. Truth is never afraid to be fair even to error. vs. 22–25. This one solitary man pitted against Baal's retinue of priests in their gorgeous vestments claims no advantage because he is only one. He can well afford to give his opponents the advantage if there is any; and if the tradition is true that they hid a man under the altar to kindle the fire, who died of suffocation, it but fitly illustrates the cunning and sophistry to which error always has to resort in a contest with truth. "The God that answereth by fire," etc. The same test applies now in the great modern contest between Christ and the Masonic Baal. The fires of the Spirit never descend on lodge altars.

3. False worships always fail in the hour of trial. vs. 26–29. Baalism, pure and simple, was the worship of the sun, the life-giving principle in nature. It was "the worship of the creature more than the Creator," and under this definition may include every form of popular sin. The sun was worshiped because it gave light and heat—the earth's two greatest blessings. So the numerous false deities of our more enlightened age, wealth, power, pleasure, are worshiped—for the blessings they are supposed to confer. Beginning in pure selfishness the natural end is gross materialism. The visible manifestation of Baalism to-day is in the Masonic lodge. Men join it for the same reason that an ancient Israelite joined himself to Baal—for personal benefit and advantage. But who ever heard of Masonry comforting the soul on a dying bed or helping it bear up under the stress of agonizing sorrow? Yet these are the real test hours, and terrible is that silence when the worshiper of a false god, no matter by what name it may be called, cries out in bitter extremity, and finds like Baal's priests that "there is neither voice nor any to answer, nor any that regard."

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Do the indifferent try God's patience most? Rev. 3: 16. How is the insufficiency of false worships shown? Is. 45: 9–20; Psa. 115: 5–8. What form of idolatry is especially common at the present day? Col. 3: 5; Eph. 5: 5.

"The prophets of Baal." Not persons who foretold the future, but declaimers, who uttered in wild frenzy their agitating thoughts and emotions, they were the teachers of the false religion, and those who performed the idolatrous rites of worship.

"Prophets of the groves." Rather, of Ashtoreth, the Phenician Venus.

"Which eat at Jezebel's table." I should think the words mean, that these four hundred prophets fed daily at a common table, in or near the temple of that idol which they served, and which was provided for at the expense of Jezebel.—Harmer's Observations.

"How long halt ye?" The word halt, here, does not mean lameness merely, as some commentators give it, but, in general, a wavering, vacillating motion.—Tayler Lewis. The figure refers to the unsteady gait of a man who turns first toward one thing and then toward another, uncertain what direction to take.—Todd.

"Between two opinions." Most of the people thought that Jehovah was God, and Baal was God too. No, said the prophet, this will not do. There are two opinions; they are two contradictory things. "I will build in my house," says one, "an altar for Jehovah here, and an altar for Baal there. I am of one opinion; I believe both to be God." "No," says Elijah, "they are two; you cannot unite them." Have I not many here who say, "I am worldly, but I am religious too? May I not be a good churchman, or a right good dissenter, and be a man of the world too?" Mark Antony yoked two lions to his chariot; but there are two lions no man ever yoked together yet, —the Lion of the tribe of Judah and the lion of the pit.—Spurgeon.

"I only, remain a prophet of the Lord." A true rendering brings out the sense very clearly: I still remain a prophet of the Lord, though standing alone by myself, whilst Baal's prophets are four hundred and fifty men. He simply puts his single self in contrast with their number.—Tayler Lewis.

"On Carmel's crown now swarms a countless throng,
With one brave soul to stand for God 'gainst millions in the wrong." —Taylor.

"And put no fire under." There could be no trickery on their part, for (1) Elijah was watching; (2) the people were in no mood to be trifled with now, in the height of the famine; (3) the prophets of Baal were called on unexpectedly and were away from their temple, so that they could not prearrange anything. So the magicians of Pharaoh failed in their attempts to imitate the miracles of Moses the first time they had no previous notice of the miracle and its nature.—Peloubet.

"As to Baal." (1) Baal claimed to be the Sun-god and Lord of the elements and forces of nature, and therefore, if this was true, he of all idols could send fire from heaven. (2) They were to make the attempt in the full power of the noontide rays. (3) If he could work this miracle then he was able to bring rain, and the famine continued from no want of power on his part. (4) The coming down of fire from heaven to consume the sacrifice was regarded as the token of the acceptance of the sacrifice.

"As to Jehovah." (1) Jehovah claimed to be the Creator of heaven and earth. (2) Fire is the best symbol of spiritual existence; visible, and yet not material; near, and yet unapproachable. (3) It is warming and cheering. (4) It is the enlightener of the world. (5) It is pure. (6) It consumes, as God consumes evil. (7) Hence God had, in Israel's past history, identified himself with this token (Lev. 9: 24; 1 Chron. 21: 26; 2 Chron. 7: 1). In later ages fire was the symbol of the Holy Spirit's work and power, as on Pentecost (see Acts 2: 1–3; Deut. 4: 24; Matt. 3: 11; Mal. 3: 2; Ex. 13: 21; John 1: 9).—Pel.

"O Baal, hear us." This was not the substance of their prayer, but their prayer itself. They repeated it endlessly, as is the custom in heathen worship (Matt. 6: 7; Acts 19: 34).—Todd. It has a parallel in the conduct of the Greeks of Ephesus (Acts 19: 34). But we are not to suppose that no other words were uttered but these. "O Baal, hear us" probably floated on the air as the refrain of a long and varied hymn of supplication.—Cook. In the drama of Æschylus, entitled Persæ, line 667, the chorus of Persian elders call upon Balen very much as here they invoke Baal: "Baalin, ancient Baalin, come, oh, come." It was in the great distress at the battle of Salamis, very much as Jezebel's prophets are distressed here.—Taylor Lewis.

"Cry aloud; for he is a god." The force of this expression seems to be, "Cry on, only cry louder, and then you will make him hear; for surely he is a god; surely you are not mistaken in so regarding him; he is not a mere name, a nonentity; and he will hearken." The object of the irony is two-fold,—to stimulate the priests to greater exertions, and so make the failure more complete, and to suggest to the people that such failure will prove absolutely that Baal is no god.—Cook.

"Nor any to answer; nor any that regarded." They were praying to an idol, and no real answer could come. So sinners will appeal in vain to their idols for help. A time is coming that will test every one's faith. Those who have made an idol of sin and worldly pleasure, will look in vain for deliverance when sorrow comes, or sickness; when death draws near, when eternity is at hand,—infidelity, profligates, the gay world, frivolous companions, wealth badly got, or badly hoarded, all will be silent to the appeal of despair. "There is neither voice, nor any to answer, nor any that regarded."—Newman Hall in S. S. Times.

TAKE HEED HOW YE READ.

There were, says the New York Witness, no newspapers and few books and scarcely any readers in our Lord's time. Had it been otherwise, his disciples would doubtless have been warned to exercise judgment in reading as well as in hearing.

No book or paper is worth reading at all that is not worth reading thoughtfully. The man or woman who forms the habit of skimming over a great deal of matter every day without the least effort to remember or to think out what is read, must expect to have an unsatisfied, if not discontented, mind. The mind needs food as well as the body, and like the body it can only absorb what it has first digested.

Reading-matter should be carefully selected and then read carefully. Choose a good newspaper, for instance, and when you have got through an article, think over it a little before going on to the next. With such care every reader of the Cynosure will in the course of the year have stored up a history of the time, with the bearing and influence of leading events upon the kingdom of Christ—a store of information and reflection of greatest value.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

THE CHURCHES VS. LODGERY.

The following denominations are committed by vote of their legislative assemblies or by constitution to a separation from secret lodge worship:

Adventists (Seventh-day.)
Baptists—Primitive, Seventh-day and Scandinavian.
Brethren (Dunkers or German Baptists.)
Christian Reformed Church.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JULY 30, 1885.

The keenest truth uttered last fall prior to President Cleveland's election was this: "The men who made the Republican party are in their graves; those whom the Republican party made are in power."

Prohibitionists who visit Saratoga Springs should stop at Elmwood Hall, Dr. Emory Potter, 48 Front street. The house is well kept, the company agreeable and prices reasonable: and there prohibition "hangs out her banner on the outward wall." The reception room is adorned with the pictures of St. John, Neal Dow, Frances Williard, etc. The house is in the midst of the "Springs."

Two-thirds of the census population of the United States loathe the lodge or at least are opposed to it. The Prohibition party will uever succeed part secret and part open. Like "the legs of the lame," its supports are "not equal;" and the hidden part will betray the open part in the hour of conflict. If we can reach and bring over those prohibitionists who are with the American platform in heart and in understanding within the three years before the canvas of 1888, St. John will bring the whole of his party to us; and one of the old parties will accept our principles for the sake of our votes, as they accepted the Free Soil principles in 1848–52–56, and selfishness will complete what the fear of God has begun.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

"CLIFF SEAT," July 17, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I am here in the borders of the Adirondacks, at Joseph Cook's, four miles back of Ticonderoga. Last night the thermometer was high in the nineties. This morning a cool, sweet breeze comes over Lake Champlain bringing memories as sweet as Ossian has it: "Like the memories of joys that are past; pleasant though mournful to the soul." My eldest and youngest brothers went to rest, laid down to sleep, in these mountains near where I am writing in one of the towers which surmount Mr. Joseph Cook's house, which is a new one built by himself on the farm where he was born. His honored father lived to see and rejoice in the honors, and, what is better, the piety of his son, and was buried here within a year, at his own request holding an Episcopal prayerbook in his hand. His good and godly mother is still here, lingering like a belated angel behind her mate.

I could wish that the angel who took Ezekiel by the hair of his head and carried him to Jerusalem to show him the lodge worships in the temple, (Ezek. 8: 3.) would condescend to bring every reader of the Cynosure to this tower in which I am writing, and give each of them a view of the scene which surrounds me. The road creeps along on the east side of the valley close by the upland. The venerable beeches and hemlocks, which stood here when the French under Montcalm held the valley of this lake, are here still, and the springs which gush from the hillsides are sweet as ever. On the west, the farm slopes down, down, across a beautiful valley and the tall mountains rise beyond it, a regular Sierra, each capped with its separate summit of green trees; and, indeed, all nature looks her lovcliest. The contrast between a landscape here where and a mountain scene in California or this side, is beyond words to paint. The Rocky Mountains are Asiatic, bald and barren. Their valleys are deserts, covered with sage brush and eactus; and although there are oases, especially up near the snow line, where forests hide in canons for fear of being blown down by the winds and tempests, as a whole, from Oregon to Mexico, the plateau of the Rocky Mountains is, like Cabul of the Bible, a land which "The Almighty hath cursed." I traveled over that region from April to November without seeing so much rain fall as would wet through a man's shirt sleeves if his coat were off. Here on both sides of the lake the mountains are all green, and the whole region might properly be named Verd Mont.

But to return to Mr. Cook, who is called "Rev." because educated at Andover and licensed to preach, though never ordained. The reading, thinking portion of the United States already know this gentleman so well that the Cynosure needs give no description of him. He has lectured around the globe; and as Ledyard said of the wolves, foxes, natives, and rocks of Lake Baikal, they all understood French, so I presume they all know the voice and comprehend in some measure, the ideas of Joseph Cook, who is born to say what he thinks on questions which agitate the mind of the American masses. His fort is to "strike where the iron is hot," rather than like Cromwell, Garrison, Phillips, and O'Connell, to "make the iron hot by striking." Like Gov. St. John, and every true American, he abhors the secret lodge system, and is at no pains to conceal his opinions, but has not yet struck it with his sledge-hammer rhetoric, as both he and St. John, I believe, will one day do, and that I trust before long.

There is to be here, on the old fort ground at Ticonderoga, a convention of Prohibitionists in a few weeks. Mr. Cook is replenishing his magazine for that battle-day. He has a fine, clear spring, and a summer-house by it, a little way down in these fine old woods, and on his desk in that summer-house, he has already forged out some thuuder-bolts for this Ticonderoga Prohibition convention.

Neither Cook nor St. John, when they have taken a step forward, take a backward step to balance it, which cannot be said of some who consider themselves Prohibition leaders. They should learn as Canning said, "Nothing is so silly as cunning." Demosthenes could rouse all Greece to rush to war on Phillip; but when given a battalion to confront the enemy, he ran away like a poltroon. So those who loathe the lodge, and see that the curse and certain dissolution of the Prohibition party is that it is part secret and part open; and that its temperance work will be woven like the web of Penelope, the wife of Ulysses, who and yet fear to draw the line and compel a separation or dissolution of the secret wing.

Many intelligent temperance workers, setting party aside, know as well as we do that Good Templarism is a natural born child of the mother-lodge; and further, that Masonic Prohibitionists in the heat of battle, are sworn to go over to Masonic brewers and distillers, or have their throats cut as Masonic traitors.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, July 20, 1885.—From Ticonderoga, on Saturday, I "went with the multitude" up through Lake George, the only lake into whose waters steep mountains plunged their feet every foot of its length, so that its sides are literally

"Rook-ribbed and ancient as the sun."

Yesterday, Sabbath, I addressed, by request, the W. C. T. U. in the Lower Town Hall in this place; and, notice being given, I preached earnestly against the lodge to an attentive congregation in the Free Methodist church (Bro. A. Smith, pastor) at night.

At Ticonderoga I saw the prime movers of the Old Fort Camp-meeting, of which I send you the following clip from the New York Voice:

"Among the speakers already pledged to take part at the Centennial Temperance Camp-meeting at Fort Ticonderoga, N. Y., to commence August 10th, are: H. Clay Bascom, to speak August 13th; Miss Frances E. Willard, to speak August 14th; Hon. Neal Dow, to speak August 18th and 19th; and Rev. Joseph Cook, to speak August 20th. The following are pledged, with dates not yet fixed: Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, Justus Miller, and Miss Anna Gordon. Ex-Governor St. John, Mrs. Youmans, of Canada, Dr. H. M. King, of Albany, and Gen. Riley have been invited and will probably respond favorably.'

I find everywhere tokens of a steady change in popular sentiment against the Masonic lodge and its dark brood. I leave this morning for New York and Brooklyn.

THE AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., July 22, 1885.

Last Sabbath forenoon I heard a sermon in the New England Congregational church, Saratoga, from Henry S. De Forest, president of Talladega College, Alabama. That college was founded by the American Missionary Association, in 1867, and chartered in 1868. President De Forest plead feelingly for the ex-slaves, and dwelt largely on their cruel wrongs which entitled them to our commiseration and aid. I have been in Saratoga when the same sermon would have been mobbed. This fact yields one consolation. The hope that a few years will work as great a change in public sentiment concerning the lodge, which upheld slavery and organized the war. But it makes one sick to see a college president, fresh from Alabama, shy all allusion to the worst enemy the black people have, while so eloquent on their past wrongs which are now unpopular, and so fashionable to condemn.

Awhile since, the writer attended a meeting of colored ministers in Washington, D. C., Episcopal, Presbyterian, Methodist, and Baptist. A half-brother of Thos. S. Grimke was one of them; and they were all able men. They all agreed that secret societies were the worst curse of the colored population: starving pastors and wives, and by their finery and titles handing them over to popery. J. B.

POLITICAL TEMPERANCE.

Thurlow Weed, long inured to relying on political expedience to carry correct principles, gave in to the "high license craze" and wine-growing as a cure for natural intemperance. Of course as a sincere advocate of temperance he could not fail to be inconsistent with himself.

He says: "We have urged a law * * * exacting such sums for licenses as would shut up cheap groggeries and make distillers and liquor dealers liable for the support of inebriates and their impoverished families. Popular sentiment would sustain such a law." (Life, vol. II., p. 153.) "Let California, Kansas, and other States whose soils are adapted to grape culture, turn their industries in that direction and the practical remedy for intemperance will soon be reached" (p. 154). Now look a little farther on the same page and you find Mr. Weed uttering himself thus: "Intemperance, while it reaches all classes, is most fatal and most pervading with the poor, upon whom the curse rests most heavily. The shortest and surest remedy and relief for this most numerous class of victims is to place the cause [intoxicating drink] beyond their reach;" that is, enforced prohibition for "the most numerous class." This is the philosophy of a life-long politician who "lost all patience with the Neal Dow school of reformers" (p. 153), and whose cardinal principle was "popular opinion" as the last and sole hope of reform. License for the rich and respectable, and prohibition for the masses. Yet Mr. Weed was a good and sincere, though inconsistent, man, who loved the Moody hymns.

HIRAM ABIFF OR KINARAHINGAN.

The lodges of Chicago call their deity by one, those of Borneo barbarians by the other name. What better is one than the other? In what particular virtue does the paganism of one surpass that of the other? Our vote is for the tribes of the jungle. The account of the English gentleman given below (was he a seceder?) has no blood-chilling oaths, no frightful tests, no shameful indecency, no penalties of death by horrid and savage means: the ceremony is simple, inexpensive, and does not need the lying assurance that nobody's religion or politics are to be meddled with.

In the Century for July Joseph Hatton, editor of a London daily, writes of the remarkable life and scientific achievements of his son Frank, who died from an accidental gun-shot wound, in his twenty-second year, while leading an exploring expedition in the wild interior of the island of Borneo. The interesting sketch contains portions of the young man's diary, in which appears an account of his initiation into a native lodge. The account is to be commended to the Christian Masons (so-called) who may improve their own idolatrous worship by following the model of the heathen of Borneo:

"On the 4th of April I was initiated into the brotherhood of the Bendowen Dusuns. The old men and all the tribe having assembled, the ceremonies began. First the jungle was cleared for about twenty yards, and then a hole was dug about a foot deep, in which was placed a large water-jar. In this country these jars are of enormous value: $30, $40, and $100 worth of gutta being given for a single jar. The bottom of the jar in question was knocked out, so as to render it useless in future. The clay taken out to make the hole was thrown into the jar, and now the 'old men' began to declaim, 'Oh, Kinarahingan, hear us!'—a loud shout to the Kinarahingan. The sound echoed away down the valleys, and as it died a stone was placed near the jar. Then for half an hour the old men declared by fire (which was represented by a burning stick), by water (which was brought in a bamboo and poured into the jar), and by earth, that they would be true to all white men. A sumpitum was then fetched, and an arrow shot into the air to summon the Kinarahingan. We now placed our four guns, which were all the arms my party of eight mustered, on the mouth of the jar, and each put a hand in and took a little clay out and put it away. Finally several volleys were shot over the place, and the ceremony terminated."

—The Gospel Messenger of Huntingdon, Pa., has been publishing a series of articles on the lodge from the pen of a correspondent. They are plainly written but earnest, logical and Christian.

—We were cheered a few days since by a letter from Bro. W. E. Hibberd, of No. 71 East 108th street, New York, who kept a Bible stand in the Centennial Exposition, Philadelphia, near to the Cynosure stand, and not only showed brethren Freeman and Hodge warm sympathy, but actual deeds of good service toward the latter in assisting him in some dispute with the authorities, brought about by the unpopular nature of his work.

—While the Cynosure was waiting with some patience for the customary report from the secretary of the late Ohio Convention at Cedarville, behold Bro. Sproull, the Reformed Presbyterian pastor at that place, and faithful correspondent of the Christian Nation, sends a first report thither and we copy elsewhere. There are some advantages in this plan, if it is a trifle annoying—the good report has two companies of readers instead of one.

—A. L. Blowers takes advantage of the great bargains in books offered in connection with new subscribers to the Cynosure and sends three subscriptions, each for three months. A letter from Oxford, Kansas, shows also a due appreciation of the offer, and expresses a hope for new subscribers by the means. Camp meetings are now being held. Let them be wisely cultivated for our literature.

—Mrs. S. McConnoughey, of Atkinson, Ill., writes of a pleasant picnic in that vicinity on the 4th of July, at which ex-Governor St. John was toasted in very complimentary terms. The great temperance advocate is doing some of the best work of his life this season, lecturing continually for prohibition, and he can make no new engagements until after January next.

—Bibulous Freemasons sometimes have vexatious experiences in such prohibition States as Iowa. Note the following from the Birmingham Free Press:

How easy it is for an anti to "take in" a Hiramite! Last Monday Sy. Anderson was talking with a stranger, who was traveling westward and said to him: "You seem to be traveling west." "Yes," he replied, "but sometimes I travel east." "You found it a pretty rough road in the east, didn't you?" says Sy. "Yes," was the reply. "I have sat in the east, was made a Mason and raised from a dead level to a living perpendicular in Michigan in 1831, but have not been in the lodge for ten years and am somewhat rusty. Can you tell me, on the square, for I see you are a Mason, where I can get some lager beer?"

—Dr. W. G. Waddle, of New Athens, O., corrects an inadvertence in one of our notices of the Wheeling Presbytery Memorial: "The Memorial of Wheeling Presbytery to the late U. P. General Assembly, came from the hand and heart of Rev. Robert G. Wallace, of Bellaire, Ohio. In the Cynosure of May 28th, Rev. John Williamson, an excellent brother of Sidney Presbytery, was reported as its mover." Bro. Wallace has not been very prominent in our anti-secret reform, but the conception of the memorial was noble and comprehensive. Few—far too few—ministers in any denomination seem to have penetrated so clearly the designs of the adversary against the churches through the secret lodge, and still more rare are those who dare to propose a remedy so effective and sure.

—The letter from pastor Imes of the Congregational church, Memphis, Tenn., concerning the secret society plague among the colored churches of that city, will be read with intense interest. Such experiences with the lodge we have good reason to believe are not isolated or infrequent in the South; and they call loudly upon us to delay no longer in sending capable men to their aid. The N. C. A. Board has voted to support an agent in that field this year and appointed Bro. H. H. Hinman, who entered it first with such success. Bro. Hinman has not yet accepted the appointment, but we hope the way may open for him very soon. The time to help the colored churches against this foe is NOW. Another year's delay may be an incalculable loss to the cause of Christ among them.

PERSONAL.

—Pres. J. Blanchard expects to return from the East this week.

—Secretary Stoddard preached for the College church, Wheaton, last Sabbath.

—President C. A. Blanchard took train last Wednesday night for Southwestern Iowa, where he has a number of engagements to speak on the reform at College Springs, Blanchard, and other points.

—Elder J. F. Browne, of Berea College, Ky., will be glad to speak at several points on his way to the Training School at Wheaton. See his notice on the 13th page. Bro. Browne never fails to interest his audiences. Let there be a quick and hearty response to his notice.

—Bro. James Robinson, of Aurora, during a short call last week, spoke favorably of the Illinois State convention being held in that place this fall. Mrs. Dr. Weede, of Monmouth, a working member of the State Executive committee writes favorably of Galva.

—Pastor James I. Welo, of one of our Chicago Norwegian churches, is appointed to prepare a thesis on the secret societies and their baleful influence upon the churches, to be read at one of the regular gatherings of the Lutheran pastors of that nationality. There is considerable interest awakening among the churches upon this important subject.

—Dr. Billy J. Clark, who prompted Lebbeus Armstrong to the founding of the first temperance society in America, as related last week, was related to our own George W. Clark. He was a Freemason in early life but seceded like his pastor—another link in the chain that binds Anti-masonry to the temperance reform.

—Bro. W. B. Stoddard, New York State agent, has been engaged in other labors during the season, but proposes to take the field again this fall, possibly in Ohio, as the friends of that State are corresponding with him. He will attend the Lecturer's Training School, where he will be able to give some instruction on canvassing, as he is one of the most successful workers in that line.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—The intense heat of the last few weeks, if it has not driven away the office-seekers, has at least greatly diminished the attendance on the churches and many of the city pastors have left or are about to leave for their summer vacations. Not so the irregular workers. At the jail, the hospitals, almshouses, on the street, at Market Space, at the Central Mission, 909 Pennsylvania Ave., and at the corner of 4th and L. streets, N. W., the work of evangelization goes on regardless of the heat (and in some of these places six days in a week) without sectarian friction and with the happiest results.

The street meetings usually continue two hours and a large company stand quiet and attentive on the pavement. There has been no occasion for police protection, and one of our most able and efficient street preachers is a member of the police force. What a blessing it would be if they were all like-minded! This movement has drawn out and united the best elements in the churches, and is doing much for the good of that great multitude whose resort is the theatre, the saloon and beer gardens, but who never visit the churches.

The President and his household set the example of a pretty regular attendance at the First Presbyterian church. The President was so well pleased with the able discourse of Dr. Sunderland July 5th, that he secured a copy and had a considerable edition published. This was certainly complimentary to his pastor and in the main deservedly so. On the other hand the doctor has been greatly annoyed by a report widely circulated that while President Cleveland went a-fishing on Sunday he preached a sermon in his justification. It is but just to say that both parts of the story were without foundation. Nevertheless there were a few dead flies in the pot of ointment that the doctor brought to his sanctuary. Speaking of the twin relics of barbarism, he said that one was dead and but one (polygamy) survived. The doctor should remember that there are in this city three temples for heathen (Masonic) worship. In all of them as well as in the lodges, which outnumber the churches, there is confessedly a continued repetition of the ceremonials, the sun-worshipers, and that, in the language of the ablest and most distinguished advocate of the order, Masonry is a philosophical development of the ancient sun-worship." Dr. Sunderland knows too much of the inside of this institution to have wholly ignored its wickedness.

The failure to mention in a patriotic discourse the great danger and affliction from our 1,200 liquor saloons, was a short-coming to be regretted, but when he compared the Chinaman to a stone in the stomach that cannot be assimilated, he did great wrong to his Mongolian brother. The bitter hostility against the Chinese has been manifested as much to their naturalization as to their temporary residence. All men can be assimilated not simply to the body politic, but to a much nearer and better relation, a brotherhood in Christ. The power to secure this is the Gospel which the doctor preaches, and Chinamen are just as amenable to it as others.

The visit of the Mexican editors is just now the all-absorbing topic. They seem to be an able and cultured body of gentlemen and ladies, and it is hoped that their visit will be a blessing to both countries.

As I write the bell of the Metropolitan church is tolled. This is followed by a dirge from the chimes. I look out and the flag on the government building opposite is at half mast. In a few moments the streets resound with the cry of the newsboys: "Extra paper. General Grant is dead." Though not unexpected it falls on the ear of the people as a national calamity. May it be overruled for the good of the nation.

H. H. HINMAN.

THE NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

SARATOGA SPRINGS, July 18th, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—The great national gathering of teachers here has come and gone. As compared with the one at Madison, Wisconsin, last year, it was greatly lacking both in numbers and in enthusiasm, yet it was truly national both in numbers and in the vast area from which they came, nearly or quite every State having its representative and some of them a large number.

The general plan of the meeting was to have all meet together in the morning, and, after opening with prayer, carefully prepared papers, some of which were of great value, were presented and discussed by what were supposed to be the ablest men and women in the particular line of thought under consideration. The afternoon was given up to the departments, eight in number, which were conducted much in the same way as the general meetings, except that the discussions were thrown open to any who wished to take part. In the evening a general meeting was held similar to those in the morning, except that the first one was given to the addresses of welcome and replies to the same, the third to a lecture on the "Coral Islands" by the superintendent of the American Museum of Natural History, New York City, and the last, after completing the routine business, to short speeches from representative educators of different sections of our great country. Among these the most touching, perhaps, was a plea for national aid for education in the South by the Superintendent of Schools of North Carolina. The speaker said that the people of his State were as a rule, at the close of the war, poor, and although their condition was much improved they were still in straitened circumstances. Two-fifths of the people of his State were colored. The whites had ninety-nine hundredths of the property to-day, and had to pay taxes to educate both races, which as yet had to be educated in separate schools. The cases were exceptional where schools could be kept up more than three months in the year.

A young man represented the Lone Star State. He said that the great State of Texas was divided into districts, and in each of these a training-school for teachers was in session at the very time of the national meeting; nine-tenths of the teachers of the State were in attendance upon these, which attendance was compulsory. If the next meeting of the Association were at Topeka, Kansas, a large number of Texas teachers would attend, even though they had to pay full fare as now. The lowest wages paid to teachers in Galveston, Texas, was sixty-five dollars per month, which was something more than an average in the State.

Time will not permit me to notice at length the papers presented, and yet I cannot refrain from a brief mention of one by Prof. Fallows of Iowa City on the "Practical Value of a College Education." He showed that one-half of one per cent of our population graduate from college; that taking the different departments of our national government from the lower house of Congress to the highest office in the gift of the people, this one-half of one per cent of the people have filled from 41 to 81 per cent of official positions; that counting the office of Chief Justice the highest, the higher the office the larger the per cent of college graduates; that of non-graduates that fill official positions, the age at the time of reaching such positions is ten years greater than that of graduates, thus showing that a college course gives men not only a greater share of the prizes in life, but enables them to enjoy them for a much longer period; thus overwhelmingly did the writer stamp out the assertion of the newspapers and of the would-be "practical educational" men that a college diploma, as a token of preparation for the practical every-day business of life, has no value.

The West bid high for the next meeting of the Association, and the rival points are Topeka, Kansas, and Denver, Colorado. The body having the settlement of the matter are as yet evenly divided between the two, with the chances in favor of Topeka. The governor and State officers of Kansas and the educational bodies of three States have petitioned for the meeting at that point. The other attractions at Saratoga seem to detract from the success of a meeting at that point, and perhaps even more than these, the lack of Western zeal and enthusiasm contribute to the same result.

The stream of summer travel has just fairly turned towards Saratoga. The arrivals on the second day before our departure numbered 4,000.

THE HOME.

THE HERITAGE.

The rich man's son inherits lands,
And piles of brick, and stone, and gold,
And he inherits soft, white hands,
And tender flesh that feels the cold,
Nor dares to wear a garment old;
A heritage, it seems to me,
One scarce would wish to hold in fee.

The rich man's son inherits cares;
The bank may break, the factory burn,
A breath may burst his bubble shares,
And soft, white hands could hardly earn
A living that would serve his turn;
A heritage, it seems to me,
One scarce would wish to hold in fee.

The rich man's son inherits wants,
His stomach craves for dainty fare;
With sated heart, he hears the pants
Of toiling hinds with brown arms bare,
And wearies in his easy chair;
A heritage, it seems to me,
One scarce would wish to hold in fee

What doth the poor man's son inherit?
Stout muscles and a sinewy heart,
A hardy frame, a hardier spirit;
King of two hands, he does his part,
In every useful toil and art,
A heritage, it seems to me,
A king might wish to hold in fee.

What doth the poor man's son inherit?
Wishes o'erjoyed with humble things,
A rank adjudged by toil-worn merit,
Content that from employment springs,
A heart that in his labor sings;
A heritage, it seems to me,
A king might wish to hold in fee.

What doth the poor man's son inherit?
A patience learned by being poor,
Courage, if sorrow comes, to bear it,
A fellow-feeling that is sure
To make the outcast bless his door;
A heritage, it seems to me,
A king might wish to hold in fee.

O rich mans'! son there is a toll,
That with all others level stands:
Large charity doth never soil,
But only whiten, soft, white hands,—
This is the best crop from thy lands;
A heritage, it seems to me,
Worth being rich to hold in fee.

O poor man's son! scorn not thy state;
There is worse weariness than thine,
In merely being rich and great;
Toil only gives the soul to shine,
And makes rest fragrant and benign;
A heritage, it seems to me,
Worth being poor to hold in fee.

Both, heirs to some six feet of sod,
Are equal in the earth at last;
Both children of the same dear God,
Prove title to your heirship vast,
By record to a well-filled past;
A heritage, it seems to me,
Well worth a life to hold in fee.

CLUBTOWN.

AN INCIDENT IN A YOUNG PREACHER'S EXPERIENCE.

His head throbbed painfully, his pulse was high, the heat of the room oppressive. All was sunshine and bloom without; the farmers were busy in the fields, the world seemed bright. He left the room and sauntered down the road, not knowing nor caring much whither he was going. He overtook two ragged urchins fighting. He began to talk with them and they became interested. He told about little boys who swore and became bad men, and good boys who went to Sabbath-school and grew up to be good men. They did not know that it was wrong to swear, nor much about God, the Bible, or the Sabbath. Their shyness worn off, they asked questions and took in the replies. They walked on with him. Soon they reached a cluster of miserable little huts, with plenty of long-eared, lank dogs, cadaverous fowls, squealing swine, and miserably clothed, unwashed, ugly-looking beings, and half-naked children that seemed fit companions.

The urchins pompously led the way to the open door, and exultantly exclaimed: "Here's the man what talks good." They looked; the man swore and ordered him away; the woman swore and stamped her foot; a hideous old woman swore and screamed; the dozen children set up a deafening yell, the dogs barked and snapped, the pigs squealed, the hens clacked, all in the front room! For a moment bedlam reigned, and the prospect was forbidding enough. A few calm words from the young man brought peace to the troubled household. The room was the worst place he had ever seen human beings dwelling in.

Mr. Henry (as we will call him) said that he had recently come to preach in the white church in the village, and wanted to become acquainted with the people in their homes. The old woman interrupted him with an oath. "Wall, ye've jist come to the wrong place, I kin tell ye. Don't you mock us (shaking her fist threateningly) by calling us yer pepel. What ye've cum here for? We's don't want the likes av ye here. Ye git out."

"I am right in calling you my people, if you'll be my people, come to hear me preach and let me come to your house to talk and pray with you. I see that you are poor, so am I. But Christ preached the Gospel to the poor, and so do I."

The old man speaks up: "That's it. Ha! ha! say that agin. That's old Parson Brown out an' out, jist his talk zackly, twenty years agone, when I heard them things. Them's my sentiments. Never mind the old woman, she's half crazy. Talk on, ole chap, talk on."

Mr. Henry began to talk again, when a man suddenly darkened the door with another growling dog, but on seeing a stranger rushed off like a deer.

"Ye fool, cum in, this 'ere man's big, he's a gospel spouter, he's dune ye gude; cum in." And she runs out after him across the road to a haystack, but he don't "cum." She calls back, "I's got him caged."

So Mr. Henry went out, followed by all the human crew, and sits down upon the hay, soon to find himself surrounded by a score of human beings hungering for the Word. He opens his Testament and preaches the truth as it is in Jesus, simple, fresh, unadulterated by worldly wisdom, science or metaphors. Never was a more interested audience in cathedral with lofty ceilings and colored windows and flashing chandeliers, than that little, ragged, ignorant crowd by the haystack. At first some jeered and swore and threatened, only to be silenced by the old woman who was a tyrant mistress. After two hours' talking and reading he proposed prayer, and they all knelt with him most reverently. As he petitioned the throne of grace for their instruction and salvation, they were subdued to deep emotion. Some wept aloud, some groaned in deep contrition, some cried frantically for mercy.

As he rose and bade them farewell, they all gathered around and shook hands with many quaint expressions of endearment and entreaties to "cum agin soon." Returning to his boarding place he related his singular adventure. "Why they are the Prones. A more miserable set of beings never lived. They are the terror of the whole neighborhood. It's not safe to go near their place after dark, "It's known far and near as 'Clubtown,' because of their desperate character. It's a sink of iniquity. You were lucky to get away alive." Such was the intelligence he received about them.

In a few days he made a second visit, and never was a minister of the Gospel more cordially welcomed. Long and interesting was the interview. On rising to leave, the old woman says: "Can't ye cum out an' hould meetin' here some nite; we'll git a big crowd. Lots want to see ye. We don't want to cum to the big church with them stuck-up folks. They'd be skeered, so'd we. We want you all to ussel's. We's mighty poor creatures, God knows, but ye say Christ died for jist such as we, so won't ye cum?"

Who could resist such an invitation to preach the Gospel? He told them he would come up the next Sunday aiternoon if a suitable place could be obtained. After several houses were discussed and rejected as unsuitable, some one suggested a neighboring grove, and one man said that he would get the consent of the owner. On Sunday afternoon, though the heat was intense, the mercury running as high as 105 degrees in the shade, Mr. Henry and an elder of the church drove out three miles to the grove. They were happily disappointed in finding over a hundred people expectantly waiting, quietly sitting upon board seats arranged around a high platform, which were placed there by volunteer hands. Hearty were the exclamations of delight as he shook hands with them all, and then mounted the extemporized pulpit. One uncouth fellow shouted out, "Harra! we's gude as stuck-up folks now; we's got a parson an' church of our own, God bless him. Ha! ha!" with approving amens from the crowd.

Eager was their attention to his exposition of the parable of the Prodigal Son, especially as he told them about the prodigal's return, and welcome to the father's feast. Then the elder gave a short exhortation, and two or three of the rough men arose and tremblingly asked for prayers, and that he would preach some more. Several prayers were fervently offered; deep emotion prevailed; all felt the presence of a higher Being. A unanimous vote was taken to have continued services. To shorten this long story I will summarize the sequel. Mr. Henry preached in the grove every Sunday afternoon during his stay there, to increased audiences. "The Clubtown Church" became extensively celebrated, and many "stuck-up" folks from time to time came from curiosity. A Sabbath-school was organized, which comprised all the regular audience, from the gray-haired grandparents to the babe in its mother's arm. Christian ladies were found to take classes. The Presbyterian Board of Publication kindly donated a library and all necessary helps. It was named the "Henry Union Sabbath-school." "Clubtown" gradually gave way to "Henryville," and the character of the hamlet changed as much. The houses assumed a very decent appearance, the people were more tidily clothed, and arose to a height of respectability previously unknown. Blasphemy and Sabbath-breaking gave way to prayers and religious reading. Many could not read themselves, and would get some one to read aloud. They loved the grove meetings, and reverenced the young preacher. Many struggled to break off vices, and some rejoiced in practical regeneration.

Such was the work begun, and yet progressing; for this is no idle tale, no fancy sketch, but the narration of fact, with the omission of many interesting details. Who can tell the end? The amount of good accomplished? How many jewels the Judge shall on the final day count among them? What Christian need despond at the apparent barrenness of his endeavors? Should we not obey the injunction of Christ to go into the by-ways and hedges and compel the world's poor to come to the Gospel feast?—Rev. H. Martin Kellog, in Gospel Union News.

CHRIST ALONE.

"Sir," said a friend to John Newton, "Sir, if that man become converted and saved, then I shall despair of no one." "Sir," replied Mr. Newton, "I never have despaired of the salvation of any one since I obtained mercy myself." This reply of Mr. Newton suggests the thought that each one of us may with propriety doubt the saving character of his religious experience if he has never been brought with St. Paul to see and to feel that he is the chief of sinners. If one has never been so taught by the Spirit as to see himself as a great sinner and has never been brought to accept Christ alone as his Saviour; as there is no other way of salvation, then he is yet in his sins, without God and without a well-grounded hope in the world. M. P. N.

LITTLE BY LITTLE.

"Little by little," an acorn said,
As it slowly sank in its mossy bed,
"I am improving every day,
Hidden deep in the earth away."
Little by little, each day it grew;
Little by little, it sipped the dew;
Downward, it sent out a thread-like root,
Up in the air sprung a tiny shoot.
Day after day, and year after year,
Little by little the leaves appear;
And the slender branches spread far and wide,
Till the mighty oak is the forest's pride.

"Little by little," said a thoughtful boy,
"Moment by moment, I'll well employ,
Learning a little day by day,
And not spending all my time in play;
And still this rule in my mind shall dwell,
'Whatever I do, I'll do well.'
Little by little, I'll learn to know
The treasured wisdom of long ago;
And one of these days perhaps we'll see
That the world will be the better for me."
And do you not think that this simple plan
Made him a wise and useful man?

LIVES OF CELEBRATED MEN.

WILLIAM FAREL.

The Reformation of the sixteenth century furnished to the church many remarkable men. Three divine elements are ever seen in all heaven-born reformations, to wit, the Word, the Spirit, and the Providence of God. In the leadership of the Reformation of the sixteenth century, each of these essentials and heavenly aids contributed largely to develop and bring out heroes of noble mind and heart.

Erasmus, the ripest of scholars; Luther, of great faith and holy boldness; Melancthon, the mild logician; Zwingle, the clear expositor; Ecolampadius, the sweet-tempered and able disputant; Calvin, the systematic thinker; Bucer, the ardent advocate of Christian union; Tyndal, the persevering translator; Bilney, the fervent prince of prayer; Latimer, of conscientious fearlessness; Cranmer, the discerning organizer; Farel, of superhuman power, all mighty men of renown, were developed in that religious overturn and reformation, and many more of equal valor and of scarcely less usefulness to the reformed church. With loving respect to their memory we would gladly present a biographical sketch of each, but can at this time only consider the last mentioned of the twelve, William Farel, the French reformer, the exemplary sufferer, and the Holy Spirit-guided preacher.

Born in Dauphiny, France, in 1489, in a quiet mountain retreat, of zealous, conscientious Roman Catholic parents, William was instructed in all the wisdom and folly of popery. "I believed," said he, "in the cross, in pilgrimages, in images, vows, and bones. What the priest holds in his hands, puts in the box, encloses, eats, and gives to be eaten is my only true God. I have no other, either in heaven or in earth." On another occasion he said: "Satan had lodged the pope, the papacy, and all that belonged to it in my heart, so that even the pope had not so much of it in himself."

Young Farel was twenty-three years of age before divine light shone into his heart and illuminated his mind. Lefevre, the quiet Christian scholar, was the agent in the hands of God of leading this fervent youth to Christ. The elderly Lefevre had himself drank of the Gospel fountain, though still clinging to the communion of Rome. Farel taking counsel only of his conscience, at once proclaimed the Gospel of Christ and salvation without the intercession of a priest. A storm of persecution broke upon his head. For twelve years that followed, with mingled joy and suffering this Christian hero faced the minions of Rome, proclaiming to his countrymen that the Word of God, and not the decrees of the church, was authority, that Jesus Christ without priest, pope or papacy was "the way, the truth, and the light." Great was this young disciple's faith. Bold as a lion, he seemed to move under the protection of God. His providences often shielded him from the malice of the papists. At last it became impossible for him longer to remain in his native land; he fled to Switzerland. Full of self-sacrificing zeal for the Master, his heart burned to do noble work for Jesus Christ. Like many another good man, he felt that the light he had received he could impart to others, but, ah! a greater light than William Farel once shone out on a dark world, "and the darkness comprehended it not." "If the Son of God," "the Sun of Righteousness,"—one who "spake as never man spake," after a three years personal ministry left behind him but a few hundred followers, how can lesser lights hope to "disciple all nations?" Alas for human zeal! If Farel made little headway in pointing his own countrymen to the Lamb of God, how shall he expect to succeed in a strange land? Thrilled with hope, delight, and love, he pressed on with his purer Gospel, climbing the mountains to his Switzerland mission.

A simple circumstance—the losing of his way—led him to feel the need of God to direct him in the smallest things—how much more in soul-saving. Thus convicted of the importance of the Holy Spirit to attend his ministry, his reliance was fully transferred from his own zeal to dependence upon the Spirit's unction.

About this time a letter of Ecolampadius to Farel also made a deep impression upon him. "It is easy," wrote the teacher of Bale, "to introduce some dogma into the ears of the hearers but to change the heart is God's own work." Luther was wont to say: "God will not aid us until we are abandoned by all." Can we not state it even more strongly? —until we abandon ourselves. So long as an ardent zeal, a good understanding, a fine delivery, an exemplary life, or all combined, are relied upon as the basis of success, God's hand will be withheld. Farel now went forth baptized in God. From this time onward in every place where he was called to labor a Holy Spirit power abode upon him. Whole villages and cities were evangelized by this heaven-sent man.

D'Aubigne said of him: "He pulled down and built up with equal energy. Even his life and apostleship, full of self-sacrifice, and danger, and triumph, was as effectual as were his sermons." It was said: "Farel never attacked a place however difficult of access, which he did not take." How mightily, indeed, God wrought by the hand of this man. Often the subject of mob violence, he was far more a messenger of Holy Spirit power.

At Geneva such overwhelming conviction attended his preaching "that priests were seen to throw off their vestments before the altar and cofess the Protestant creed." At Lusanne, Morat, and Neufchatel, the power of God fell like an avalanche. Neither council or mob could withstand this bold soldier of the cross, for God was with him. No threats from the authorities, no menacing, or violence of mobs could dampen his ardor. Never did Christian soldier show greater boldness in the face of the enemy. Said an historian: "To this Gospel missionary every place was a church; every stone, every bench, every platform was a pulpit." We cannot forbear giving an extract from D'Aubigne's History of the Reformation, concerning Farel's work at Neufchatel:

"No sooner did this man of small stature rise up in any place, with his pale yet sunburnt complexion, with red and uncombed beard, with sparkling eyes and expressive mouth, than the monk's labor was lost; the people collected around him, for it was the Word of God that fell from his lips. All eyes were fixed on him; with open mouth and attentive ears they hung upon his words. And scarcely did he begin to speak when—'Oh! wonderful work of God!' he himself exclaims—'this multitude believe as if it had been one soul.'"

At Vully he carried all before him. Says one writer: "His zeal can be compared only to St. Paul's, His body was small and feeble, but his activity was wholly apostolic!" for, preaching Christ on a Romish festival day at Valangin well nigh cost the reformer his life, but God providentially delivered him from the hands of an infuriate mob, just as they were about to drown him in the Seyon. Farel and his companion in labors, Boyer, were thrust into the castle dungeon, but God wrought their deliverance, though not as Paul and Silas were loosed at Philippi. Thus he continued to preach the Gospel "with the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven," gathering in every place many sheaves for the Master, mid suffering and triumph; receiving opposition that would discourage most good men, always succeeding by the power of divine grace. In the labors of men like Farel, and Fletcher, and Finney, are exemplified the mighty results of heaven-sent power.—Bible Banner.

TOMMY LEARNS ABOUT TOADS.

"Oh, papa, see what a great ugly toad! Do get a stick and kill him before he gets away," said little Tommy Gray, as he was walking in the garden with his father.

"Why do you wish to kill him?" asked his father.

"Oh, because he is such an ugly thing, and I am afraid he will eat up everything in the garden. You know we killed several bugs and worms which we found here last evening. I am sure this toad is much worse than they."

"We killed the bugs and worms because they were destroying our flowers and vegetables. This poor toad never destroys a plant or vegetable about the place. Besides, he is one of our best friends. These insects that are doing so much harm in our garden are just what he uses for his food. I have no doubt that he kills more of them every day than we did last evening. If you can find a live bug, place it near him and see what he will do."

Tommy looked about, and soon found three bugs, which he placed near the toad and then stood back a short distance to see the result. Soon the bugs began to move away. The toad saw them, and made a quick, forward motion of his head. He darted out his tongue and instantly drew them, one by one, into his mouth. Tommy clapped his hands with delight.

"How can such a clumsy-looking fellow use his head and tongue so nimbly?" said Tommy; and he ran off to find more food for him.

The next evening Tommy went again into the garden, and soon found the object of his search ready for his supper. At first the toad was shy, but he soon learned to sit still while Tommy placed the food near him. Then he would dart out his tongue and eat the bugs while Tommy was close by. Finding that the boy did not hurt him, he soon lost all fear and became a great pet. Tommy named him Humpy, and says he would not have him killed now for anything.—Our Little Ones.

TEMPERANCE.

THE PLAGUE OF NARCOTICS.

In a recent sermon Dr. Talmage said America had some as bad plagues as those of Egypt, and characterized narcotics as follows: In all ages the world has sought out some flower or herb or weed to stimulate, to alleviate, or to compose its griefs. A drink called nepenthe calmed the nerves of Greeks and Egyptians. Theban women knew how to compound it. Nepenthe passed away and next came hasheesh, manufactured from Indian hemp. Whole nations have been stimulated, narcotized, and made imbecile with the use of accursed hasheesh. Visions are conjured up, gorgeous and magnificent beyond all description, but it finally drags down body, mind and soul. I knew one of the most brilliant men in this city taken captive by this drug. Friends tried in vain to save him. First body gave way, then mind gave way. He became a raving maniac, blaspheming God into a starless eternity.

Opium is the scourge of nations. In 1861 we used 100,000 pounds. In the last year we used 553,000 pounds. In 1876 there were 255,000 opium consumers in this country. Last year there were 500,000. That is appalling. Don't think that those are merely barbaric Asiatics. Samuel Taylor Coleridge, after conquering the world, was conquered by opium. There are thousands, more women than men, who are being bound, body, mind and soul by this terrible drug. There is a great mystery about some families. You don't know why they don't get along. The opium habit is stealthy, deceitful, deathful. You can cure a hundred drunkards where you can cure one opium eater. Have you just begun it for the assuagement of physical distress? I beg you stop. The pleasure at the start will not pay for the horrors at the end. Morphia is a blessing from God for the relief of pain, but it was never intended to be prolonged for years. Statistics show that there are 80,000 opium eaters in Chicago and 20,000 in St. Louis. At that rate there are 70,000 in New York and Brooklyn.

With some hydrate of chloral is taking the place of opium. Baron Liebig knows that one chemist in Germany makes half a ton of hydrate of chloral a week. There are multitudes taken down with this drug. Look out for hydrate of chloral! You never heard a sermon against opium, but it seems to me there ought to be ten thousand pulpits turned into a quickening flame, thundering Zion's warning against this black narcotic.

You all know what botanists describe as nicotiana. You know it as the inspiring, elevating, emparadising, nerve-shattering, dyspepsia-breeding, health-destroying tobacco. I shall not be offensively personal on this subject, for you nearly all use it. You say that God made it, and it is good. Yes, it is good to kill moths, to kill ticks on sheep, to strangle all kinds of vermin, to fumigate pestiferous places. You say God created it for some particular use. Yes, so he did henbane, nux vomica, and copperas, and all those poisons. You say men live to be old who use it. Yes, in the sense that the man lasted well who was pickled. Smokers are turned into smoked livers. You should advise your children to abstain from it, because the whole medical fraternity of the United States and Great Britain pronounce it the cause of wide-spread ill-health. Drs. Agnew, Hamilton, Woodward—the whole medical fraternity, allopathic, homœpathic, hydropathic, and eclectic, denounce it.

The use of tobacco tends to drunkenness. It creates unnatural thirst. The way that leads down to a drunkard's grave and to a drunkard's hell is strewn thick with tobacco leaves. That man is not thoroughly converted who has only got his heart clean. Ben Franklin said he never saw a well man in the exercise of common sense, who would say that tobacco did him any good. Thomas Jefferson argued against the culture of tobacco. Horace Greeley said: "It is a burning stench." Daniel Webster said: "Let those who smoke go to the horseshed."

One reason why there are so many victims of the tobacco habit is because so many ministers of religion smoke and chew. They smoke until they have bronchitis, and then the dear people must send them to Europe [Laughter]. I can name three eminent clergymen who died of cancer in the mouth, an evil caused by tobacco. There has been many a clergyman whose tombstone was all covered up with eulogy, who ought to have had an inscription, "Killed by too much cavendish." Some smoke till the room is blue; the world is blue; their spirits are blue; everything is blue. The clergymen who are indulging in the habit should repent. How can a man preach repentance when he indulges in such a habit? I have known Presbyteries and General Assemblies and General Synods where there was a room set apart for ministers to smoke in. In England the Methodists of the United States have in nearly all of their conferences passed resolutions against this habit. It is time we had an anti-tobacco reform in the Presbyterian, the Baptist, and the Congregational churches. There are ministers of religion to-day indulging in narcotics, dying by inches, and they don't know what is the matter with them. My experience was that it took ten cigars to make a good sermon. A generous tobacconist of Philadelphia offered to keep me in cigars if I would settle in Philadelphia. But I said to myself "If I smoke more than I ought now, how much more would I smoke if I had an unlimited supply?" That was twenty years ago. I quit then, once and forever. If you smoke cheap tobacco, I want to tell you why it is cheap. It is a mixture of burdock, lampblack, sawdust, colt's foot, plantain leaves, fuller's earth, lime, salt, and a little tobacco.—N. Y. Sun.

Last year the hegira from heated quarters, east and west, to these shaded retreats and cool, health-giving fountains, was said to number 175,000 souls. This is a city of hotels and, sad to say, liquor saloons, for everywhere are abundant proofs that all visitors are not simple water drinkers; nay even, we are told that this is the paradise of the toper, in Saratoga's healing fountains, since here he finds ready prepared and in great abundance the means of readily restoring his abused system to its normal tone after a debauch. Thus are God's greatest blessings made to subserve the base uses of depraved mortals.

COXSACKIE, N. Y., July 22, 1885.—One of the noticeable facts in connection with the great educational gathering at Saratoga, was the absence of surprise or commeut when we were introduced as from Wheaton College. At Madison I scarcely made a new acquaintance who did not greet the announcement of my connection with Wheaton with a peculiar smile, or some comment or question which often contained a sneer. Either the principles we represent must be getting more popular or we must be making less impression in our advocacy of them. I think the former alternative is true, as the strongest utterance of condemnation of the secret orders I have been able to make in any company has so far failed to bring out one word of defense of them, and the cases are not few where I have listened to sentiments similar to my own. Whiskey and beer are everywhere abundant in this country, and everywhere in the towns large new hotels are being built, the walls of which are cemented with the price of blood. If we trust those most obvious signs of prosperity, new and costly buildings, the most prosperous classes are the liquor-sellers and the money-changers. Here, as everywhere, the real producers of wealth, the laborers, fail to get the largest share of products of their own labors, doubtless, in part through their own fault.

The railroad war between the West Shore and New York Central still continues and Vanderbilt says that it will not cease except on terms of his own dictation. He thinks the building of the West Shore railroad was no more honorable an enterprise than putting the hauds of its builders into the till of the N. Y. Central, and yet, unwittingly, in his prattle he shows how the New York Central has been putting both its big hands into the pockets of the people. He says that, notwithstanding the low rate of one per cent per mile fare and freight rates in proportion. the Central has been able to meet all expenses and pay interest on its bonds, water and all. Let legislators take note of this and learn how these huge, soulless monopolies fleece the people and perhaps they may find some suggestion of means to prevent the same. O. F. LUMRY.

LITERATURE.

HINTS ON BIBLE MARKING, by Mrs. Stephen Menzies. Prefatory note by D. L. Moody. Price, 25 cents. Published by W. W. Vanarsdale, Chicago.

Every practical effort to increase our love for the Word of God and assist to the spiritual discernment of its truths we most heartily welcome. The plan developed in this little work with its illustrative pages will be a satisfactory study for lovers of the Word, who may be led to devise some more simple methods of marking. The plan of Mrs. Menzies has, however, great excellence, and is quite suggestive.

ATHEISM AND ARITHMETIC: OR, MATHEMATICAL LAW IN NATURE. Arithmetic in Plants and Planets; Mathematics in Musical Science; Number in Vital Action. By H. L. Hastings, editor of The Christian. Crown 8vo 64 pp. Cloth, 35 cts.; manilla covers, 15 cts. Boston: H. L. Hastings, 47 Cornhill. London: S. Bagster & Sons.

The alarming increase of skepticism and atheism in the land, as illustrated by the fact that, in the United States, the number of homicides was more than twice as large in 1884 as in 1883, indicates the importance of dealing promptly and vigorously with these important questions. The fact that cheap atheistic publications are being scattered by hundreds of thousands, not only in this land, but also in heathen countries where Christianity is just beginning to take root, furnishes another reason for prompt and energetic action on the part of Christians. The Anti-Infidel Library, of which this is the last number, supplies in a cheap, yet substantial and popular form an antidote to this atheistic poison. Some of these numbers have been circulated by the hundred thousand and the result is incalculable.

The fiftieth anniversary of the "Garrison mob" of October 21, 1835, renders timely the two papers in the August Century by the sons of William Lloyd Garrison, descriptive of their father's origin and early life. T. W. Higginson contributes a short prefatory article on the anti-slavery agitators; and a finely engraved portrait of Garrison is the frontispiece. Other portraits and several illustrations accompany the text. Mr. Cable's reply to the critics of his article, "The Freedman's Case in Equity," was finished last May, but owing to its length it can not appear in the Century till the September number of that magazine. Mr. Cable's new essay on the Freedman will be entitled "The Silent South."

Not only farmers but city people, indeed those of all occupations, and particularly housekeepers, will find much most valuable, practical information in the Prairie Farmer, as now edited by Orange Judd, whose writings and teachings have been read and appreciated for many years past. The paper is neatly printed, finely illustrated, and has a most valuable Housekeepers' department. To enable all to become acquainted with this paper, as it is now, it is offered at half price, for six months (26 weekly issues) or, for the nominal price of 50 cents. The number for July 25 is alone worth a full year's subscription price, as it contains entire the new very extensive Drainage Laws of Illinois, which provide for simple, just co-operation in draining farm lands, village lots, draining for coal and other mining purposes, etc. It will pay for all to read and study these laws. Though they cover about 50 large octavo pages of the Session Laws, they are printed complete in the Prairie Farmer of July 25th, a postpaid copy of which can be had for only 5 cents. Address the Prairie Farmer, Chicago, Ill.

THE CHURCHES.

—Christian, make a note of this: The net gain in communicants the past year was nine times greater in foreign missions than in Christendom.

—The Daily Saratogian of Saratoga Springs, July 13th, has the following notice: "Rev. Dr. Blanchard, one of the veteran anti-slavery warriors who fought the battles of liberty side by side with the Garrisons and Cheevers of the past generation, preached a strong discourse in the evening on the "Relation of Christianity to Government and Society." The Doctor, toward 80 years of age, manifests the same energy of thought as did Cheever, and is as alive to the issues of the present as of the past. In the morning his son, President Blanchard of Wheaton College, Ill., a gentleman of pleasing address, participated in the services. President Blanchard, in the absence of Rev. T. W. Jones, will conduct the Wednesday evening meeting."

—The trial of Rev. Robert Clark, the companion of Bro. Edward Mathews, at Coldwater, Mich., ended in conviction and fine. The court house was thronged when the case went to the jury. There was much animation among a large number of Free Methodists near by, and indignation against the jury and court officials was publicly expressed at a meeting at the court house in the evening.

—The Presbyterian church of Bloom, Ill., Rev. William Morrow, pastor, at its communion Sabbath, June 29, received fourteen persons into membership, eight by profession and six by certificate. The outlook for church work, says the Interior, is most encouraging. The services are well atteuded, and the Sabbath-school flourishing, three-fourths of the congregation being members of the school.

—Rev. A. T. Wolff, of Paris, Ill., was installed Sabbath, July 5. This was the first day in the Presbyterian church since it was wrecked by the tornado a few weeks ago. The church has been completely repaired and elegantly refitted. The installation sermon was by Rev. O. S. Thompson.

—Pres. C. A. Blanchard preached last Wednesday evening at the special Gospel services now being conducted in the Moody church in this city by Major Whittle. These meetings are resulting in much good and will probably be continued during August.

—Rev. M. C. Ranseen, of the N. C. A. Board, pastor of the Gethsemane Evangelical Lutheran Swedish church, is raising some $8,000 to complete the payment on the church building. The membership is nearly four hundred.

—The Rev. W. H. Hickman, a Methodist preacher, created a sensation at the Battle Ground camp-meeting, near Lafayette, Ind., Thursday, by advocating marriages between blacks and whites.

—President Lewis Bookwalter of Westfield, Ill, has resigned his connection with the college. He will give a part of his time to the United Brethren Board of Education as secretary, and will pursue a course of study in the Union Biblical Seminary with a view to continuing the pastoral work in the future.

—The gathering this summer at Northfield, Mass., for Bible study and consultatiou, commenciug Aug. 5 and extendiug through Aug. 15. Among those who have promised to be present are Rev. Dr. Brooks, of St. Louis; Rev. Dr. Pierson, of Philadelphia; Rev. Dr. Gordon, of Boston; Rev. Dr. Pentecost, of Brooklyn, and other distinguished Bible students from this country and abroad. Mr. Sankey and other singers will also assist.

—The Church Missionary Gleaner for June notes the recent conversion of several Mohammedans in India, one a famous preacher against Christianity in Calcutta, a medical man of good standing in the Punjab, and another at Bombay, and five others.

—It is reported that the Rev. Dr. Charles A. Briggs, professor of Hebrew in the Union Theological Seminary, who is said to be an accomplished Bible scholar, has come out strongly against the revised version of the Old Testament. He holds that the revisors made a great mistake in accepting as the basis of their work the same Massoretic Hebrew text that was used by the authors of King James' version, and he concludes that in a short time the new version will need revising.

—The Board of Managers of the American Bible Society (New York) have issued a circular in which they state that the available receipts of the Society have fallen short over $250,000 during the past four years. After giving the amount of income and outlay, they close by stating that unless financial help is given at once they must necessarily curtail their work.

—No one can accuse Sam Jones the famous Kentucky evangelist, of being sordid or avaricious. Indeed, he displays a strange disregard for temporalities. In one place where he had held a successful revival a purse of $1,500 was offered him. He took out $200 and directed the committee to distribute the remaining $1,300 among the families of the saloon-keepers who had been converted and therefore thrown out of business.

—The recent report of the American Board on Micronesia, says: "The first island in the Ruk Archipeligo to receive a Christian teacher, four years since, was Uman. The frightened natives fled inland at his approach. The visitor will now find there a large church with a commodious parsonage, a large stone wharf running into the sea, and in the place of the former low, thatched huts, a village of neat houses. A school has one hundred and seventy-five pupils, and the church more than seventy members."

—Only thirty-five Christian Israelites were known to be in all England at the beginning of this century. Since then more thau one hundred Jews have been ordained clergymen of the Church of England, and there are estimated to be 3,000 Christian Israelites in England. In one way or auother it is thought that 1,500 Jews leave the synagogue for the Christian church every year.

—Some months ago a copy of the Holy Scriptures fell into the hands of a wealthy, educated Chilian gentleman in the Roman Catholic city of Concepcion, Chili. He read and believed. Through his influence others read and believed also. The Spirit prompted him to prepare a chapel for divine worship. Unexpected aid was given, and in spite of priestly threats the chapel, filled to overflowing with intelligent and influential men, was formally opened on February 9, Dr. Trimbull, of Valparaiso, conducting the services.

—Paul Kruger, the President of the courageous little Transvaal Republic in South Africa, during his recent tour through Germany, visited the Missiou House in Berliu. The students were surprised at the earnest Christian tone in which he spoke to them. "Young brothers," he said, "I beseech you to know and preach nothing but our Lord Jesus Christ, and Him crucified. I did not seek Him, but He sought me, and God be praised, fouud me. . . . Some from your midst are now in the Transvaal, making known the Saviour, and two of my children are receiviug instruction in the mission school. I assure you that my government will support the mission in the strougest manner, and seek to remove all obstacles out of its way."—S. S. Times.

—A distinguished Chinese officer, who has spent several years in San Francisco, writes: "I have now resided in this country for several years. That I should witness such treatment as my countrymen have met with here, is certainly what I did not anticipate; but, with reference to the members of your sacred religion, I am fully convinced that toward the Chinese they truly practice the precept, love thy neighbor as thyself, and do not discriminate on account of difference of race. I am deeply grateful for the good they have done to the Chinese, which is not a little. When I reach my own country, I shall say and do everything in my power to help the missionaries."

OBITUARY.

Died, MRS. AGNES ROBERTSON, aged 77, at the house of her brother, Thomas Hodge, 67 Warren avenue, Chicago, on the evening of July 20th, 1885 The deceased was born in Crail, Fifeshire, Scotland, and came from Glasgow to Chicago eleven years ago. She was a member of the Second Baptist church in this city. She took a warm interest in the movement against slavery, and as the treasurer of a society in Glasgow sent about two thousand dollars in aid thereof to New York.

Mr. John Darling, an old Cincinnati friend and one of the most esteemed citizens of Burlington, Iowa, died at his home in that city June 25th. The Hawkeye next day mentions his death: "Although it has been known to a large number of the people of Burlington that Mr. John Darling has been lying at the point of death for some days, yet when the word was passed that at seven o'clock last night, he had breathed his last, a feeling of surprise swept over the whole city. No man was better known or more highly respected than Mr. Darling. At the time of his death he was sixty-eight years old."

Mr. Darling had been for many years a consistent member of the Congregational church and held the office of deacon in it, at the time of his death. His excellent wife deeply mourns his loss. Pres. J. Blanchard, their former old pastor, enjoyed a visit with them very much not many months since. His uniform Christian life and lovely character lead us to exclaim, "Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth, the faithful fail from among the children of men."

THE BEREA
EVANGELIST
AIMS TO ADVOCATE
CHRISTIANITY,
AND TO

Help Break Down Everything that Hinders Its Spread.

IT TEACHES that men need to be converted to a person—the personal Christ—and not simply to a system of truth; and that there must be implanted in them a divine life, as well as a correct belief.

THE EVANGELIST seeks to show that the DIVISION OF CHRISTIANS into parties—denominations—sects—is a great wrong, and a very serious obstacle to the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom, and it seeks to show Christians and Christian churches how they may be ONE IN CHRIST, in the "Apostle's fellowship," and to persuade and help them thus to unite.

THE EVANGELIST also opposes INTEMPERANCE, SECRET SOCIETIES, all WORLDLINESS, and the spirit of CASTE, and aims to "war a good warfare" against all wrong.

In thus opposing evil the EVANGELIST carefully endeavors to avoid harsh speaking, believing that it is as much duty to speak truth kindly as it is to speak it at all.

A WOMAN'S VICTORY;

OR

BY JENNIE L. HARDIE.

This simple and touching story which was lately published in the Cynosure is now ready for orders in a beautiful pamphlet. It is worth reading by every Anti-mason —and especially BY HIS WIFE. Get it and take it home to cheer the heart of your companion who may desire to do something for Christ against great evils, but is discouraged from making any public effort. "THE AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST,"

and a new Portrait of

GENERAL GRANT.

The American Agriculturist has just issued a magnificent stipple-style line portrait of General Grant, executed by one of the very first artists of the country. The great warrior is sitting in an easy chair in his now famous library; the expression on his countenance is exceedingly life like, and the whole picture is grand and striking in appearance, far surpassing any previous likeness of the General. Its great merit is due to the fact that it is from General Grant's last sitting; that is, it presents him as a picture of health as he was just before his present and probably fatal malady overtook him. Other portraits, while presenting him in health, do not show his features and general appearance at a late period.

The regular price of the American Agriculturist is $1.50 per year. We have made arrangements with the publishers whereby we are enabled to send, postfree, in a tube specially made for the purpose, this portrait of General Grant, the American Agriculturist from now until the end of the year (eight months) and the Cynosure for the same time, all for the sum of $2.20.

The portrait alone sells for $1 in New York, we are reliably informed; no copies have been disposed of at less than that figure.

A Wonderful Woman,
A Wonderful Life,
AND
A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Flizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

FARM NOTES.

DRAINING PROLONGS THE SEASON.

A case showing the utility of draining recently occurred under our observation. A portion of the field, underlaid with clay and hard pan, that kept the water near the surface, was drained in the fall of 1882. Crookneck squashes and other crops were planted in 1883—about the middle of May—where the ground originally was so wet that it did not admit of planting until June. Several hills of squashes were planted at a distance from the drain, while chance seeds dropped in the manure came up within a few feet of another main drain. The first week in September came a cold snap which killed the squash vines in the first location, leaving a portion of the crop about half grown. This, and the subsequent frosts of that month, did not injure the vines near the drain, and they were still vigorous when the squashes were gathered in October. The same influence in prolonging the season was noticed in the beet crop grown upon the undrained land in 1882 and the same crop grown in 1883. The soil was so wet and muddy in the previous season, that the beet seed rotted and had to be planted three times, and after that many gaps were filled with turnips. It was a very poor crop. In the past season the beet seed came up fairly, the few vacant places were filled by transplanting, and a fine crop of mangolds and sugar beets were gathered, at much less cost of labor. This is very conclusive proof of the advantage of draining. It raises the temperature of the soil so that seeds will vegetate two or three weeks earlier in the spring, and it retains the summer heat so that damaging frosts are kept off several weeks in the autumn. Draining is of special service in raising of all crops of tropical origin, as squashes, melons, tomatoes, egg plant, peppers, corn, etc. It is the effectual cure of wet lands in all climates, and indispensable to the profitable cultivation of all swamps and spongy land in the northern portions of our country. It will add from four to six weeks to the length of the growing season, for many of the crops grown in the market garden and upon the farm. Capital invested in tile draining is admitted to be among the safest and best investments the farmer can make.—WM. CLIFT, in Agriculturist for December.

PASTURE GRASSES.

The butchers of my town, who are familiar with every pasture in the township, say that I have the best one they have seen, and I attribute it to the fact that I seeded heavily with mixed grasses. I sowed more timothy than my neighbors do when seeding for meadow, then I put one bushel of blue grass seed to the acre, and on the richest land I sowed orchard grass, and along the run red-top, and I mixed with the timothy enough clover seed to make three or four pounds to the acre. My management of this pasture since it was sown has been such that it has grown better every year I have always kept the stock off from it from the time the ground first froze in the fall, till the ground was well settled and the feed good in the spring, and while I have often stocked it heavily so that it has been eaten close in June and July, I have always reduced the stock in the latter part of the season so as to have growth enough to furnish protection to the roots through the winter. With such a pasture as I describe of mixed grasses, a cow will need no extra food while the pasture is good, but will give a full flow of milk; but if the pasture does not contain a variety of grasses, or is so heavily stocked as to be short, extra feed will be found profitable. I think cattle will do better to have two pastures, and allow one to grow up while the other is being depastured, as the cows will relish the change, and I believe that the land will yield more grass than if grazed constantly. —Ex.

CURING HAY.

Hay half cured will not save sweet and clean in stack or mow, with the ordinary surroundings. It may keep in a tight mow where the air is entirely excluded, something on the same principle of the silo. But damp hay, half cured, when put in stack or barn, will mould, spoil and become useless. And the old and foolish idea that salt will aid in preserving hay when used in the proportion of one gallon to the ton, is too ridiculous to contemplate. It was one of Horace Greeley's impracticable theories published on the same page of the Tribune with the recommendation to sprinkle cucumbers and melon vines with salt pickle to kill the striped bugs.

The writer had a hay farm exclusively for twenty years in Indiana, where he made all kinds of experiments in cutting and curing hay. And during twenty-three years on a large farm in Iowa, where he seldom, if ever, cut less than 150 tons of hay per year, he found invariably that it was necessary to have his hay thoroughly cured if he would have it come out in winter sweet and clear of must.—Iowa State Register.

PLENTY OF WATER FOR CELERY PLANTS.

Celery is a vegetable that drinks constantly. If its thirst is not quenched the stalks grow tough and hollow-stemmed. Keep the plants growing from the time they appear above ground in the seed bed. Transplant them to rich soil—give them water as often as they need it, and give it in abundance, and you will have tender, plump celery.

The Coming Conflict.

A NEW AND STRANGE STORY BASED ON STARTLING FACTS, VIVIDLY PORTRAYING A MYSTERIOUS AND DANGEROUS POWER AT WORK IN THE GOVERNMENT, THE CHURCH, AND THE HOME.

"All will agree that this is a powerfully written story."—Evangelist, (Chicago, Ills.)

"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D. D. in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia.)

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

"The book will create a sensation in Masonic circles, and evoke criticism of a most relentless character. The courage of the author in attacking such a rock-rooted bulwark as Freemasonry is something to admire, Fanatic though he be."—Nebraska Watchman.

"Light is needed on this subject and needed badly, and we welcome this contribution to the literature of anti-secretism, and cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers."—United Presbyterian, (Pittsburgh.)

"A charming work, fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin;' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of refereuce as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the book, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.'"—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ills.)

WEBSTER'S PRACTICAL A NEW DEPARTURE IN DICTIONARIES.

An Industrial Revolution.—In a large Connecticut manufacturing establishment there is in operation a new style of furnace which produces more steam-power from a consumption of 1,000 lbs of coal than can be generated from 20,000 lbs burned in the ordinary way. In other words, the new contrivance already saves nineteen-twentieths of the fuel, and it is believed that before being publicly announced it will be so improved that the saving will reach 49 fiftieths! The facts already developed are simply incredible to one who has not actually seen them verified.

A Remarkable Coincidence.—While the new Furnace was in process of construction, the editors and publishers of Webster's Unabridged were engaged upon their new work which is as great an improvement upon all previous Dictionary productions, and just as valuable in its way as is the incredible fuel economizer above alluded to. Webster's Practical is not only a new compilation by the leading Dictionary House of the world, but it embodies several new features which, for ordinary use, render it pre-eminent among dictionaries—not excepting even the Unabridged.

1st, Condensation.—By grouping all derivative and compound words under their root or leader (as in the "Book" example quoted below), such words are adequately treated in one-third of the space required by the old arrangement. By this means nearly all the desirable material of the four and five-dollar dictionaries is presented in a convenient and handy form in Webster's Practical.

2d, Association.—We comprehend as well as remember things chiefly by their associations. For this reason any one who shall carefully read the "Book" paragraph which we reproduce from Webster's Practical Dictionary, will not only comprehend it more readily, but will be able to remember two or three times as much as would be gained by reading about the same words when treated separately as in other works.

3d, Ready Reference.—Not only do we comprehend and remember more readily by the new grouping method, but we do it in less than a fourth of the time required when the words are classified in the old way. Hence, no one who values time would hesitate to pay one dollar for Webster's Practical rather than accept the best of the older dictionaries as a gift.

4th, Derivative Terminations.—Only the larger dictionaries hitherto published give the derivative terminations. The New American Dictionary, for instance, does not give any of the four variations of so common a word as forbear, while they are all given in Webster's Practical.

5th, The Illustrations in Webster's Practical are more numerous and better executed than those of any other abridged or low-priced dictionary.

6th, Prefixes and Suffixes.—Another important feature of Webster's Practical is its peculiar treatment of prefixes and suffixes, which is believed to be more desirable than a separate department of two or three hundred pages which is sometimes allotted to them.

7th, Compendium Matter.—Still another invaluable feature of Webster's Practical is its compendium matter, over one hundred pages of which is devoted to the most complete Pronouncing Vocabulary ever compiled of Biblical, Classical, Mythological, Historical and Geographical Proper names. With Webster's Practical Dictionary at hand, one need not be at a loss to correctly pronounce or spell the most difficult words.

8th, An Invaluable Book.—The importance of supplying every child with Webster's Practical for his very own, is not generally appreciated. As an educator it is worth a hundred times its price, and a little self-denial to provide one or more copies in every family will prove a better economy than an endowment of hoarded bank-stocks later on in life.

The following paragraph is reproduced from Webster's Practical.

Book, bŏŏk, n. A collection of sheets of paper, etc., bound together; a literary composition, written or printed; a subdivision of a literary work. (Mer.) A volume in which accounts are kept. — v. t. (BOOKED (bŏŏkt), BOOKING.) To enter, or register in a book. — Book'ish, a. Given to reading; more acquainted with books than with men. — Book'-bind'er, n. One who binds books. — -bind'ery, n. A place for binding, etc. — -bind'ing, n. Art or practice of, etc. — -case, n. A case with shelves for holding books. (Bind.) A book-cover. — -cov'er, n. (Bind.) A case for a book; a cover of cloth or other material prepared for casing a book. — -keep'er, n. One who keeps accounts. — -keep'ing, n. Art of recording mercantile transactions and keeping accounts. — -learned, -lĕrnd, a. Versed in books; ignorant of life. — -learn'ing, n. Learning acquired by reading,—esp. as opp. to practical knowledge. — -mak'er, n. One who writes and publishes books; a compiler; a sporting man who makes a record of bets. — -mak'ing, n. The practice of, etc.; compilation; systematized betting. — -mark, n. Something placed in a book by which to find a particular place. — -plate, n. A label indicating ownership, place in a library, etc., usually on the inside of the cover of a book. — -post, n. The post-office arrangement by which books are mailed. — -sell'er, n. One who sells books. — -shelf, n. A shelf to hold books. — -shop, -stall, -store, n. A place for selling books. — -stand, n. A stand for selling books in the streets; book-stall; a support to hold books. — -worm, n. A worm or mite that eats holes in books; one excessively addicted to study.

THE QUANTITY TEST.

Webster's Practical Dictionary, ($1) 600,000 Words and 1,400 Illustrations.
New American Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Popular Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Standard Dictionary, ($1) 210,000 Words and 612 Illustrations.

Quality Test.—Aside from all advantages above alluded to, there is still another and very important feature of the new work to be considered, viz.: its quality as compared with the cheap dictionaries which have had the largest sales, and which have been compiled chiefly from the old editions of Webster on which the copyrights have expired. Hence Webster's Practical contains more matter than any other dollar dictionary. Its quality, to say the least, is the very best, while its arrangement and all other new and desirable features, including first-class illustrations, paper, printing and binding are added without extra charge.

A Subscription Book.—As Webster's Practical is not for sale at book-stores, our readers will be able to procure it only from canvassing agents, unless it be ordered in connection with this journal in accordance with our special offers.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

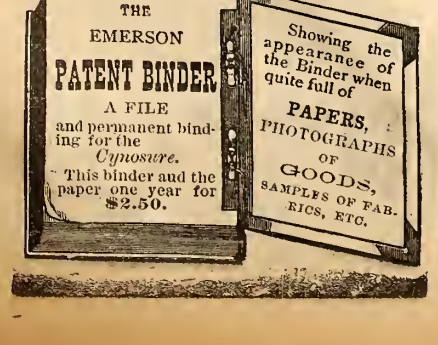
IN BRIEF

The museum of St. Petersburg has a bank note, probably the oldest in existence. It is of the Imperial Bank of China, was issued by the Chinese Government, and dates from the year 1395, B.C.

A St. Paul shop-girl was discharged from her position in a fashionable glove store, because her hands were so small and shapely as to make the lady patrons so envious that they would not allow her to wait upon them.

A recent prize-man in one of the leading New England colleges is said to have paid his way by buying old clocks and bric-a-brac in country towns and selling them at fancy prices to New York and New Haven collectors.

Profane words having been occasionally spoken within the hallowed precincts of the court house at Palatka, Fla., the county officers agreed to inflict a tax of ten cents on each repitition. A fund to the poor is rapidly growing, and there seems to be some prospect of a law suit to decide what shall be done with the proceeds. A man from the country paid forty cents for the pleasure of a five minutes' conversation.



One of the greatest curiosities of the present day, found among the pines of Central Wisconsin, was discovered near Knowlton, a few weeks ago. It was in the form of a petrified squirrel, about the size of a common squirrel, and was taken from the heart of a tree by some woods men. It was of a brownish color, as hard as a rock, and was "as natural as life," even to the kink in its long bushy tail.

We eat a good deal more sugar than we did five years ago. In 1880 the annual consumption of sugar per head in this country was 41.2 pounds. In 1884 it was 51.4 pounds. At the same time much less molasses is used. Our total consumption of sweets is 56 pounds per head. In England it is 67 pounds. We eat more than twice as much as France, three times much as Germany, and eight times as much as Russia.

A young man in Brooklyn, after consulting his watch, dropped it into his pocket, when he was startled by an explosion, which was followed by many others in rapid succession. Before he could remove his clothing it had burned through to the flesh and a painful wound inflicted. The hand in which he held the watch was severely burned. An examination proved the explosion to have been caused by chlorate of potash tablets, which he was in the habit of carrying loose in his pockets, and which were ignited by the watch being dropped quickly upon them.

Among the signers of the remonstrance sent to the Massachusetts Legislature against the further extension of the suffrage to woman, are: President Eliot, of Harvard; Profs. Francis Bowen, and John Towbridge; Chancellor Bodfish, of the Cathedral; Bishop Paddock, the Rev. Henry M. Dexter of the Congregationalist, and over fifty other clergymen; Thomas Bailey Aldrich, John Boyle O'Reilly, Francis Parkman, William Endicott, Jr., O. B. Frothingham, Frederick Law Olmstead, Charles R. Codman, Alexander H. Rice, and Henry Cabot Lodge.

At the Wolvercote Mill, near Oxford, 375 tons of rags have been consumed in making 250 tons of paper for the Oxford edition of the Revised Bible. This amount would cover two and a quarter square miles, and would go round the world in a strip of six inches wide, or if the pages were laid open one after another. The sheets piled in reams as they leave the mill would make a column ten times the height of St. Paul's or folded into books before binding at least 100 times that height. About 1,560 goat skins were used in binding the copies which were presented to the American Committee of Revision.

The Master's Carpet, or Masonry and Baal Worship Identical, explains the true source and meaning of every ceremony and symbol of the lodge, and proves that Modern Masonry is identical with the "Ancient Mysteries" of Paganism. Bound in fine cloth, 420 pp.....75 cts.

Freemasonry at a Glance Illustrates every sign, grip and ceremony of the first three degrees Paper cover, 36 pages. Single copy, six cents.

Freemasonry Illustrated. A complete exposition of the seven degrees of the Blue Lodge and Chapter. Profusely illustrated. A historical sketch of the institution and a critical analysis of the character of each degree, by Prest. J. Blanchard, of Wheaton College. Monitorial quotations and nearly four hundred notes from standard Masonic authorities confirm the truthfulness of this exposition and show the character of Masonic teaching and doctrine. The accuracy of this exposition legally attested by J. O. Doesburg, Past Master Unity ☐ No. 191, Holland, Mich., and others. This is the latest, most accurate and complete exposition of Blue Lodge and Chapter Masonry. Over one hundred illustrations—several of them full page—give a pictorial representation of the lodge-room, chapter and principal ceremonies of the degrees, with the dress of candidates, signs, grips, etc. Complete work of 640 pages, in cloth, $1 00. per dozen, $9.00. Paper covers, 75 cents; per dozen, $7.50. First three degrees (376 pages), in cloth, 75 cents; per dozen, $7.50. Paper cover, 40 cents; per dozen, $4.00. ☞The Masonic quotations are worth the price of this book.

Mah-Hah-Bone; comprises the Hand Book, Master's Carpet and Freemasonry at a Glance. Bound in one volume. This makes one of the most complete books of information on the workings and symbolism of Freemasonry extant. Well bound in cloth, 589 pp.....$1.00

Adoptive Masonry Illustrated. A full and complete illustrated ritual of the five degrees of Female Free Masonry, by Thomas Lowe; comprising the degree of Jephtha's Daughter, Ruth, Esther, Martha and Electa, and known as the Daughter's Degree, Widow's Degree, Wife's Degree, Sister's Degree and the Benevolent Degree. 20 cents each; per dozen, $1.75.

Knight Templarism Illustrated. A full illustrated ritual of the six degrees of the Council and Commandery, comprising the degrees of Royal Master, Select Master, Super-Excellent Master, Knight of the Red Cross, Knight Templar and Knight of Malta. A book of 341 pages. In cloth, $1.00; $8.50 per dozen. Paper covers, 50cts; $4.00 per dozen.

Grand Lodge Masonry. Its relation to civil government and the Christian religion. By Prest. J. Blanchard, at the Monmouth Convention. The un-Christian, anti-republican and despotic character of Freemasonry is proved from the highest Masonic authorities. 5 cents each; per dozen. 50 cents.

Judge Whitney's Defense before the GRAND LODGE OF ILLINOIS. Judge Daniel H Whitney was Master of the lodge when S. L. Keith, a member of his lodge, murdered Ellen Slade. Judge Whitney, by attempting to bring Keith to justice, brought on himself the vengeance of the lodge, but he boldly replied to the charges against him, and afterwards renounced Masonry. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

Oaths and Penalties of Freemasonry, as proved in court in the New Berlin Trial. Also the letter of Hon. Richard Rush to the anti-Masonic committee of York County, Pa., May 4th, 1831. The New Berlin trials began in the attempt of Freemasons to prevent public initiations by seceding Masons. These trials were held at New Berlin, Chenango Co., N. Y., April 13 and 14th, 1831, and General Augustus C. Welsh, sheriff of the county, and other adhering Freemasons, swore to the truthful revelation of the oaths and penalties. 10 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

Stearns' Inquiry into the Nature and TENDENCY OF FREEMASONRY. With an Appendix treating on the truth of Morgan's Exposition and containing remarks on various points in the character of Masonry, and a Dialogue on the necessity of exposing the lodge. 338 pages: cloth, 60 cents each, per dozen, $5.00. Paper covers, 40 cents each; per dozen, $4.00.

Masonic Oaths Null and Void; or, Freemasonry Self-Convicted. This is a book for the times. The design of the author is to refute the arguments of those who claim that the oaths of Freemasonry are binding upon those who take them. His arguments are conclusive, and the forcible manner in which they are put, being drawn from Scripture, makes them convincing. The minister or lecturer will find in this work a rich fund of arguments. 207 pp., postpaid.....40 cts.

Bernard's Appendix to Light on Masonry. Showing the character of the institution by its terrible oaths and penalties. Paper covers: 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Freemasonry Self-Condemned. By Rev J. W. Bain. A careful and logical statement of reasons why secret orders should not be fellowshiped by the Christian Church, and by the United Presbyterian church in particular. Paper covers: price, 20 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Masonry a Work of Darkness, adverse to Christianity, and inimical to republican government. By Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong (Presbyterian), a seceding Mason of 21 degrees. This is a very telling work and no honest man who reads it will think of joining the lodge. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

The Mystic Tie, or Freemasonry a LEAGUE WITH THE DEVIL. This is an account of the church trial of Peter Cook and wife, of Elkhart, Indiana, for refusing to support a reverend Freemason; and their very able defense presented by Mrs. Lucia C. Cook, in which she clearly shows that Freemasonry is antagonistic to the Christian religion. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

Sermon on Masonry, by Rev. James Williams, Presiding Elder of Dakota District Northwestern Iowa Conference, M. E. Church—a seceding Master Mason. Published at the special request of nine clergymen of different denominations, and others. 10 cents each; per dozen, 75 cents.

Are Masonic Oaths Binding on one InITIATE. By Rev. A. L. Post. Proof of the sinfulness of such oaths and the consequent duty of all who have taken them to openly repudiate them. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Freemasonry Contrary to the ChrisTIAN RELIGION. A clear, cutting argument against the lodge, from a Christian standpoint. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Thirteen Reasons why a Christian should not be a Freemason. By Rev. Robert Armstrong. The author states his reasons clearly and carefully, and any one of the thirteen reasons, if properly considered, will keep a Christian out of the lodge. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Oaths and Penalties of the 33 DeGREES OF FREEMASONRY. To get these thirty-three degrees of Masonic bondage, the candidate takes half-a-million horrible oaths. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

ON ODDFELLOWSHIP.

Sermon on Odd-fellowship and Other Secret Societies, by Rev. J. Sarver, pastor Evangelical Lutheran church, Leechburg, Pa. This is a very clear argument against secretism of all forms and the duty to disfellowship Odd-fellows, Freemasons, Knights of Pythias and Grangers is clearly shown by their confessed character as found in their own publications. 10 cents each; per dozen 75 cents

Odd-fellowship Judged by Its Own Utterances; Its Doctrine and Practice Examined in the Light of God's Word. By Rev. J. H. Brockman. This is an exceedingly interesting, clear discussion of the character of Odd-fellowship, in the form of a dialogue. In cloth, 50 cents; per dozen, $4.00. Paper covers, 25 cents; per dozen, $2.00. German edition, entitled "Christian and Ernst," paper covers, 50 cents each. The German edition is published by the author.

Revised Odd-fellowship Illustrated. The complete revised ritual of the Lodge, Encampment and Rebekah (ladies') degrees, profusely illustrated, and guaranteed to be strictly accurate; with a sketch of the origin, history and character of the order, over one hundred foot-note quotations from standard authorities, showing the character and teachings of the order, and an analysis of each degree by President J. Blanchard. This ritual corresponds exactly with the "Charge Books" furnished by the Sovereign Grand Lodge. In cloth, $1.00; per dozen, $8.00. Paper cover, 50 cents; per dozen, $4.00.

Other Secret Society Rituals.

Ritual of the Grand Army of the RePUBLIC, with signs of recognition, passwords, etc. and the ritual of the Machinists and Blacksmiths' Union. (The two bound together.) 10 cents each; per dozen, 75 cents.

Knights of Pythias Illustrated. By Past Chancellor. A full illustrated exposition of the three ranks of the order, with the addition of the "Amended, Perfected and Amplified Third Rank." The lodge-room, signs, countersigns, grips, etc., are shown by engravings. 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

United Sons of Industry Illustrated, A full and complete illustrated ritual of the secret trades-union of the above name, giving the signs, grips, passwords, etc. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

Exposition of the Grange. Edited by Rev A. W. Goeslin. Illustrated with engravings, showing lodge-room, signs, signals, etc. 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Temple of Honor Illustrated. A full and complete illustrated ritual of "The Templars of Honor and Temperance," commonly called the Temple of Honor, a historical sketch of the order, and an analysis of its character. A complete exposition of the Subordinate Temple, and the degrees of Love, Purity and Fidelity, by a Templar of Fidelity and Past Worthy Chief Templar. 25 cents each; per dozen $2.00.

Good Templarism Illustrated. A full and accurate exposition of the degrees of the Lodge, Temple and Council, with engravings showing the signs, grips, etc. 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00

Five Rituals Bound Together. "Oddfellowship Illustrated" (old work), "Knights of Pythias Illustrated," "Good Templarism Illustrated," "Exposition of the Grange" and "Ritual of the Grand Army of the Republic," are sold bound together in Cloth for $1.00; per doz., $9.00

Rituals and Secrets Illustrated. Composed of "Temple of Honor Illustrated," "Adoptive Masonry Illustrated," "United Sons of Industry Illustrated," and "Secret Societies Illustrated." $1.00 each; per dozen, $9.00.

SERMONS AND ADDRESSES.

Sermon on Secretism, by Rev. R. Theo Cross, pastor Congregational Church, Hamilton, N. Y. This is a very clear array of the objections to Masonry that are apparent to all. 5 cents each; per dozen. 50 cents.

Prof. J. G. Carson, D. D., on Secret SOCIETIES. A most convincing argument against fellowshiping Freemasons in the Christian church. 10 cents each; per dozen, 75 cents.

Freemasonry a Fourfold Conspiracy. Address of Prest. J. Blanchard, before the Pittsburgh Convention. This is a most convincing argument against the lodge. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

A Masonic Conspiracy, Resulting in a fraudulent divorce, and various other outrages upon the rights of a defenseless woman. Also the account of a Masonic murder, by two eye-witnesses. By Mrs. Louisa Walters. This is a thrillingly interesting, true narrative. 20 cents each; per dozen $2 00.

Sermon on Secret Societies. By Rev. Daniel Dow, Woodstock, Conn. The special object of this sermon is to show the right and duty of Christians to examine into the character of secret societies, no matter what object such societies profess to have. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Discussion on Secret Societies. By Elder M. S Newcomer and Elder G. W. Wilson, a Royal Arch Mason. This discussion was first published in a series of articles in the Church Advocate. 25 cents each; per doz $2.00.

Prest. H. H. George on Secret Societies. A powerful address, showing clearly the duty of Christian churches to disfellowship secret societies. 10 cents each; per dozen, 75 cents.

Secrecy vs. the Family, State and CHURCH. By Rev. M. S. Drury. The antagonism of organized secrecy to the welfare of the family, state and church is clearly shown. 10 cents each; per dozen, 75 cents.

Narratives and Arguments, showing the conflict of secret societies with the Constitution and laws of the Union and of the States. By Francis Semple. The fact that secret societies interfere with the execution and pervert the administration of law is here clearly proved. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

Sermon on Masonry. By Rev. J. Day Brownlee. In reply to a Masonic Oration by Rev. Dr. Mayer, Wellsville, Ohio. An able Sermon by an able man. 5 cents each; per dozen 50 cents.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

GEN. GRANT DEAD.

Tuesday afternoon, July 21, a decided change for the worse took place in the condition of General Grant, and it was evident to the family and the physician that he was surely sinking. The weakness in his condition continued throughout Wednesday, his nourishment consisting solely of two glasses of milk. Hypodermic injections of brandy were given at intervals, and at 8 o'clock in the evening the sufferer was put to bed, from which his physicians did not expect that he would even rise again. About the hour mentioned his extremities began to grow numb and cold and dissolution was expected speedily, but was delayed until 8:08 next morning, when the most renouned American citizen passed quietly away in the presence of his weeping family and friends.

Col. Fred D. Grant on Friday accepted the offer of the city of New York, and the remains of the General will be interred in Central Park. The funeral train will leave Mount McGregor Tuesday, August 4, stop at Saratoga two hours, and reach Albany in the evening, where the remains will lie in state in the capitol until noon Wednesday, and then they will be taken to New York where they will lie in state in the City Hall until Saturday, August 8, when interment will take place in Central Park.

By authority of Mr. Joseph W. Drexel it is stated that the cottage where General Grant died will never again be occupied by any family or persons. The house and its apurtenances will be presented to the State or Nation.

WASHINGTON.

A proclamation was issued Thursday by the President directing stockmen on the Arapahoe and Cheyenne reservation to remove their cattle within forty days.

A preliminary meeting of stockmen who hold Arapahoe and Cheyenne leases was held Friday at St. Louis, to discuss the President's proclamation. They claim it will be impossible to remove 300,000 to 400,000 head of cattle in forty days, as no lands are open on which they can be placed.

A telegram from Inspector Armstrong to the Interior department announces that the count of the Indians on the Cheyenne and Arapahoe reservation is progressing quietly and no further trouble is apprehended.

The report of the chief of the Bureau of Statistics just issued shows that the number of immigrants arrived in the U. S. during the fiscal year ended June 30, was 387,821, being 122,013 less than the immigration during the preceding fiscal year, and 401,171 less than during the year ending June 30, 1882, the year of the greatest immigration.

COUNTRY.

Judges Craig and Shope of the Illinois Supreme Court granted a supersedeas in the Mackin case Thursday at Galesburg, but refused bail to the prisoner. There is much indignation in Chicago that the great ballot thief should have this consideration.

General Sheridan had a conference on Monday with the dissatisfied indians at Fort Reno, at which the Indians stated that they were entirely peaceable and that they had no cause of complaint but that they were opposed to grass leases. On the other hand Powder Face, the Arapahoe chief, said his people were in favor of the grass leases and that they had always been treated honorably by the lessees.

Barnum's elephant, Albert, which killed its keeper last Saturday, was taken to the Keene (N. H.) suburbs Monday afternoon and shot, thirty three members of a militia company firing at the beast at the same time. The remains will be sent to the Smithsonian institution.

Judge Foraker, the Republican candidate for governor of Ohio, has declined to debate with the Rev. Dr. Leonard on the question, "The Taxation vs. the Prohibition of the Liquor Traffic."

Owing to non-payment of taxes nearly 200 corporations have been enjoined from transacting business in New Jersey.

The trustees and officers of Vassar College failed to elect a President, Tuesday, Rev. Dr. Galusha Anderson, President of Chicago University, securing but twelve votes, when fifteen were necessary. An adjournment was taken to September 1.

Gov. Martin's proclamation, calling attention to the law prohibiting Texas cattle from entering Kansas at this season, and calling on the officers of the border counties to see that the law is enforced, is received with great favor by the cattle men. It is said great herds of Texas cattle are being driven through northward and will reach the Kansas border in a few days. Then will come the tug of war, as the Kansas cattlemen are determined not to let them enter the State.

Two explosions of gunpowder occurred Wednesday at York, Pa., two men being blown 400 feet and shockingly mangled, and other persons and horses at a considerable distance thrown to the ground.

There were eight deaths from sunstroke Wednesday at Philadelphia.

Up to 3 P. M. at New York Wednesday fourteen deaths occurred from heat and sunstroke.

At St. Louis Tuesday five men were killed by sunstroke and two by lightning. A rainstorm flooded the northern part of the city, an inch of water falling.

Near Douglas, Kan., Sunday morning, Mr. and Mrs. Jay Carman, the former's mother, Mrs. James Carman, and Mr. and Mrs. Koats, were drowned while fording the Walnut river in wagons.

The United States Express Company has been sued at Winterset, Iowa, for unlawful transportation of liquor.

Although trouble was anticipated at Friday's anniversary celebration at Salt Lake City the day was passed in a peaceable manner. Praise is awarded Gov. Murray for the precautions taken.

In the town of Minden, Webster parish, Louisiana, Tuesday night a party of masked men gained entrance to the jail, forced the prisoners to hold up to the grated doors John Figures and Cicero Green, two colored desperados, and while thus held the two men were shot to death.

Londe Shipley, 11 years old, fell asleep in a meadow near Montgomery, Ind., and was run over by a mowing machine, cutting him almost to pieces.

An unknown person placed dynamite in a shock of grain on Mr. John Deardorff's farm near Wabash, Ind., and when run through the threshing machine an explosion occurred, which fatally injured Mr. Deardorff, and wounded several others.

FOREIGN.

A dispatch from London states that the government has received information of the report of the death of El Mahdi of small pox on June 29.

In Spain Wednesday there was a total of 2,278 new cases of cholera and 948 deaths. Cases are reported at Salamanca and Barcelona. There has been a slight increase in the densely populated poorer districts, where hygienic measures are impossible. The municipal authorities are organizing wards for cholera patients in many hospitals. There have been over 12,000 deaths from the disease in Spain.

In the British House of Commons on Thursday the government was defeated by a vote of 180 to 130 on a clause of the medical relief bill. The Parnellites opposed the government.

The marriage of Princess Beatrice, the youngest daughter of Queen Victoria, to Prince Henry of Battenberg, took place Thursday at St. Mildred's church, Whippingham, six miles from Osborn in the Isle of Wight. By marrying Beatrice, Prince Henry makes his home in England and is under obligation to live near his mother-in-law, who desires still to enjoy the society of her daughter as much as possible. All the Queen's daughters have been separated far from her as the result of their marriage and the condition under which the prince won his bride seems a reasonable one.

A subsidy of 6,400 acres of land per mile has been granted to the Manitoba Central Railroad Company by the Canadian government on condition that they build fifty miles of the road this season.

An engineer just escaped from Berber states that Oliver Pain, who it was recenty stated had been killed by Arabs, is alive and well at that place.

A large force of Egyptian rebels made a desperate attempt to carry Kassala by assault, but were repulsed by the garrison and lost 3,000 men in killed and wounded.

Intelligence comes from West Africa that on May 10, the King of Dahomey made a raid on the villages under French protection, indulging in wholesale massacres of the inhabitants. One thousand youths and women [illegible] captured and carried to Dahomey, [illegible] acrificed at the cannibalistic feasts.

"Sir" William P. Innes of Grand Rapids, Mich., is "Grand Recorder" of the "Grand Encampment" of the "Grand Commandery" of Knight Templar Freemasons of that State. Although his annual report on correspondence filled one hundred and ninety pages, yet he has common sense enough left to say of his Grand Encampment: "It seems to be conceded by a large majority, that, as for its usefulness, it is a thing of the past; but for its social and 'funny business' it is still in the height of its prosperity." That is a self-condemnation by Freemasons which not a few church members should consider well. For these same meetings they are full of unqualified admiration. How often does their foolish approbation excite the derision of the lodge!

The hot weather seems to have exhausted the energies of the good citizens of Chicago who have stood firmly against the aggressions of infidel pleasure-seekers upon the Sabbath day. They broke up Mr. Hesing's nice plan for a regular weekly horse-race on that day, but when a so-called "City League" advertised four different base-ball games in as many parts of the city for last Sabbath afternoon, there was no public protest heard. God interfered for his day, however, with one of the heaviest rainfalls ever known here (nearly six inches), so that people were more interested in keeping water from trickling through their roofs and running from choked sewers into their basements than in base-ball games.

The modern inventions of Gatling guns, which enable one man to shoot as much lead as a regiment; the Martini-Henry rifles, which shoot a mile twelve times a minute; the multi-charge cannon, which carries ten miles; the dynamite shell guns and torpedoes,—all tend to make the carnage of war so horrible that men will cease to engage in it. Prof. Gower of London proposes to add yet another horror. He suggests a plan of aerial warfare with gun cotton, and proposes to show that, upon the simplest principles of self-preservation, nations must keep peace and great armies be disbanded. We fear the terrible spirit of war will survive all these inventions.

This spirit, which promotes the regular drill in thousands of Knight Templar, Odd-fellow, United Workmen, Knight of Pythias, and other lodges; and which is the inspiration of our militia companies, and largely of the "old soldier reunions" with their sham battles, had a terrible rebuke the other day at Conneaut Lake, Pa. During a sham battle the troops became excited and uncontrollable and made the sham a reality. Some twenty men were injured, some of them for life, in this boy-play business.

General Grant was a member of one secret society, and, we are inclined to believe, of that one only—Post No. 1, Grand Army of the Republic, Philadelphia, and probably his membership there was only honorary. The society, however, applied for the privilege of closing the services at the funeral next Saturday with their own services, religious or military, or whatever they may term it. At first permission was given, but Rev. Dr. Newman, who has all the services in charge, objected very reasonably that the solemn and sacred rites of the Christian church would only befit such an occasion; besides to put the closing ceremony into the hands of strangers would be a slight to himself, so long the intimate friend and attendant of the dead. The secret society has, therefore, been notified that the permission first granted is revoked. The American people all have an interest in this occasion and will not regret the final decision.

"The truth is, Protestantism nowhere does produce a moral society."—Catholic Review, N. Y.

The above is its reflection of the revelations of the Pall Mall Gazette of the secret vices of English aristocracy; on which Cardinal Manning, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Mr. Samuel Morley, and the Mayor of London are sitting in judgment. American Protestant travellers in Spain and Italy are scarcely seated in their hotels before a gentlemanly priest visits them in their private rooms, to beg money for Romish charities. Seventy-three priests were counted by an American, moving in a body along the streets of Madrid, a short time since, to such peculiar church-work; and cities and towns in these countries swarm with these unmarried janizaries of the Pope. When water runs up hill, popery will perhaps promote good morals, and paptists cease to fill the penitentiaries, and run the liquor saloons of Protestant countries. Contracts in restraint of marriage are justly void in law, because of immoral tendency.

The Socialists of Chicago had a picnic and street parade on the last Sabbath in July. Brass bands are on ordinary occasions prohibited from playing in the business center of the city, but these people had four to make more heinous their outrage of the law protecting the day. Some two thousand persons were in the procession, made up of International Associations, the "groups" of the Lehr und Wehr Verein armed with revolvers, Freiheit societies, and labor unions of different trades. Most of the men wore broad-brimmed hats with red bands and a square piece of scarlet cloth in front. A group of women bore a bright red banner. Red cloth transparencies were numerous with such inscriptions, foolish yet significant, as these: "We mourn not so much General Grant as we do the little child which was starved to death yesterday;" "Down with the throne, altar and money-bags," "The fountain of right is might;" "Workingmen, arm!" "Our civilization: the bullet and policeman's club." "The government is for slaves, the free men govern themselves;" "The greatest crime of our time is poverty;" "Wage-system means slavery, co-operation means freedom;" "Government makes classes: no government means no classes, equality;" "Every government is a conspiracy of the rich against the poor;" "In the absence of the law all men are free." More cunningly planned was one of the allegorical representations, which as a socialistic burlesque on American liberty, had some merit of truth in it, though no thanks to the beer drinking crowd that displayed it. A long wagon was drawn by two mules, representing respectively the two houses of Congress, driven by a fellow dressed like a typical Uncle Sam. On the wagon was a whiskey barrel, and a dummy in police attire hugged the barrel with one arm and flourished a club in the other, while on his back were the words "Liberty enlightening the world." The barrel bore the placard "Five and ten cent drinks." Our whiskey-tax supported government is justly thus the sport of such an ignoble crowd. At the grounds beer-drinking, promenading and the rabid speeches of a few leaders made a day of pleasure for these misguided people. Could they bring their neighbors down to their level it would be hell upon earth.

GLORIFYING MASONRY.

BY REV. WM. JOHNSTON, D. D.

Such an attempt was made in the city of Clarinda, Page county, Iowa, on the 4th of July. That day was fixed for laying the corner-stone of the new Asylum for the Insane, and the corner-stone of the court house. The Grand Lodge of the State was invited to lay the corner-stone of the Asylum, and it was given out that representatives from the different townships would lay the corner-stone of the court house.

This is the cheap mode of advertising that Masonry very largely adopts, knowing that the feeble-minded are most easily reached by something which addresses itself to the outward senses. What better opportunity for advertising than this, when the corner-stones of two public buildings are to be laid, on the 4th of July, and when people may be expected to gather from far and near? But there are some "cranks" living in Page county who keep punching away at the "white apron fraternity," and will not permit such things to pass unchallenged. They anticipated that a march might be stolen by the Masons and that in the last hour the laying of the corner-stone of the court house might also be turned over to them. Indeed, one of the Clarinda papers intimated such a possibility. Whereupon these cranks took it upon themselves to circulate a protest among tax-payers against the laying of corner-stones of county or State buildings by Masons or any other fraternity. We had only a few days in which to circulate the protest, and the effort was confined to a few points in the southern part of the county; yet about three hundred signatures were secured and a committee appointed for the purpose carried the protest up to the proper authorities. It did not prevent the Masons laying the corner-stone of the Asylum, but we feel amply repaid for our effort in the sequel that follows.

It has come to our ears that the corner-stone for the court house came to the depot with the symbols of Masonry inscribed, and lettering, which indicated the stone to be laid by the fraternity. But the Masonic chiefs smelling the battle, quietly dispatched a marble cutter to the depot to erase the Masonic symbols and inscriptions. It was aimed to keep it a Masonic secret, but for once at least a Masonic secret leaked out. It has been told me by two prominent citizens of Clarinda, who have not been mixed up in any of the anti-secret movements, and I have no doubt of its truthfulness. We think our protest did tell in defeating a well-laid scheme. It was certainly not by accident that stone came with those inscriptions; and perhaps they would not have been erased, if a high Mason had not been an aspirant for office. The county papers have been marvelously silent on the protest, and we apprehend for good reasons.

The "beautiful and impressive ceremonies" connected with the laying of the corner-stone of the Asylum have been given in full, and duly extolled by the press. To the uninitiated who are not in sympathy with them, the account of the ceremony seemed as insane as anything that will be witnessed when that building is filled with the feeble-minded. It seems strange indeed that men should go through such senseless mummeries, unless reason has been dethroned and lost amid the stormy desert of the brain.

We expect President C. A. Blanchard this evening who during the coming week will follow up the work of our protest, in the southern part of the county.

ARE MASONIC OATHS BINDING?

BY ELDER WINBURN A. SHAW.

We answer, No! There are thousands of good men entangled with that "yoke of bondage" who would give all their earthly possessions to be able to say the same. They have become disgusted with the twaddle of lodge mummery and sick at heart of the constant proofs which come to them, that Christian men are led and controlled more by their lodge oaths than by the bands of the Gospel of Christ, and they would leave this unhappy and unwholesome climate of deceit and hypocrisy, BUT, they have taken upon themselves these obligations and see no way whereby they may honorably, and in justice to themselves and to the lodge, break loose and avow their independence.

To such, we feel constrained to speak a few words which may have the tendency to "loose him and let him go." In a commercial sense the Masonic lodge sells its secrets to the candidate for a certain amount, $20, $30, $40, or such a matter for the three degrees of Blue Lodge Masonry (making sure to have the money in advance), and setting forth in fine colors the value of these wonderful secrets, and the honor to be attained by the possession of them. Every master of a Masonic lodge knows full well that these so-called secrets are no secrets, and that the candidate could obtain any and every one of them at an ordinary book-store for the sum of twenty-five cents. If that same man should sell that candidate for Masonic honors a horse for $30, and should recommend the horse as highly as he has the Masonic secrets, and that animal should prove worth but twenty-five cents, there would be no hesitancy on the part of the befooled one to denounce that worthy master as a liar and scoundrel, worthy of prosecution as an obtainer of money under false pretensions. Suppose that the green one had promised not to say anything about the trade, do you suppose that he would be likely to keep his mouth shut?

If these exposures of Freemasonry which are so freely sold and given away are true (and every man who has taken the oaths knows whether they are or no), then Masonry asserts as a condition of the contract which it makes with the candidate that there is nothing in the oath which he is called upon to take to interfere with his duties to God, country, family or himself.

If it can be shown that this is wholly and absolutely a Masonic lie, then of course the candidate is absolved from the force of the oath, for if the conditions of the oath have been misstated by the one party, then it follows that the other is not held thereby.

Does the Masonic oath interfere with the duties which a man owes to God? No man can come to the Father except through Christ, and our petitions to the Father can be answered only as they are brought in the name of the Son, and there is none other name given under heaven whereby we may be saved. How, then, can a Christian man bow down at the Masonic altar where he is not allowed to call upon God through the mediation of our blessed Lord Jesus Christ? Who shall dare assert that such an act does not interfere with the Christian's duty to his God?

The duty which the country demands of a juror is to bring in his verdict according to the law and the evidence: the law he receives from the court and the evidence from the witnesses, and if he fails to find in accord with these two or contrary thereto, he is guilty of perjury.

Now suppose that a Christian Mason was on a jury before whom a man was being tried for arson, horse stealing, adultery, incest, or any other crime save murder or treason, and the prisoner should give the grand hailing sign of distress so that the Christian juror should see it, which one of the oaths would be binding on him, the civil or the Masonic? If the Masonic oath thus interferes with the due course of justice, how can it truthfully be said that it does not conflict with the duties which we owe to our beloved country?

It is written "honor thy father and thy mother;" and, "for this cause shall a man leave father and mother and cleave unto his wife, and they twain shall be one flesh."

Now, then, if we are to honor father and mother that we may obtain worldly prosperity, and the claims of the family are so much greater and higher and stronger that a man will leave those who nourished him and brought him to man's estate, for the claims and love and sympathy of the wife; how much more ought we to leave this lodge which calls us to disobey the laws of both God and man?

In thus putting one's self outside of the pale of true Christian character, is not the adhering Mason doing dishonor both to his family and himself?

There may be those who have arrived at the conclusion that the lodge oath is not binding, inasmuch as they no longer adhere to the lodge, do not visit it, do not pay dues nor answer any grip or sign when given, but who would not be guilty of exposing any of those things which had been given them as secrets and for various reasons. They do not perceive that their position in the matter affects any one save themselves.

If I had been skating on a dark night and had fallen into an air-hole in the ice, and after hard work had clambered out and saved myself, and knew that there was a procession of young men coming along, many of whom would fall into the same danger if I did not warn them, what would you think of me standing idly by if this long line of youthful manhood should plunge into this chasm without a warning voice from me? I must be a veritable dolt to permit such a thing! And ought not the clarion cry of danger to ring out for the benefit of those who are unconsciously binding themselves with bands of iron?

And there are those who refuse to make known the things which they have learned in regard to the lodge because of the social ostracism which is almost sure to result therefrom. It is written of certain ones that "they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God." The flesh shrinks from the crucifixion; there is a law in our members warring against the law of our mind and bringing us into captivity. Who shall deliver us from the body of this death? I thank God that deliverance can and does come through Jesus Christ our Lord.

The apostle counted all things but dross that he might win Christ and be found in him; and shall we not emulate his example that at the last, like him, we may be able to say, "I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." Surely to be right is to be greater than to be a king. Shall we refuse reputation, wealth, friends, earthly ambition, or any other thing to him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvelous light? If we must be silent because we have sworn to be so, then Herod the king was right when he caused John the Baptist to be beheaded, and those forty who had sworn to neither eat nor drink till they had killed Paul should have persevered in that determination until they had starved themselves to death.

No, my brother, it is simply monstrous to say that an oath wrongfully taken is binding on the conscience of any honest man.

WEEK-DAY SERMON.

BY E. E. FLAGG.

"Whenever I was puzzled or perplexed in my Christian course I always went to Mr. F. about it, and no matter how hard a knot I got into he always contrived to untie it. Somehow he would seem to see right in to the difficulty and set everything straight with a word."

"And did Mr. F. ever get into knots himself?" I inquired. At which Mrs. F. laughed softly as she replied,

"Ever so many times."

"He was better off than some of us; he could unravel his puzzles himself," I remarked, thinking it must be natural and probable that such an adept in smoothing out other people's spiritual tangles, would have no difficulty with his own. But Mrs. F.'s answer soon made me aware that this was a short-sighted conclusion.

"Oh, no. He always had to come to me. You don't expect the enemy of souls ties his knots in such a blundering fashion that we can free ourselves. If we could it would look a little as if our perplexities were self-made, and the knots of our own tying."

It is certainly a curious fact that the wisest and best of us generally fail when we try alone to unravel our spiritual perplexities. Read the lives of the old reformers—especially Luther—and see how often they got into tangles, and how there was always some wise, loving, patient soul ready to untangle them;—neither gifted, nor great, nor learned perhaps, but they did the work just as well and perhaps a little better for that reason. They had the same advantage over the royal souls they helped that the free mouse in the fable had over the fettered lion.

"We all get into knots sometimes," continued Mrs. F., "especially young converts—and the brightest and most promising are the ones that get into the hardest; and then too often they are let alone by the pastor and deacons and experienced Christians at precisely the point when they need help most. It is a great and most disastrous mistake to crowd the church with young people supposed to be converted, and then when the revival season is over, be contented with their names on the roll, and take no pains to see whether they grow—whether they are even alive. What should we think of a nurseryman who stocked his place with young trees, and then left them without a thought or care, for the drouth to wither, the canker worm to consume, the beast of the field to devour! This is one reason why the church has so little vitality. The old-fashioned visiting from house to house has gone by. The pastor has to stay in his study and write an elaborate sermon, polished up to the needs of the times; he has to keep abreast of the age, read the magazines and the reviews, and know what the last infidel scientist says, and so he gets no time for making personal acquaintances with his flock. I wonder what St. Paul would say to our modern pastors. Yes, and our deacons, too. They ought to be under-shepherds looking out for the lambs and the stray sheep. If I was a minister," continued Mrs. F., waxing warm, "I think I should visit my deacons first."

Over my mind comes a remembrance of two of that much-abused class—whose benignant faces and Christ-like lives are visible benedictions; though of one I should have used the past tense. He serves in that upper temple where they go no more out forever. But I know of others absorbed in their farms and merchandise, who never seek out the lame and the halting with words of kindly cheer, who let open and secret sin run riot, and lift no voice to reprove; who "serve tables" and do no more. Slumbering churches, slumbering officers, slumbering pastors! Which is the deepest stain on Zion's white garments, the blood of the unconverted heathen or the blood of her own children whom she allows to fall into the snare of the destroyer, having first heedlessly let down the bars for the free entrance into the fold?

The Mormon population reaches only 125,000. Over this number, to discipline and direct them "in all things both temporal and spiritual," are set more than twenty-two thousand church officials (22,000); such as a president and 2 counselors; 12 apostles and diverse counselors; 60 patriarchs, whose business it is to bless in writing, at $2 a head; 25 presidents of "Stakes of Zion;" 275 bishops; 3,045 high priests; 11,545 elders, of whom every one can preach, baptize, lay on hands for the reception of the Holy Ghost, and anoint for the healing of the sick, 1,286 priests; 1,575 teachers, and 4,100 deacons. Here is the strength of Mormonism, in the number of office-holders for which it provides in the rigid system of subordination from top to bottom.—Ex.

One evening during the late encampment of the Grand Army at Portland, Me., at the peculiar tap of the drum, the cry, "Fall in! fall in!" was heard, and the company was marched up the hill to the pump, where all the men were ordered to drink, in derision of the Maine law. One man refused, and was court-martialed, a sham penalty inflicted, but in a minute or two he was pardoned. But that company of the Grand Army should have applauded the Maine law, instead of deriding it. We justly honor the old veterans who saved our country in the time of its dire peril. We do not deride them. But their foe was not so deadly as this which the temperance people combat so grandly and successfully in Maine. Slavery and the War of the Rebellion did not alienate property and destroy lives any year as does intemperance every year all over this fair land. Deride the Maine law! What a mistake! What a shame to the Grand Army!—The Pacific.

There certainly can be nothing gained to Christianity for the church to acknowledge its inherent weakness or inability to accomplish all the good, through its organization, morally and socially, that can be accomplished by the lodge.

It seems to us that church organs and ministers could engage in better business than to labor for the upbuilding of the lodge; by laboring rather to increase the usefulness of the church. In it there is salvation through Christ and without him there is no way under heaven by which men can be saved. It was he who established the church. Did he also establish the lodge? Does the lodge advocate any truth that Christ does not advocate? any duty that Christ does not enjoin?

Does not a church which advocates the lodge weaken the cause of Christianity? If so, then every church that advocates the lodge is an element of weakness to Christianity. It helps to drag the church down to that low standard of inferiority to the lodge claimed for it by the latter's adherents.—Brethren Evangelist.

—The Detroit Freemason speaks slightingly of chapters of the Eastern Star and says they will soon die out.

THE SERMON.

THE BACCALAUREATE AT WHEATON COLLEGE, JUNE 14, 1885.

[Published by request.]

Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased. —Dan. 12: 4.

This is a prophetic picture of the increase of travel, and the spread of knowledge; not at the end of time, but in "the time of the end."

The prophet Daniel had seen in vision, as in a moving panorama, the march of kingdoms and dynasties, down to the coming of Christ in Judea; and, thence, onward to the final judgment: and, as prophecy cannot be understood till the events which fulfil it approach, he is directed to "shut up the words, and seal the book,"[1] until ages should roll by and events should at once explain his prophecy and confirm it. Accordingly this wonderful book has been sealed for twenty centuries; until, now, "the signs of the times," modern ideas, travel, science, invention, and discovery are slowly unsealing it.

"The time of the end," means the time when the world's end draws nigh. "But of that day and hour," saith our Lord, "knoweth no man, no, not the angels in heaven, but my Father only." Matt. 24: 36. We, therefore, do not propose to speculate on the end of time, at the consumption by fire, and reconstruction of the worlds; nor to discuss the millennium; but to limit ourselves, by the teaching of the text, to that increase of travel and the spread of knowledge which precede and foretoken the approach of these stupendous events.

Time from the beginning has been divided into weeks of seven days. The Hebrews, too, by God's direction, divided their years into heptades (sevens); the seventh year being a continuous Sabbath. Hence, probably, arose the opinion, so sweetly versified by Cowper, that the seventh thousand years from the creation is to be the millennium.

> "The time of rest, the promised Sabbath, comes.
> Six thousand years of sorrow have well-nigh
> Fulfilled their tardy and disastrous course
> Over a sinful world: and what remains
> Of this tempestuous scene of human things
> Is merely as the working of the sea
> Before a calm which rocks itself to rest."

Our seventh thousand years, as we reckon time by our Bible chronology, begins one hundred and fifteen years from now: and, as immigration and increase of population now run, we shall by that time need some mighty millennial change to save us from the vices and corruptions of dense populations. Our mountain States are rapidly filling up; and there are no more Californias and Alaskas to receive surplus population, and we must choose between millennium and extinction by the corruptions and crimes which have obliterated the dead nations of the East.

Let us hope that Cowper's poetry may prove prophecy as well. Or, rather, let us believe the Scriptures, and look for "The acceptable year of the Lord," though it may be ushered in by "The day of vengeance of our God." (Isa. 61: 2.)

The prophet Daniel was a statesman and politician, a prime-minister and a prince, and when such a man prophecies, he sees in the vista of the future the revolutions of empires and upheavals of kingdoms and States, all terminating in the reign of Christ, "Whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away; and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed" (Dan. 7: 14.) The prophet longs to know the manner of this kingdom and the time. He prays, "O my Lord, what shall be the end of these things?" But he is only permitted to know the tokens which precede and presage it; and, among these, his heavenly teacher tells him, that "many shall run to and fro and that knowledge shall be increased."

It seems fitting in this literary, collegiate anniversary that we single out these two fore-tokens of the millennium from the stupendous mass given by this prophet, and consider the INCREASE OF TRAVEL and THE SPREAD OF KNOWLEDGE.

Distance and time have collapsed. There are today young girls keeping sheep and goats in the mountains of Norway and Sweden who are contemplating an early removal to the western United States. And this journey to the opposite side of the globe seems less to them than a visit to the next State would have seemed to our fathers a hundred years ago. The remotest islands are now nearer London or New York than Egypt was to Rome in the days of Scripture history; or than Babylon, when Daniel preached to captive Jews, was to their home by the Mediteranean Sea. And receiving messages by electricity from the moon would not astonish, now, the readers of the morning paper, more than speaking by telephone would have astonished the first inhabitants of Boston or New York. Diminished postage increases correspondence; and diminished fares are continually increasing travel. The citizens of Chicago read Congressional news as soon, or sooner than the citizens of Washington, because they rise earlier, and the news is telegraphed to them in the night: and a ticket around the globe now excites no more wonder than a ticket to the next town. The prophet Daniel if here now, would not need to ask the import of his predictions: for, surely, "many are running to and fro and knowledge is increased."

But we shall limit our present remarks on the increase of knowledge to COMMON SCHOOLS, COLLEGES, and THE KNOWLEDGE OF SALVATION BY CHRIST; which last takes us where we shall "Know as we are known;" so that we shall need no schools or teaching.

I. Jesus had compassion on the ignorant multitude, because they were without teachers. "They were as sheep without a shepherd." The spirit of popular education is thus the Spirit of Christ; and schools and funds and laws for its promotion foretoken his coming reign. While the soil of Europe was cultivated by slaves, common schools were as impossible as lately in our own slave States. Not only the government but the religion of Europe obstructed the education of the masses. Two hundred years ago (A. D. 1666) Lasalle, Marquette, Hennepin, Joliet, and their Jesuit brothers were scouring the forests where Pittsburg, Chicago, and St. Louis now stand; setting up wooden crosses; saying Latin masses to Indians; teaching them hatred of heretics, and seeking to enslave our coming millions to the dictation of a foreign priest. Indeed, the sun-burst of popular education is less than a century old, scarcely more than half a century. I remember the first common school periodical ever issued, The Annals of Education of Boston. Soon afterward began the era of common school conventions, institutes, drill-schools, etc.; and Pennsylvania received her common school system through Thaddeus Stevens only fifty years ago.

But as early as 1785, amid the poverty which followed our Revolution, Congress gave the sixteenth, and in 1848, the thirty-sixth section of our vast unoccupied domain to our common schools, amounting to the enormous aggregate of 95,737,714 acres: and the grants in money, Federal and State, during the same period amounted to fifty millions more. This American example reacted across the Atlantic. In 1818 Lord (then Mr.) Brougham moved the appointment of a committee whose report showed in England three hundred and seventy-five million dollars invested in charities intended for educating the poor; and soon after Lord Althrope secured a grant of $100,000 to England and Wales, and $50,000 to Scotland, for the erection of school-houses. France sent Victor Cousin, and the State of Ohio sent Dr. C. E. Stowe to investigate and report on the schools of Germany for the education of the masses. Russia, and even the lethargic nations beyond the Ural mountains to the China Sea have felt kindlings of the same flame; and, meantime, our Peabodys, Stones, Lemoynes, and Christian denominations have been pouring out their thousands on thousands, and Congress is being moved to secure their endeavors to extinguish illiteracy and enlighten the masses. So that all statistics can do is to show how impossible it is for any finite mind to comprehend the whole that is being done to fulfil this prophecy of Daniel by removing the ignorance and enlightening the masses of mankind.

But this universal upheaval of popular education can no more be confined in school-houses than the ocean tides can be drawn up in pumps. Lecture courses for the multitudes, institutes for teachers, expositions, national and local, for industry and the arts, agricultural associations, fruit-growers conventions, and music from the cradle hymn to the conservatory,—these all, with the myriad methods and movements for reform, are but so many finger posts, standing outside the school-houses, and pointing to the fulfillment of prophecy in the approaching reign of Christ.

Everybody exalts the wonders of electricity and steam. But what were these in a nation of illiterate boors, who could neither write a telegram nor read a ticket for the cars? There is not—cannot be any thing in merely human institutions, to surpass in importance the nation's common schools. They are the starting points for the young, outside of the family, in the journey of education and improvement. There the children, in happy groups, acquire knowledge before knowing its use. There shyness begins to be exchanged for ease of manners, and teachers learn self-respect from the respect of their pupils. There, commerce of ideas make social converse possible. The very rows in which the children sit, the stimulus of the class, the awe inspired by routine, and the natural dread of awkwardness and being laughed at for mistakes,—these and a thousand other forces combine to put children on the road of escape from that most horrible condition of grown-up ignorance, the passions of brutes in the bodies of men. And then the learning itself; the mysteries of speech, of truth, of order, regularity and law, at once feed and fill faculties capable of eternal growth and expansion, and aid them in setting out: and as there is a thrill of excitement in starting on a long journey which is never re-experienced on the road, so there is a class of emotions in the common school never experienced but once.

II. Colleges and universities were the repositories of knowledge before common schools were born, and, since they were born, are as necessary to their welfare, as arsenals to armies, or as mothers to the welfare of their children. Children can see and admire the beauty of the heavens, but astronomers measure the orbits of its stars; and if colleges were taken away, the education which would remain would compare with that we now have, as looking through smoked glass at the moon's shadow on the sun, compares with the calculation of an eclipse, or regulating the calendar of the year. Moses and Paul were learned. The one wrote the basis of the Old Testament; the other twenty-one Epistles of the New: and as these were necessary to make a perfect Bible, so collegiate combines with popular education producing that increase of knowledge which heralds the coming of Christ. And as the educated Moses and Paul are the thoughts-men of the Bible, so colleges, in educated men, have furnished the thoughts-men of the world! And by their sweeps of investigation have furnished ladders by which distinguished men have climbed to education outside of college walls.

III. But there is a knowledge which connects the finite with the infinite. And, "This is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent." (John 17: 3). And "The knowledge of the Lord" which is to "fill the whole earth as the waters cover the sea," (Isa. 11: 9.) is this divine knowledge, that Christ saves men who come to God by him. (Heb. 7: 25). It is in the atonement, in short, or "salvation by faith," that we have access to God through Christ; this is what bridges immensity, and all other knowledges are subordinate to this.

What God will do with those who never hear the name of Christ concerns his own administration. We have heard of him, and are bound to spread this knowledge in order to rescue mankind from the crimes, vices and sins in which heathen are sunk.

But as no good thing on earth is without its antagonism, so the adversary of God and man obstructs, by his "devices," that knowledge whose increase heralds Christ's coming; and especially the increase of that knowledge in which human salvation consists. Let us note some of these "devices." And, first, it should be noticed that all his methods spring from the "enmity" or rivalship which God has put between the seed of the serpent and "the seed of the woman" who is Christ. (Gen. 3: 15). Hence all his "devices" consist in rivalship and substitution. Thus:

1. Sixteen years ago, 1869, the city of Cincinnati gained her bad pre-eminence by excluding the Bible from her schools. It was the work of a heterogeneous combination of infidels, Papists and Jews. But surely the devil must have been their prompter. For a school without any standard of law or morals is a vicious absurdity, like a store of goods or commerce with no legal standard of money, measure or weight; an absurdity so glaring that in other cities Romish priests have voted to retain the Bible in their schools, so that children may have some rule to think by. This Satanic attempt to take the Word of God from the thought-fountains of the United States may fail for want of a subsitute like the Koran or the Book of Mormon. Let us hope it will.

2. But the attempt of Satan on the colleges promises him more success. The Savior being dethroned in the first American college at Cambridge, Amherst was erected by godly people to repair the loss: and now, while Amherst is yet in its youth, it has seven buildings for secret societies erected around its campus. Each of these secret orders has its initiation, ritual, oath and religious rites; and, as their windowless walls testify, they are "unfruitful works of darkness," and children of the organized deism of the lodge by which, in the words of the report of Dr. Edward Beecher, "Christ is detroned and Satan is exalted." These dark "fraternities," now curse almost every college in the United States. At Cornell, Mortimer D. Leggett was killed in his initiation. At Yale the bones of students have been broken while undergoing the same. But a few lives lost and bones broken in Satan's fools-play, are not the evil complained of. It is, that the thought-fountains of this mighty Republic are poisoned by secret oaths and altars and mock-religious rites, in which Satan is in earnest, though their dupes consider them a joke. Their light-exeluding walls around Yale College have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars. Senator Evarts in a speeeh at Yale Commencement, protested against them as destroyers of the time-honored "Linonia" and "Brothers;" but the clergy of New England, many of whom have been sworn to secrecy in their dens, are mute concerning them; and statesmen and divines and physicians are yearly being graduated from the once-sacred halls of Yale, with the devil's secret brand on their foreheads, to pervert the State, the family, and the churches of Christ.

The root of this Upas, its "seminal principle of mischief," is man-invented religious rites. These, whether practieed in moekery, in earnest, or in sport, sear the conscience and steel the heart. They are always and everywhere in Scripture called "vanities," "inventions," and "abominations;" and branded with the most terrific divine denunciations.

When Charles II. was dying, who had an hundred of their oaths in his conscience, his confessor Huddleston held up a silver eross before his glazing eyes, and told him he was sure of heaven if he died looking on that eross. The thrice-perjured and debauched monarch with his last breath provided for his concubine, Nell Guynn, and died! That silver cross was a substitute for the atonement of Christ. So is every solemn religious contrivance ever invented by men. The great Frenchman, Victor Hugo, was dying a few weeks since, and the Arch-bishop of Paris offered him extreme unction and absolution. The nephew of the dying statesman brought him this word: "Victor Hugo has the prospect of death, but has no occasion for a priest." Every religious invention ever contrived from the little funny hocus-pocus of a seeret order, to the sacrifice of screaming infants to Moloch, or the priestly sorceries of the mass, is both insult and imposture; an insult to God and an imposition upon men.

But, blessed be God, "the knowledge of the Lord," the knowledge that Jesus Christ is the Son of God and the Saviour of men,—this glorious knowledge is increased, aye, and will increase, till it "fill the earth as the waters fill the seas." He is "the seed of the woman" and shall bruise the serpent's head. Two-thirds of the entire globe are ruled by those who acknowledge him. And though Satan has filled his churches with false doetrines, false governments and false rites, these all will perish before his refining fire. He will certainly eome, as the angels promised; and the increase of travel and increase of knowledge around our little globe with the thousand other tokens are heralding his approach. Yes, He is and was the truth. He said he would eome and he will.

And now that he is eoming let us trim our lamps. Every one of us can do something to expedite his coming by preparing the way of the Lord, and "making his paths straight."

Surely, surely, the coming of the Lord draweth nigh.

"Let every heart prepare him room
And every voice a song."

Little children once greeted him with hosannas. Let them do so now. Let these scholars bring their laurel crowns and lay them at his feet: and let parents and loving friends joy that in these, their loved ones, they have proofs that "knowledge is increased;" and, above all, that knowledge whose increase proves that "the coming of the Lord draweth nigh." Amen.

If all men were to join one secret society, which according to the regulations on this subject is impossible—seventy-five hundredths of the human family being excluded—then there would be no secrets, and all the inhabitants of the earth would stand upon the high plane where God first placed them, where they might still be standing had not the unhallowed ambition of wicked men and secret devils divided them up into secret clans. We have no argument against a universal brotherhood of men, but Freemasonry and kindred secret clannish abominations by causing endless divisions, make such a desirable state or condition utterly impracticable. The bare thought of such a thing as a universal brotherhood, while society is so completely ratholed through and through with secret clans, is a palpable absurdity, and, like everything else in Masonry, a transparent fraud.—Birmingham Free Press.

Men who are under secret, special obligations to a portion of the community, are unfit to govern the whole.—Pres. C. A. Blanchard, in the Pittsburg Prohibition Convention.

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN·WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER XXVII. (concluded.)

It was the name of Dacey—James Dacey; a man born of a good family, but with a deeided bent for the crooked and devious ways of the transgressor, and with a faculty for keeping elear of the law that much mystified many of his vietims. He had been married twice. The first time he had obtained an unjust divoree through the help of an unprincipled attorney who was like himself a high Mason. The second time he had beguiled a simple-hearted, pretty maiden into marrying him; then, after living with her for a while, denied the legality of the marriage, and left her, broken-hearted, in an equivocal position among strangers to support her two children as best she could. Mr. Dacey's regular profession it would have been hard to define. He never stayed very long in one place, and with every change of residence he turned his hand to something new in the line of rascality. At the time Jesse Dukes so unfortunately made his acquaintance he called himself a broker in real estate, though his methods of conducting business were somewhat peculiar. He was really the head of a bogus land company which operated under fictitious names, issuing worthless title deeds to confiding settlers in distant territories, but he sometimes did a stroke of sharp business nearer home, as in the case of Jesse Dukes. The simple mountaineer, utterly unused to trickery and fraud, bravely defended his title to his newly purchased homestead, and when he realized that the suit had actually gone against him he could scarcely be restrained from springing on his adversary in open court. He swore vengeanee as it was, and Dacey, whose forte was rather the smooth and graeeful villain than the bully, thought it prudent to decamp, having about eome to the end of his little game, rather than risk a charge of buckshot in his handsome person. He then became partner in a liquor saloon for a while. He operated a faro bank for a season. He dabbled in various lottery schemes, and indeed it would be difficult to name anything in the line of swindling and roguery to which he had not at one time or another given his attention. He was now agent for some worthless agrieultural patents, and in eonsequenee a very active grangeman. When the grange should discover, as it must before long, that it had been outrageously duped, he could rely on the close eonnection of that body with the Masonic lodge to clear him from the eonsequences.

Jesse Dukes sat for a long while with his eyes riveted on the paper. But this might be another James Dacey. Anyway he would find out, and if it should prove the one he sought, why—Mr. Dukes had no very clear idea of the form his vengeance was going to take, but he meant before he was through with Mr. Dacey to make him repent his action in that particular lawsuit which had broken up his happy home and reduced him to poverty.

At last with a fierce, determined look he rose to his feet, and not even stopping to put away his traps strewed over the floor, he left the cabin standing empty and desolate, and started forth on his quest for vengeance.

Before we proceed to tell how the quest came out, we have a word to say regarding the startling increase in our land of that form of lawless violence known as lynch law. In rude, semi-civilized communities it may be a deplorable necessity to dispense summary justice in this way, but when we find the papers filled with accounts of horrible lynching affairs, not perpetrated where the reign of law and order has not yet begun, but under the very shadow of our court houses, it is evident that there is something wrong in the working of our criminal laws. When a people know that swift and equal puuishment will be meted out to all wrong doers they are not generally disposed to take the execution thereof on themselves. But when the law has respect of persons, when it discriminates between the man who has robbed the State of a fortune and the poor boy who steals five dollars, because the one is a Mason and the other is not, is there room for wonder that they weary sometimes of the travestics of justice in our court rooms and become their own judges and executioners?

CHAPTER XXVIII.

"VENGEANCE IS MINE."

"I call this curious weather, Mr. Deming. Makes me feel kinder as though something was going to happen."

"Can't expect comfortable weather in dog days, Uncle Zeb," responded Mr. Deming, as he took a look around him at the horizon, which was curtained by a thin veil of elouds through which the sun shone with a strange, brassy radiance, while the very leaves on the trees seemed to fairly pant in the lifeless air.

"That's a fact," returned Uncle Zeb, as he seated himself in an easy attitude for conversation. "But human nater is dreadful onreasonable. When it's cold we want it hot, and when it's hot we want it cold. Makes me think a little of the weather we had that year Harrison was elected. I remember all about them 'Tippecanoe and Tyler too' times. Maybe you don't quite so well. You was a trifle younger."

"Parties have changed a good deal since then," sententiously remarked Mr. Deming, and Uncle Zeb went on.

"Well, politics is a good deal like a chessboard. It's a move here and a move there, and to them that don't understand the ins and outs, why, it's all gammon. That's the way I look at all this nominating, and canvassing, and stump-speaking. But the Prohibitionists now—they seem to be going on a different tack. I see there was a W. C. T. U. woman advertised to speak not a great ways from here, and I thought I'd chirk up and go and hear her. And if she wan't a master head for facts and figgers! Some of the things she told fairly made me cry like a baby. I've been all kinder stirred up ever senee a thinkin' on 'em over. It didn't sound a bit as though she was making a speech; she seemed to talk right from her heart as the Lord give her the words. I tell you, Mr. Deming, I've about made up my mind if I live till next fall to vote the Prohibition ticket and let both the old parties go—to grass."

Now Mr. Deming, it must be said, was a Republican, who had always prided himself on being sound in regard to all the great moral questions of the day, but he had never yet reached the point of leaving his party; and now to hear such an energetic expression from Uncle Zeb, a Demoerat of that easy-going type who take up naturally with the party whose platform presents the fewest troublesome issues, touched his conscience as with a vague reminder of the words of inspiration, "The first shall be last and the last first."

"Well, I am waiting to see who the Democrats will put up," he answered eautiously. "A good deal depends on that."

"I understand"—and Uncle Zeb chuekled, for he could not help uttering a joke even when it bore rather hard on himself—"you know we Democrats are the publieans and sinners. We ean turn about and enter the kingdom while you Republiean Pharisees are balancing on the fence. There's a kind of Scriptural illustration for ye, as you may say."

It was one, however, which Mr. Deming did not enjoy, for he felt that in this matter as in that of the grange, Uncle Zeb had the advantage. The latter had prudently abstained from making his usual facetious allusions to "the machine," since the unfortunate Masonic experiment recorded in a prior chapter, and Mr. Deming was so relieved by the truce that he could have thanked the O'Sullivan goat for its unwitting share in bringing it about, many times as he had voted the animal a nuisance and resolved to complain to the owner for not keeping it more strictly confined.

It is one of the laws of the grange that no political questions shall be discussed in its meetings, yet "the machine" is one emiuently adapted to gain office for the leaders; for who would suspect a society of simple farmers of engaging in political schemes and plottings? least of all those same innocent-minded farmers themselves? Fairfield Grange, though ostensibly devoted to advancing the peaceful art of agriculture, was really a hot-bed of partisanship, and Mr. Israel Deming had felt very perceptibly the pulling of certain wires; but whose hands manipulated them or the secret of their workings were hidden mysteries. Of the men for whom there was this invisible but strong pressure brought upon him to vote at the coming election, he knew literally nothing except that they were graugemen, who, he was assured, would use their official position to advance the farming interests. He was never told, however, that every one of these same seekers for political power were high degree Masons, who were using the simple grangers as the proverbial monkey used the too confiding grimalkin.

Dora was sitting in the open window, dressed in her light afternoon muslin—a most agreeable and pleasing object. She heard the conversation, but not to take any particular interest therein. Her father and Uncle Zeb were always talking politics nowadays, and lugging in that wearisome subject of prohibition. Of course she wanted rum-selling done away with, but what was the use of making such a fuss about it? And as to these W. C. T. U. women she did not understand them in the least. She was sure she could never spend her life as they did, thinking and speaking and writing of nothing but temperance all the time. And then to go round gathering up all these terrible facts which made her feel sick even to read or hear about! It was perfectly incomprehensible. From this train of thought Dora's musings branched off in another direction. She began to think how hot it was, and recall to her mind some of the latest compliments Mr. Dacey had paid her, and wonder whether he really meant them. To the language of polite gallantry Dora was a stranger, and she never thought that a single glance of honest admiration from one of her young farmer suitors, even when it remained unsaid or was expressed in the most awkward and bungling fashion, had in it a thousand times more of real knightly chivalry.

Mr. Dacey on his part took every opportunity to foster her foolish fancy, for he was by no means oblivious of the fact that Mr. Deming was the richest farmer in Fairfield, and Dora an only child. But he had no idea of appearing as an open and honest wooer where he was sure of meeting opposition—especially from Mrs. Deming. There had existed a settled antagonism between them from the first. She was suspicious that all was not right in regard to the grange business, and feared that he was leading her easy-minded husband into trouble with those agricultural patents. The very suspicion that he had designs on Dora would have transformed her negative dislike to him into positive fury. But he was sure he could in time prevail on the latter to consent to a secret or runaway marriage, and in fact he had already laid his plans to this end by paying her many clandestine attentions which, if she had not been thoroughly bewitched by his flatteries, would have put her on her guard. For her's was a frank and open nature. The secrecy of the grange in itself had no charms for her. We do not bait a trap with poison, but with a harmless bit of cheese. Dora's girlish love of pleasure and admiration provided all the attraction needed.

It grew more strangely still and dark and oppressive. What little oxygen there was in the air seemed to die out of it. Even her father and Uncle Zeb grew silent as if it was too hot to talk. Mrs. Deming, however, had not succumbed to the weather. She did not believe in succumbing to anything, and now she said decidedly to Dora:

"Come, child, don't be so idle. If you are at work you won't mind the heat half so much."

Dora made a pretense of going on with her sewing, but the gate clicked just then and set her foolish little heart to beating with the thought that it might be Mr. Dacey, who had mentioned to her the day before, in one of those clandestine walks which he always contrived to plan in such a way that Dora never really suspected that he meant they should be clandestine, his intention of visiting her father the next day on business. It did not prove to be him, however, but the strangest, roughest looking figure Dora had ever seen. He must be a tramp of the most desperate description, she thought. How very fortunate that her father was at home! Of Uncle Zeb's valor in case of any sudden call upon it she had a pardonably low opinion.

We, however, have no trouble in recognizing our old friend, Jesse Dukes. Weariness and hunger and thirst he had hardly felt in the fierce heat of revengeful desire that consumed his soul. He asked for a drink and sat down on the doorstep, unloosing his knapsack as he did so and setting his rifle carefully up against the outside wall.

Dora brought him water in a tin dipper. Jesse Dukes looked up at her with something of the pleasure that one looks at a bright-hued flower or bird.

"Thank ye, daughter," he said, as he gave the dipper back.

But the hard, fierce, vindictive face only softened for an instant.

"I've got an account to settle with a man," he answered reticently, to Uncle Zeb's ready questionings, "and I've tramped a smart forty miles on purpose to settle it. So I'm feelin' a bit beat out."

There came a low rumble of distant thunder.

"I reckon there's goin' to be a shower," said Uncle Zeb in his slow way.

The gate clicked again. Jesse Dukes started up. He felt as by intuition the approach of his victim, yet Dacey was within a yard of him and his foot almost on the door-stone before he recognized the grim face of the trapper. Then he stopped, trembling. He had reason to tremble, remembering the look of wild-beast fury from which he had cowered in such miserable terror, when, helpless in the net of Masonic injustice, Jesse Dukes had turned upon him in the court-room ten years before. Now to be so suddenly confronted with it was almost like an apparition from the dead.

He attempted at first to ignore his enemy; then with a poor feigning of sudden recollection he held out his hand affably and tried to assume an air of old acquaintanceship.

Jesse Dukes took no notice of the motion but stood directly in his path, a grim and frowning barrier to his further progress.

"You ain't fit to step your foot over a decent man's threshold," he said in a low, fierce voice; "and I'll stop your doing it if I kin. Didn't you cheat me out of every cent I had in the world, all because you was a Mason and could count on a Masonic judge and jury to help? And when my wife lay a dyin', and I had only a cabin to shelter her, and no medicine, nor food of the right kind for her, she'd want me to read to her out of the Bible, but when I did my eyes would always be a lightin' on sich ar texts as these: 'He turneth the way of the wicked upside down.' 'On the wicked he shall reign snares. Fire and brimstone and an horrible tempest shall be the portion of their cup.' When the Lord comes to reckon with ye, ye miserable varmint, passing yourself off for an unmarried man when you've got a wife and two children—off, nobody knows where—ye'll find there's a court up above where they don't make much account of Masonic signs and grips."

Dora gave a low, quick cry, that nobody heard in the excitement of the moment. It was as if wrapped in a somnambulist's dream she had been standing on the sheer edge of a dreadful precipice, and Jesse Duke's terrible accusations against the man she was foolish enough to think she loved was the voice in her ears that had wakened and saved her.

General Grant on the Bible.—Several years ago, General Grant, over whose death our country is now mourning, uttered these earnest words about the Bible: "Hold fast to the Bible as the sheet anchor of your liberties; write its precepts on your hearts and practice them in your lives. To the influence of this book we are indebted for the progress made in true civilization, and to this we look as our guide in the future."

The G. A. R. has developed into a national Sabbath breaker. On next year decoration day comes on the Sabbath, and this association, that boasts of peculiar loyalty to country, and such tender regard for the noble dead, has, in grand conclave assembled, resolved that the Sabbath, and not Saturday or Monday, shall be observed for the purposes of decoration at that time. This can but pain the hearts of the truest friends of our common country. Just as loyal souls as ever took the G. A. R. oath, the heroes of many a bloody field will by this act be excluded from this tribute to the nation's dead.—Blanchard (Iowa) Record.

CORRESPONDENCE.

IN THE REGION OF SLEEPY HOLLOW.

Medusa, N. Y., July 27, 1885.

Dear Cynosure:—We have been spending a few days in plain view of the "shadowy mountains," as Homer calls them, and to watch their various hues as they appear in the sunshine and in the shadow is a pleasure that does not grow old. Their perpetual blue as it appears in the clear sunshine or as it is seen through the rifts of the clouds that scud along below their summits is an unvarying source of delight.

The picturesque hills and stone walls that fence the whole country into small patches seem to a dweller upon the western plains rather objects of interest to the tourist than inducements to engage in agricultural pursuits. Many of the plowed fields even after stone enough has been taken from them to wall the land into fields of from one to ten acres, present the appearance of an Illinois gravel pit, yet pretty fair crops of potatoes, rye, oats, and Yankee corn are produced. It has been very dry here and the hay crop, which is perhaps the chief one, is light. This is the best fruit country we have been in. Apples, pears, plums, and the various small fruits are abundant.

In various matters pertaining to the progress of the race this is a sleepy old country, a quarter of a century behind the times. The temperance cause has not got beyond the Good Templar period. This little town, not large enough to support a Freemason or Odd-fellow lodge, has its Sunday-school, a large Good Templar's lodge, which furnished but a single prohibition voter last fall. When this one man sought to have the matter of prohibition discussed in their county convention, such discussion was not allowed and the reason assigned was that the discussion would divide the order. A widow lady told me that she did not feel worse when she laid her husband in the grave than when, years before, as he entered the army, he joined the Masons.

This is a great field for moral reform labors and there are no laborers, the Lord's prophets being all dumb on questions that might divide their flocks. The fields appear all white for the harvest, as was indicated by the interest shown by the large audience that came together to listen to Mrs. L. on temperance last night. O. F. Lumry.

THE RIGHT SENTIMENT GROWING.

Clearfield, Iowa.

Freemasonry has not grown any in Clearfield since it was puffed last winter. It was said that I made Masons. I wish to be true to my business, and as the lodge is weak and not increasing, I will try to give it a vigorous puffing with tracts.

Anti-secrecy is growing now in the United Brethren church. Loyal brethren are opening their eyes notwithstanding the effort being made to disguise the fact that the commission was formed in the interest of the lodge. Such men as Dr. Davis, Bishop Wright and a host of good men I might mention have "the earnest of the Spirit" and Satan can have no peace on the secrecy question in the U. B. church. We will not fellowship the unfruitful works of darkness to obtain peace. Jesus, in speaking of that kind of peace, said: "I came not to send peace on earth but a sword." He wants us to have no peace except that which is founded upon pure principles. May God bless the brethren with grace sufficient for their day and trial. May they calmly, meekly, lovingly stand for the truth.

SECRET TEMPERANCE LODGES.

Uxbridge, Ont.

Editor Cynosure:—Here in Canada we have a great many secret temperance orders. It would be a great help to the work if some reader of the Cynosure or else its editor, would write a short, pithy, conclusive article against these secret temperance lodges. Let the argument be sound, and as strong as possible—not forgetting the Scriptural standpoint. Now who will respond to this call and give us a hepling hand? Give facts and personal experience on this department of reform. Who will help? Who? WILL YOU?

Our own conviction and experience prove that such lodges are impediments rather than helps. In one place where we have been laboring, we found a Good Templars' lodge, the members of which seemed to look on us with much complacency until our "general rule," forbidding membership in a secret lodge, was read, and then there was a great stir. But for this rule it is probable several of them would have offered themselves for membership among us. We do not want them. Yours for purity, A. Sims.

Note.—Bro. Sims will find much that he needs on this subject in tract No. 15 and in Rev. R. T. Cross's sermon on "Secretism," as well as the pamphlet on Good Templarism. Several of the temperance orders have been most ably and thoroughly written up in the Cynosure during the last year or so. There is, however, much more to be said upon them. The Cynosure waits also for the one who shall say it best.

THE KIDNAPPING OF REV. JAMES SUGGS.

Beloit, Kans., July 17, 1885.

Editor Cynosure:—A few weeks ago I saw an item in your paper saying that Rev. James Suggs (colored) had been handcuffed and taken from a camp-ground in Kansas for having uttered words against Masonry. I have scanned closely every Anti-masonic paper coming into my hands since then to learn farther particulars, as I am well acquainted with Rev. Suggs, and have been for over twenty years, and was very much interested in the case. Last week I found in the Beloit Courier, one of our county papers, the following item, which may be a relief to some of the friends of Bro. Suggs:

> The colored preacher arrested in Marvin on a charge of murder in Ohio, and tried before the probate court here last week was released, the evidence not being sufficient to convict. Immediately upon his release the detective, Rhodes, who had made the arrest, was arrested on a warrant from Phillips county, charging him with kidnapping the colored man. Rhodes left here Saturday in charge of sheriff and his deputy from Phillips county.—Osborne Farmer.

I also learned from private sources that he was subjected to the grossest treatment after his arrest. Why do not some of our leading anti-secret papers give us the whole affair? Mrs. L. T. McKune.

TROUBLE IN A KANSAS CONFERENCE.

LECOMPTON, Kans., July 22, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I ask a little space in your worthy paper to state a few facts in reference to the arbitrary power assumed by a United Brethren presiding elder in a quarterly conference held in Lecompton on the 18th of July. I presented two resolutions for adoption by the conference, the first to the effect that we solemnly protest against the action of the late General Conference in creating a commission to formulate a new constitution and confession of faith as a usurpation of power unknown in the history of the church. The second was of an advisory character, appealing to the ministers of the Kansas Conference of the U. B. church to be careful as to who they elect to the office of presiding elder in said conference, choosing men who love the church better than the lodge. It was moved and seconded to adopt said resolutions.

The presiding elder took the floor and declared he would not entertain the resolutions, and they should not be voted upon while he occupied the chair. I then invited him to vacate the chair, which he refused to do. I then moved to vote him out of the chair, and then the conference to take action on the resolutions. A minister from whom we would have expected better things took the floor in opposition, and one who favored the resoultions attempted a reply. The elder sprang to his feet and stopped him upon the plea of correcting something he said, but instead of a correction he poured forth a volley of vindictive speech in a spirit that might be called tyrannical in the fullest sense of that word. Among other things he denounced those who favored the resolutions as traitors and rebels.

Thus the time passed and all went under. But I think it has accomplished at least two good things: first, it shows what the lodge power will do if it ever obtains full control of the United Brethren church. We will be gagged, anathematized, and, perhaps, some of us Morganized. You will please remember that this overbearing elder was a member of the late General Conference, and helped to demolish or open the way for the destruction of the time-honored principles of the fathers of the church. The other good thing it has accomplished is, he has certainly preached his own funeral sermon as regards the presiding eldership in the Kansas Annual Conference.

In concluding this article I will say a few things in my own defense against the charge of treason or rebellion. I entered the ministry of this church fifty-six years ago, and have give the church a large number of my best years and not less than $2,000 of my means, in order to plant and build up the U. B. church in the valley of the great Mississippi. I lived and labored twenty-seven years in Iowa, and received $523.37½ all told, but it will not be long until I will be out of gun shot of the devil or his servants, and where they will not be permitted to come. I remember what the Divine Master says, "When men shall persecute you and shall say all manner of evil things against you falsely, for my sake; rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven." A. A. SELLERS.

DECISIONS OF THE GRAND LODGE OF CANADA.

WEST WINCHESTER, Ont., July 25, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—In the Toronto Globe, of the 9th of July, 1885, appeared the following, under the heading: "A. F. and A. M. Opening of the Grand Lodge in Hamilton—The Grand Master's Decision:"

"Hamilton, July 8,—The Grand lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons opened in the courthouse at 11 o'clock this morning, Grand Master Hugh Murray, presiding. Routine business was transacted and the Grand Master delivered his address. After recording the deaths, visitations, new lodges opened, appointment of representatives, he proceeded to announce these amongst other decisions:

"Question.—Can a Quaker, who does not take an oath or administer one, be made a Mason?

"Ans.—No. An affirmation in lieu of the oath or obligation of Masonry is not admissable.

"Q.—Candidates for Masonry, before initiation, require to declare their belief in a Supreme Being who has revealed his will to man. Is the Bible meant by that revealed will?

"A.—Certainly. God's Holy Book is his revealed will. It is one of the three great lights placed on the altar to rule and direct our faith.

"Q.—Can an agnostic who says, 'There may be a God, I do not deny it, but I do not know there is,' be made a Mason?

"A.—No. No person can be initiated who does not believe in the true God, the great Architect of the Universe, the Creator and Preserver of all things who has revealed his will to man, and who will punish vice and reward virtue.

"Q.—What should be done in the case of a Mason who is taking an active part in promoting and furthering the so-called Free-thought doctrine?

"A.—An atheist, who denies the existence of a God; a free-thinker, who discards revelation, or who expresses contempt for God or for religion, should be proceeded against according to the mode laid down in 'Masonic Trials.'

"Q.—Can an Indian, who is not enfranchised, be made a Mason?

"A.—Yes. Color, creed, or country, is no bar to initiation. The question of admitting a candidate is one of expediency, and is left to the judgment of the members of the lodge where such application is made."

On the 11th of July I wrote a note to the editor of the Toronto Globe, requesting the insertion of the following anonymous letter:

MASONIC QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

There are a few more questions that should have been asked. Such as: When it was replied, "Certainly, God's Holy Book is his revealed will," the following question should have been asked: Does that include the New Testament? If not, does it not follow that those professing the Jewish faith as well as the Mohommedan and some others cannot be eligible to Masonic fraternity and honors? If that does not follow what does the Christian Mason make of the words of Christ: "Ye believe in God believe also in me." "This is the work of God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent." "Every man, therefore, that hath heard and hath learned of the Father cometh unto me." "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." And the words of Peter: "Neither is there salvation in any other, for there is none other name under heaven, given among men, whereby ye must be saved."

The Christian religion, from the teaching of these quotations, is most exclusive outside of faith in Christ. How can the true Christian unite in a religious fraternity with those who are unbelievers in Christ, and aspire to a union with them hereafter in glory? If God's Holy Book includes the New Testament, the same questions are pertinent and require another set of answers.

The above letter was not inserted by the Globe, nor has any reply been made to a private letter of inquiry. What is the natural inference as regards this treatment of a constant reader of that paper for many years? Am I safe to conclude that the Toronto Globe fears the Masonic fraternity, and dares not publish anything to awaken honest enquiry as to the propriety of the existence of the dark institution? Or are the majority, or any of the editors or proprietors themselves Masons, and ashamed to come to the light?

I am more than ever convinced of the correctness of the position of the Cynosure on secret societies, and pray that the fearless advocacy of its principles may be attended with God's blessing to the pulling down of strongholds. W. B.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS.

LESSON VII, Aug. 16.—The Prophet of the Lord—1 Kings 18: 30-46.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Lord, he is the God; the Lord, he is the God. 1 Kings 18: 39.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The first step in true religious reformation is towards simplicity of worship. vs. 30–32. We note (1) that Elijah calls on the people to come near. False religions seek to keep the vulgar crowd aloof. True religion through the Spirit and the Bride says "Come." So now the lodge, the antetype of ancient Baalism, shrouds itself in pretended mystery from the multitude, while the Gospel reveals itself to babes. (2) He repairs the altar which was broken down. Reformers create no new truth, add no new statute or ordinance; they merely restore. (3) Elijah's altar is after the rude pattern of patriarchal times—of the most primitive constructure. Costly churches and elaborate rites are invariably a sign of religious decadence, and thus we find that in religious reformations the tendency is always to return to a simple form of worship. (4) He takes twelve stones—the number of the tribes of Israel. The act was symbolical of a great truth, which might have comforted Elijah had he remembered it when sitting under the juniper tree in Horeb—that God had still a faithful few in every tribe. So in times of the greatest spiritual degeneracy the twelve tribes of God's spiritual Israel have each their sealed ones (Rev. 7) who have never bowed the knee to the Baal of popular sin.

2 The power af a living faith. vs. 33–46. There shall be no suspicion of jugglery. Again and again the altar is flooded with water. Common earthly fire would be extinguished by it; not so with the fire from heaven. What may seem insuperable obstacles will be but fuel for the flame of God's Spirit when an Elijah prays. The first act by which the people ratify their returning allegiance to Jehovah is by becoming the executioners of his justice on the prophets of Baal. Not one of the guilty host escapes. They were the murderers of a nation. They ruined souls. Their altars were red with the blood of slaughtered innocents. Why should they live? The sentimentality which pities the criminal more than the victim of his crime is a wretched travesty of the divine grace of mercy. It is disguised cruelty. Our national need is righteous laws faithfully executed. The rum-sellers, the priests of the drink Baal, which is murdering our nation, ruining homes, killing and maiming women and children, and sending sixty thousand souls to eternal destruction every year are continually escaping their just deserts through a lax execution of the laws. As Jezebel and her court stood behind the heathenism Elijah was trying to overthrow and succeeded in crushing out the incipient reformation in its very beginning, so the Baal of Masonry stands behind the Baal of the saloon. But for one brief period the people are zealous for Jehovah. The intense faith of one solitary man has done it all. Entrenched evils are formidable. The liquor power and the secret empire are terrible foes; but Elijah is always stronger than Baal, faith is more powerful than unbelief, light more potent than darkness.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Does God take pleasure in elaborate forms of worship? Isa. 1: 10–15. Is one with God always a majority? Ps. 118: 6; Rom. 8: 31.

DAILY READINGS.

Sin keeps back God's blessing. Isa. 59.

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS.

[From the U. P. Bible Teacher.]

V. 30. There are many broken down altars in our homes which ought to be repaired. Is not one cause of so much spiritual dearth in the church the neglect of the closet and family worship? These are the springs and rills which feed the river of spiritual life which should course through the church; if they be not watered with heaven's showers, is it strange if the channel of the river be dry?

31. Schism is a sin. Though God permitted his people to be broken into two external kingdoms, he wanted the higher spiritual unity to be preserved. Even though organic unity be not practicable, nor even desirable, at present, we should never forget that we are brethren.

33. It is not new forms of worship, or new doctrines, that the church needs in order to subdue the world, but more of the life and power which Jesus is anxious to bestow.

36. Our addresses at the throne of grace should be made thoughtfully, intelligently and reverently. No one offers true prayer who does not realize the relation in which he stands to God. A study of the prayers recorded in the Bible shows that the most godly men always realized this relationship. If we would study carefully the terms in which they approach the throne of grace it would teach us our relation to him, and would certainly deepen the spirit of reverence, as well as strengthen our faith.

36. All men stand in a covenant relation to God; either in the relation of the covenant of works, or the relation of the covenant of grace.

37. The most comprehensive prayer is that which seeks the glory of God. God's highest glory is our greatest good.

38. How near God is to us at all times. While we pray he answers, according to his promises: "And it shall come to pass, that before they call I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear" (Isa. 65: 24).

39. He expects us to confess him before men. Without this we have no reason to expect salvation (Rom. 10: 9).

40. We must put away sin if we expect his blessing.

41. He who knows God's gracious and faithful character rests assured of the fulfilment of his promises.

42. Elijah was brave before men because he was humble before God.

44. It is our duty both to pray for and expect, promised blessings.

46. "As thy day, so shall thy strength be." "They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength;" they shall mount up with wings as eagles: they shall run and not be weary; they shall walk and not faint."

THE CYCLONE AT HIGHMORE, DAKOTA.

DEATH OF E. B. THOMPSON.

The death of Bro. E. B. Thompson, a former member of the N. C. A. Board, in the cyclone at Highmore, is told in the following account from the Highmore Herald of July 23rd:

The weather on Wednesday, the 15th, was very hot and sultry. A strong wind had blown most of the day from the southeast which only seemed to make it more unbearable, from the clouds of dust which it carried into every nook and crevice.

Evening brought a change, the air was cooler and people were beginning to enjoy themselves, when their attention was attracted by the black cloud forming in the northwest, which was anxiously watched by many.

The cry of "a cyclone!" a little before seven o'clock, brought many to their doors to see the dreaded monster, from which many had been hiding in their cellars a long time back. The sight was truly grand. A cloud about seventy-five degrees in length and half as broad, laying about ten degrees above the horizon, the lower part of which was inky black and into which clouds were rolling from the north and south was sending to the earth a funnel shaped cloud or what appeared like a huge elephant's trunk. It appeared to stand still for some fifteen or twenty minutes, looking as if drawing to the bosom of the black cloud all witnin its reach.

The first slowly withdrew into the cloud and another was formed in about twenty minutes, which seemed to sway to and fro, creating great clouds of dust in its track.

Several others formed in different parts of the cloud, but only one at a time. Some came straight down, but others shot down in a slanting direction making them appear even more terrible. The last one that formed, about eight o'clock, though larger than the first, was of a lighter color and was still visible until it became too dark to distinguish objects at a distance.

All this time a hard wind was blowing from the southeast, directly opposite the course of the cyclone, and it was remarked by some who had witnessed the Grinnell cyclone, that the action was the same.

During the formation of the different funnels which occupied about one and a quarter hours some were coolly watching its course, others were running wildly around with clothing and valuables in their arms, looking for cellars and places of safety.

There was something so terribly grand as it slowly and surely marched toward this place which seemed doomed, that it fascinated the gaze.

The approach was watched by many until just before it struck the town, and by some even at the time. From the most reliable sources that can be found the storm struck this place about fifteen minutes after eight o'clock.

There was a sudden lull in the storm, during which the wind from the southeast stopped and then the town was struck from two directions. The one from the southwest struck the town first, demolishing the M. E. church, blowing in fronts of stores, filling them with mud and water, and when two thirds the way through the town turned east; from the north came the other striking the Hudson & Irwin's warehouse, throwing it from its foundation and turning over two box cars, the two forces meeting in the east edge of town picking up J. A. Patterson's, Mrs. Cook's and J. A. Olin's house, grinding them into small fragments, together with the other pieces from town were scattered for a mile to the east northeast, strewing the ground thick.

The first funnel struck the ground in 114-73 seven miles north aud one mile west of Holabird, on Mr. Foster's claim, and spent its furry in and near a large lake bed piling sod ten and twelve feet high, tearing shacks to pieces, etc. Its course was southeast to Holabird and then east to a point two or three miles east of Highmore, when it took a northeastern direction. The track of the storm was from two to three miles in width.

After the storm people were out looking for friends and relatives, and the glad cry went up "no one was killed or hurt."

A short time after the storm when all were rejoicing that none were hurt, William, youngest son of E. B. Thompson, two miles north of town, came into town bareheaded and barefooted, saying that their buildings were blown away and that all the family had been in the cellar except the father, and that he could not be found.

Vehicles were soon prepared and twenty or thirty citizens on their way to the farm. Arriving there search was at once commenced and in half an hour he was found forty rods northeast of the house with his neck broken and face driven three or four inches into the ground.

It seems that the family had gone into the cellar some time before, but the father and his son, William, staid up watching the storm. The father sat in a chair by a window looking to the northwest. The mother called and told them they had better come down, but he appeared not to hear the call. There was a lull for a moment in the storm, and having heard there was always a calm before the crash came, the son started for the cellar calling for his father to come. He got up from the chair but was too late, as the son only saved himself by jumping from the top stair, and even then was somewhat bruised.

The sad procession was formed, and town was reached about eleven o'clock. A hurried inquest was held and the body put in shape for burial.

All were ready to help the bereaved ones, and as it was thought best the burial took place on Thursday evening at six o'clock, Rev. Parsons officiating. The bereaved have the heartfelt sympathies of all.

THE CHURCHES VS. LODGERY.

The following denominations are committed by vote of their legislative assemblies or by constitution to a separation from secret lodge worship:

Adventists (Seventh-day.)

Baptists—Primitive, Seventh-day and Scandinavian.

Brethren (Dunkers or German Baptists.)

Christian Reformed Church.

Church of God (Northern Indiana Eldership.)

Congregational—The State Associations of Illinois and Iowa have adopted resolutions against the lodge.

Disciples (in part.)

Friends.

Lutherans—Norwegian, Danish, Swedish and Synodical Conferences.

Mennonites.

Methodists—Free and Wesleyan.

Methodist Protestant (Minnesota Conference.)

Moravians.

Plymouth Brethren.

Presbyterian—Associate, Reformed and United.

Reformed Church (Holland Branch.)

United Brethren in Christ.

Individual churches in some of these denominations should be excepted, in part of them even a considerable portion.

The following local churches have, as a pledge to disfellowship and oppose lodge worship, given their names to the following list as

The American Party.

First Nomination for President at Oberlin, Ohio, May 23, 1872.

Platform Adopted at Chicago, June 28, 1872.

Name Adopted at Syracuse, N. Y., June 3, 1874.

PRESIDENTAL CANDIDATES:

1872—Charles Francis Adams and Joseph L. Barlow.

1876—James B. Walker and Donald Kirkpatrick.

1880—J. W. Phelps and Samuel C. Pomeroy.

1884—J. Blanchard and J. W. Conant nominated; the former withdrawing, Samuel C. Pomeroy was nominated. Both nominees withdrawing, the support of the party was generally given to John P. St. John and William Daniel, candidates of the Prohihition party.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness hy which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile hands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and helieving the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, hoth inevitahle and indispensahle:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, helieving with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; helieving in the Christian marriage, and uot in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; helieving, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, uot in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we ahhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience hy human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly helieve that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liherty and welfare. We further most firmly helieve that a government without God has none hut lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We helieve in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly helieve that the hravery and blood of our soldiers have hought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will he just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised hy the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon he not only echoed by their voices, but sustained hy their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a hrief synopsis of the principles of our government, hy which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That the Bible should he associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

3. That God requires, and man needs a Sahhath.

4. We demand the prohihition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.

5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted hy our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

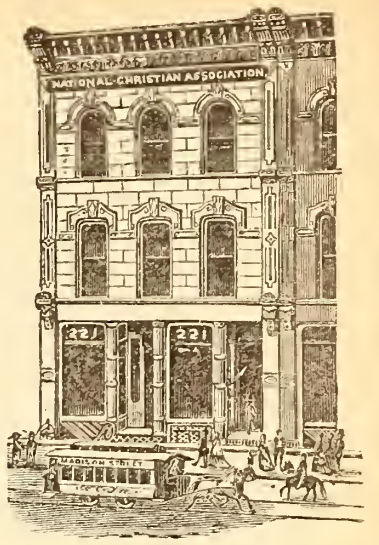
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to henefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.

7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.

8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.

9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.

10. That international differences should be settled hy arhitration.



11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency

13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.

14. That polygamy should he immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.

15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, AUGUST 6, 1885.

"The marriage of the Lamb" is the coming advent of Christ. This will be when "his wife (the church) hath made herself ready," "arrayed in fine linen, clean and white, which is the righteousness of saints." Christians are not now "ready" for Christ to come. —Rev. 19: 7.

"Good Templars' Day.—Mr. John B. Finch, R. W. G. T., will speak August 25th, at the Lake Bluff Convention."

We take the above from the Lever, the only allusion to Good Templarism in three or four numbers which we notice. It is a thousand pities that so able and eloquent a man as Mr. Finch should insist on crowding secretism into meetings like that at Lake Bluff. If every secret temperance lodge were dead to-day neither Gov. St. John, Bro. Van Vleet, nor Mary Allen West would turn a hand over to raise them to life. Why should such "dead flies" spoil good prohibition ointment?

"And the serpent cast out of his mouth water as a flood after the woman, that he might cause her to be carried away of the flood." (Rev. 12:15.) Prophecy is symbol, a solemn caricature, a material resemblance of spiritual forces. The serpent is the devil; the woman, star-crowned and sun-clothed, is the Christian religion, and the flood of waters from the serpent's mouth is a teaching-force; the clearest possible, material, pictorial resemblance of the deluge of secret societies, omitting Christ, yet promising salvation, temporal and eternal to men: not paganism, but drowning out Christianity in Christian lands. But the earth is to help the woman, and Satan is to be bound that he "deceive the nations no more till the thousand years are gone. May God hasten his suppression.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

ST. JOHN DEFENDED IN THE SARATOGA W. C. T. U. —INSTRUCTION IN THE DAILY PRAYER MEETING. —DANCING CHURCH MEMBERS.—CHEERING ENDORSEMENT.

Saratoga Springs, July 28, 1885.

Dear Cynosure:—Two successive Sabbaths plain, pointed testimonies have been given here, in the Congregational and Free Methodist churches, by Pres. C. A. Blanchard and the writer. Last Sabbath, (day before yesterday) at the W. C. T. U. meeting in the Town Hall, a stranger arose and said: "Gov. St. John has been represented here as guilty of most of the crimes condemned by the Decalogue. I understand a gentleman present has known him in his home, among his neighbors, in Kansas, and for one I should like to know what is his opinion of the Governor."

Thus called on, I said: "I have conversed with Governor St. John's neighbors who have lived by him in Olathe eighteen or twenty years, Republicans, Democrats, and Covenanters who do not vote, and so are without party prejudice; Presbyterians, Baptists, Congregationalists, and Wesleyans, without one single exception, gave him the highest character for integrity and uprightness. Dr. McMillan who has lived by him for eighteen years within a couple of stones cast from his door, who is pastor of the Covenanting church, and so is of neither political party, said, 'I consider John P. St. John an upright, downright, honest man. And when I say that of a politician, it means a good deal.'

"Why, then, some ask, was he defeated, and dropped by the Republicans?

"I answer: he was defeated by the money of brewers and distillers, dispensed by secret societies through the one hundred organized counties of Kansas. Even the poor, colored refuges, whom he, while Governor received in their Exodus, and fed and clothed them to keep them from starvation, even these refugees to whom he had been a guardian angel, numbers of them, sold their votes to the Democrats to obtain whiskey and tobacco. While leading Republicans, like Ingalls and others, who had nominated St. John, and adopted a State Prohibition platform, turned traitor to their own party and elected Gov. Glick, a Democrat, and open secessionist and rebel during the war.

"The secret societies which defeated St. John were liquor leagues, formed and named, like the Ku-klux, for a particular object. But, like the Ku-klux, they used the Masonic halls as their head-quarters, and were Masons under another name.

"Of the 150,000 votes given to St. John last fall, at least two-thirds of the whole number are in heart opposed to secret societies, and if they can be reached and enlightened in the next three years, political men will see that no party can carry the election in 1888 without the anti-secret vote. And so as in the slavery struggle, self-interest will complete what the fear of God begins,"

Tuesday, July 28. —To-day I attended the daily prayer meeting in the First Presbyterian church, led by an earnest, able minister, named Smith, who read of the rout of the Philistines by Jonathan and his armor-bearer. I spoke nearly as follows:

"The difference between the religion of those Philistines and their two assailants, was, that the Philistines' religion was invented by men, administered by priests and inhabited devils. While Jonathan's religion had a Saviour, a Messiah in it, which connected him with the true God. Of course the pagans were beaten as their gods were. Now, beloved brethren, the secret lodge system, which murdered Cavendish and Burke in Phœnix Park, Ireland; the same which attempted to blow up the Parliament houses in England; the German Socialists who attempt to carry political ends by assassination; the Nihilists of Russia, and the secret lodges of our own country, are one and the same system which seeks political ends by secret oaths and obligations and promises to some man without Christ!

"Mr. Moody, whom our brother, leading the meeting, cited, in his great meetings at Philadelphia and New York, has denounced these secret lodges as 'cages of unclean birds,' and warned Christians to 'come out and be separate' from them. We must imitate his methods if we would see men brought to Christ.

"At the hotel table this morning sat four educated and cultivated young ladies who said they were proud of the dance called 'waltz.' One of them was a Presbyterian, another a Methodist, the third was a Disciple, and the other a devout Jewess. They came from different States, and were fair repasentatives of the church sentiment where they belong. 'Yet the waltz,' which they and their young friends practice is denounced by some of the bishops of the Protestant Episcopal church, (a church not accused of being 'righteous over-much') as hostile to decency and to the health and morals of the young. In brief, the lax morals and Christless religion of the legion of secretists in our churches, have so obliterated the distinction between the church and the world, that Christians are no longer its 'light,' and sinners stumble on in darkness.

"Dr. R. S. Storrs of Brooklyn said lately, 'The effort of the present church to convert the world, is like the attempt to push a steamship across the ocean with tepid water instead of steam.' "

The prayer meeting was large for a morning hour, and made up of ministers and prominent men and women from all parts of the country. Yet they listened to the above remarks with interest and respect. The utterances are given here for no special merit contained in them (the readers of the Cynosure are familiar with much better), but to show how an intellectual audience in Saratoga received them.

A fine old gentleman who said he had long been familiar with Saratoga, arose and said:—"I am extensively acquainted in this region from Albany to Lake George, and I know that this brother (the writer) has spoken the truth. And a Saratoga gentleman called the speaker's recollection to the fact that "this prayer meeting was started forty years ago, in a house where the Grand Union now stands, and you recollect, while we were praying, others were dancing in an adjoining room, and it was difficult to mix the comparatively decent dance of that day with our worship of God." The leader, Dr. Smith, in closing said, "It rejoiced" him to see "aged men, like those who have addressed us, carrying young hearts in their bosoms;" and he "believed fidelity to Christ was an antidote to growing old."

Thus in four different congregations, and for three successive Sabbaths, the lodge has been witnessed against in this watering place where wealth and intelligence "most do congregate;" not only with no sign of displeasure, but with apparent satisfaction. In short, the odious lodge-system in this country lives by silence and sufferance, on a slumbering volcano of piety and intelligence which will yet consume it by the lava of its burning indignation. J. B.

Republicans, in the east, bitterly denounced the St. John men, because they have no hope of ever winning them back. They dealt more gently with the mugwumps who forsook Blaine, because they do not despair of winning them back to their party.—Dr. Potter of Saratoga.

*INDUSTRIAL PROBLEMS.

The most important contributions to the discussion of the questions that separate capital and labor are "The Precipice Ahead," by E. V. Smalley, a former editorial writer on the New York Tribune, in the Library Magazine and in the North American Review a conversation between the celebrated lawyer, David Dudley Field, and Henry George, the California labor agitator, whose original and forcible presentation of the evils of poverty and wealth and their remedy by land confiscation to the government, have made him the most celebrated writer on the economic questions of the day. Mr. Smalley writes powerfully of the discontent of the laboring classes, without suggesting how their demands may be granted with justice to society at large. He is unjust, we believe, to the mass of our American mechanics and operatives, in declaring that they are for the most part Rationalists or Materialists, wholly outside the influences of the Christian church. The authorities of Pittsburg thought otherwise in the great railroad strikes of 1877, which began so terribly in that city; for as a last resort they appealed to the Roman Catholic bishop to send his church members home; and the address of that official to the mob from the pilot of a locomotive will not soon be forgotten.

The North American Review article is one of the most satisfactory, so far as it goes. Its purpose is a simple exposition of the theories of Henry George; and under the cross-examination of Mr. Field they appear in a clearer, more reasonable and popular light than we have ever before seen them placed. Indeed, if the purpose is to refute them, the conversation is more likely to establish them in the minds of the readers. Mr. Field's questioning makes them plain to the dullest mind; and while he entirely disagrees with Mr. George in his remedy by land taxation, yet Mr. Field makes not an argument to refute them. In a recent conversation with a gentleman somewhat conversant with economic questions, as a legislator and prominent teacher in the Chicago schools, he remarked that he had made Henry George's views a most critical and careful study, from his own books and the numerous replies in this country and in England; and, although he could not say that he accepted the offered solution of our labor problems, yet he had failed to find a single reply that met the arguments of Mr. George, or that could show the fallacy or injustice of his scheme, which is, in brief, that, without changing the nominal ownership of land, every man holding his own title-deed, there should yet be a practical ownership by the State resulting from the collection of taxes from the soil, and the soil only. In doing so the soil is regarded as it came from the hands of the Creator, without anything that man has put upon it; all other property is to be acquired, enjoyed and transmitted as at present and not be taxable. The rate of annual taxation should be equal to the annual rental. The proceeds of taxation should be applied not only to the purposes of government, but to other purposes as legislatures may elect, even to a division among the people at so much a head.

Mr. Clark's little work, though hardly more than an essay, will be read with intense interest by every disciple of Henry George, but much more by those who reject his theories while unable to refute them. Without any claim for originality he modestly and honestly acknowledges that he simply presents the leading fundamental doctrine of another author in a popular form: and he has succeeded admirably, if a clear, forcible, and even elegant style could make the abstruse theories of political economy apparent to the masses. While bowing to Mr. George as the clearest of thinkers on these subjects, Mr. Clark shows that his theory is weak, not in being incorrect, but only incomplete. The doctrine held by Mr. Clark is fundamental, the ne plus ultra. "All nature," he says, "exists in some degree and variety of two forms: the conscious, including sentiency, and the unconscious, or what we usually comprise in matter. But matter—the unknowing, the unperceptive, the unliving—has no object, no existence for itself: it exists for the living, the perceptive, the knowing, which alone has the functions to utilize it. So matter is created in the relation of property: it is the estate and the birthright of the conscious." This theory makes man's birthright to be, not merely the land, as George argues, but Aristotle's whole "bounty of nature:" and by an easy calculation on the basis of fifty years for a generation, it appears that all property should pay an annual tax of two per cent, which can perhaps be used as Mr. George suggests.

Mr. Lyon, the author of "The Social Crisis," is a

The Social Crisis. By William H. Lyon, Attorney at Law, Chicago.

Chicago lawyer, who dedicates his book to the Philadelphian Literary Society of Monmouth College. He is the author also of the suggestion to the people of Dakota to make a radical departure in the legislative part of their constitution by making the legislature not an enacting, but a suggesting body, the laws proposed by them to be voted upon at a stated popular election. There is much merit in the suggestion. It is more feasible than the scheme proposed in his book; which is, in brief, state control and ownership of all kinds of property and investment in which labor is employed. He argues against competition with much skill and fairness, and as earnestly, though not so successfully, against co-operation. Communism is the ultimatum, and the blessings of this state of society are described in all their utopian and seductive colors. The chasm between our present condition and State ownership Mr. Lyon leaves to be bridged by the imagination, unless he means to infer that the culmination of the social crisis shall bring it about by another French Revolution.

The important social questions which are persented in these books and articles are occupying largely the attention of a multitude of secret orders to a greater of less degree. Some are absorbed by it and in their ignorance are led by their leaders into the greatest excess of imaginary revolution and prosperity; others, less occupied with its consideration, are drilling and arming in secret a force, that, while ostensibly for other purposes, yet if ever a crisis should come when the commuuist lodge should arise against society, these trained armies of secretism will be found ready for the play of anarchy and blood.

—The Itinerant, the pro-lodgery United Brethren monthly of Harrisburg, Pa., has now something to fight in the Conservator of Dayton, and devotes considerable space to Bishop Wright, the Richmond Star and the new paper.

—Bro. Isaac Bancroft makes some excellent suggestions to the lecturers on another page. He is himself coming on to the meeting on the 17th, doing the Lord's work as he goes. He had reached Seward, Ill., on the 31st ult., having visited 63 families, giving away 504 pages of tracts and traveling sixteen miles on the day before—the hot Thursday for the northwest—when the thermometer stood at 104 in the shade along his route. Bro. B. has lately secured a $50 subscription for Wisconsin State work.

—Mrs. McKune's letter about the colored brother Suggs in Kansas is the first clue we have found to learn the reasons and results of this matter. Rev. B. T. Roberts mentioned his seizure and concealment at the annual N. C. A. meeting, and as he left the city at noon on the day of the meeting no further particulars were learned. Bro. Suggs is a thorough Anti-mason, a seceder, we believe. A few years since he aroused much enthusiasm at the camp-meeting near St. Charles, Ill., for the cause of the freedmen.

PERSONAL.

—Bro. W. B. Stoddard reached Chicago from New York State Friday morning to attend the lecturers' convention. He is expecting to begin work in Ohio in a few weeks.

—The Birmingham, Iowa, Free Press reports an address by Pres. C. A. Blanchard in the park of that plade on Thursday evening, July 23d.

—Bro. A. D. Zaraphonithes of Andras, Greece, returned home in June from a trip to Smyrna and Constantinople. A letter reporting his observations will appear next week.

—Bro. C. W. Hunt of the Wesleyan church, Buckingham, called Monday on the Cynosure on his way to Iowa. He hopes to return in time to attend the lecturers' institute, August 17th. A communication from him to the Wesleyan on the proposed convention of churches, called out a strong endorsement from the editor, Bro. N. Wardner.

—Rev. Rufus Johnson, editor of the Record of Blanchard, Iowa, honored the Cynosure with a call last week on his way through Chicago to Indiana. Bro. Johnson is one of the few editors who have solved the difficult problem, how to sustain a true-hearted, Christian, reform, local paper in a small community. Southern Iowa has two such papers, the Record, and the Free Press of Birmingham. They should be generally supported.

—Bro. Phillip Kribs writes to know if lists of signers to the Washington Monument protest were received at this office from Samuel Bushey and A. J. Weaver, one of whom secured forty-one names, the other thirty. As no record was kept of the hundreds of lists sent in last winter, it being impossible to know who sent many of them, we connot say whether these particular lists came or not, but it is to be presumed that they did, and are now filed at Washington.

—Prof. L. N. Stratton, of Wheaton Theological Seminary, after attending the denominatioual board meetings at Syracuse in June, and visiting several of his old parishes, on the invitation of friends spent a time recruiting from fatiguing and heavy labors at Ocean Grove, N. Y.

—Oak Park, a populous and wealthy suburb west of Chicago, has been visited by the brethren Clark. Last week in a hired hall on a hot night the audience was small, but a day or two later at a private house "George Harris" had an overflowing meeting, and the enthusiastic people would hear nothing but that they should both come Saturday evening and hold an out-door meeting which should be greater than could get into any room in the place. Monday morning they started for Detroit expecting to stop at Battle Creek, Lansing and Brighton on the way.

REFORM NEWS.

LECTURERS' INSTITUTE.

All things considered, August 17th seems to be the time most favorable for opening the anti-secrecy lecture class at Wheaton. Several have reported favorably, expecting to attend, and others not yet heard from are expected. Remember, those who are contemplating entering the work for a time, and have the qualities which by experience will insure success, are guaranteed their railway fare and free entertainment while at the convention by vote of the N. C. A. Board. Any person thinking to attend this meeting should write me at once, so that special rates where possible may be secured on the railways and entertainment provided. The importance of this meeting cannot be over-estimated and prayer unceasing should go up to God for his blessing upon it.

A WORD TO LECTURERS.

LET ALL SAY AMEN!

Martin, Wis., July 25, 1885.

I feel like saying a word through the Cynosure to all the agents of the N. C. A. I find in the Cynosure the names of thirty-three lecturers and only twelve are in the field permanently, that is, spending their whole time. Brethren, let us come up to Wheaton at the time appointed, every one of us, to lay ourselves out to the work and prepare for it as never before. If we can find at our homes or on the way others who are good men, filled with the Holy Ghost and willing to engage in this work, bring them along; and if God moves any one though not invited by any one to come, let them come. They will be welcome. Let us come and compare notes and be prepared as far as we can to do our work in future in the best manner possible. You had better all come, for I feel God has a work for us all to do now. I wish we had the means to use every one of these thirty-three lecturers. May be we will have; if not, it gives the N. C. A. a chance for a choice out of us all for as many as can be employed. I hope the notice of the time will be given as soon as possible, so that all may be ready. I am sure that God is opening the way for an advance all along the line. Let us be ready for it and enter in and take this whole land for Christ.

July 31st.—I came across a Mason near Winslow, Ill., who said that he lived in Sioux City, Dakota, that he had been secretary of the Masonic lodge there for fifteen years; that he was stopping with a friend near Winslow who was also a Mason, but not well posted. He thought if his friend was at home he would buy one of my books, "Freemasonry Illustrated," as if he had that he could post him up in a very short time.

I lectured Sabbath evening in a hall in Winslow, owned and lighted by a Mason. After I got through he came to me and stated that I misrepresented Masonry in that I stated that two men that were infidels belonged to a certain lodge. He said no infidel could belong to a Masonic lodge. I was told that two such belonged at that time to the lodge in Winslow.

EDUCATIONAL.

Wheaton College annual catalogue reports a total attendance last college year of 227, a smaller total than had been expected, as more students were enrolled last winter term than for probably fifteen years. The class of students also is improving, there being forty-five in the college and seventy in the preparatory classes. Pres. C. A. Blanchard is assisted by a capable and earnest faculty of eleven members, who will be continued next year as last. Scientific instruments of great value have lately been purchased which will assist greatly in popularizing the studies of astronomy and natural history. The next term opens September 1st, 1885.

Augustana College and Theological Seminary, of which the venerable T. N. Hasselquist, D. D., is president, issues a full catalogue. This institution opened at Paxton, Ill., Sept. 1st, 1860, and was afterward removed to a beautiful location midway between the business centers of the cities of Moline and Rhode Island. A fine new building is now being erected which will nearly double the capacity of the institution in that respect. The total number of students in all departments last year was 211: 37 of whom are in the theological semiuary; 87 in the college and 82 in the preparatory departments, with five non-matriculated female students. As at Wheaton, this institution forbids all visiting of saloons, billiard rooms and similar places, and all kinds of gambling are forbidden; also all secret societies among students as well as active membership in secret societes in general.

Otterbein University, located at Westerville, Ohio, issues this year its quadrennial catalogue, twenty-four pages being filled with an individual record of all the graduates of the institutiou from 1857. The faculty numbers eleven, Rev. H. A. Thompson, D. D., a working prohibitiouist, being at the head. Two hundred students were enrolled last year, fifty-five being in the college classes. Among the alumni are found many names that have become prominent in the United Brethren church.

—Marietta College, Ohio, lately celebrated a semicentennial anniversary. Governor Hoadly, an infidel and high Mason, was among the chief speakers of the occasion.

—Miss Blauche Williams, of Brantford, Canada, who has just matriculated in the Uuiversity of Toronto, is the first colored girl ever admitted to the privileges of the university.

—The Morris Street School for colored children in Charleston, S. C., is the largest in the State, containing more than 1,400 pupils.

—In the colleges and universities of England, there is one student for each 5,080 population; in Germany one for each 2,134; in New Euglaud one for each 128; and iu Scotland one for each 616.

—Dr. I. L. Kephart, of California, has accepted the presidency of Westfield College. It is hoped that he will carry forward that college with courage for the reform truth held in honor by the United Brethren.

—Rev. C. G. Kephart not long since resigned the presideucy of Avalon College, on account of failing health. Prof. G. P. Macklin, late of Westfield College, has been chosen by the trustees to fill the position and his wife is to be lady principal. Prof. Macklin has made a favorable impression upon the Avalon people.

—Austria reports about 10,600 students in different universities under more than 900 teachers; 2,700 students in higher technical schools, 1,284 in commercial academics, 430 in art schools, 1,591 in theology, 75,565 in secondary schools, and about 2,506,000 in elementary schools.

—Out of thirty-two young men of New York City who were examined last week for West Point cadetships, ouly nine were accepted as physically souud. Such a note might well make the young men of our cities pause for a moment's thought. No man who violates the laws of health can long have a healthy body. How few there are who do not study fashion and humor appetite more than they do the laws that pertain to a healthful body. Beer, the cigarette, too much amusement, and the hidden vices, are making havoc with the physical manhood of all our towns and cities.

—In the report to the Advance of the ninety-first anniversary of Williams College the secret society receptions are described as "very brilliaut and social events." In this iustitution there was once a society of a very different character. It met behind a haystack and was the origin of the American Board for Foreign Missions. In 18— these secret societies had become so overbearing and arrogant that they became unbearable to the better class of students, and an anti-secret organization, the Delta Upsilon, was organized by ex-Governor William Bross of this city and others of his fellow student. The efforts of this society turned the scale in favor of the young men who were uuyoked in the secret ring.

The Home.

SOMETIME, SOMEWHERE.

Unanswered yet? The prayer your lips have pleaded
In agony of heart these many years?
Does faith begin to fail: is hope departing,
And think you all in vain those falling tears?
Say not the Father hath not heard your prayer;
You shall have your desire sometime, somewhere.

Unanswered yet? though when you first presented
This one petition at the Father's throne,
It seemed you could not wait the time of asking
So urgent was your heart to make it known.
Though years have passed since then, do not despair;
The Lord will answer you sometime, somewhere.

Unanswered yet? Nay, do not say ungranted;
Perhaps your part is not yet wholly done.
The work began when first your prayer was uttered,
And God will finish what he has begun.
If you will keep the incense burning there,
His glory you shall see, sometime, somewhere.

Unanswered yet? Faith cannot be unanswered,
Her feet were firmly planted on the Rock;
Amid the wildest storms she stands undaunted,
Nor quails before the loudest thunder shock.
She knows Omnipotence has heard her prayer,
And cries, "It shall be done," sometime, somewhere.

CONVERSATIONS WITH CHRIST.

If I were asked what is the thing which the devil, and the world, and the flesh try hardest to prevent Christians from getting, I should reply, "Conversations with Christ." I say this from my own experience, and from observation of other Christians. A quiet, unhurried speaking to Jesus alone and hearing his replies—this is what every Christian needs every day, and what many get only once a month—or more seldom still—or never.

When did you last so talk with Christ? Do stop and answer this question to yourself before you read on.

It is so easy to go to services, and to listen to prayers, and to join in them. It is easy to sing to Him, or to pray to Him with others, or to think that we are doing so because we feel refreshed and helped by it. But what if it should turn out that it was a mistake of ours to imagine that we were actually conversing personally with Him at those times; and that we were really only talking and singing for other people and ourselves to hear! I tremble for people who only pray in churches, or at prayer-meetings or with other Christians present. Communion services are very blessed helps and means of grace, but they are not necessarily conversations with Christ; nor is preaching or teaching or working for him. You may be a most religious person—busy all day long about God's matters; you may give time, and money and thought, to him, and yet you may never converse with him. And the danger is, that if you do not converse with him alone each day, you will certainly get thoroughly on the wrong road, and wrong altogether, and that when you and he meet, you will see all your work crumble away and yourself left naked—suddenly waked up to the fact that you and your Saviour are strangers to each other. It will be a horrible surprise to you that nothing should remain of all the work on which you spent your life, because the solomn words, "Without Me ye can do nothing," had been forgotten by you.

He meant that you should have talked to him continually about everything you did, and everything you cared about, and should have been always conscious of his sympathy and oversight, and working. But instead of that, you talked only to men and women, and made shift with their sympathy, and advice and help. He meant you to have asked his counsel about that money trouble. He would have arranged it all; but you only asked your lawyer, and it turned out badly. He meant you to have told him your anxieties about your son, and he would have ended them; but you only consulted your friend, and matters got worse and worse. He meant you to have asked him for light about that doctrine which you could not understand; but you went to books to get it explained, and you became more uncertain than before. He would have satisfied you. He meant you to have confessed to him that secret sin, and he would have forgiven you and cleansed you; but you confessed it to your clergyman or minister, and it torments you to this hour. He meant you to have committed to him that painful illness, and he would have been your physician; but you trusted your family doctor only and got no relief. He meant you to have asked him how much money you were to give away; but you settled that yourself, and settled it wrong. He would have been your counsellor about the profession you chose, the situation you accepted, the servant you engaged, the books you read, the friendships you formed; but you chose other counsellors, or did after your own choosing, and all has been failure.

May the Holy Spirit strike the scales from your eyes now, and may you arise from your enchantment, and take Christ now as your personal friend and counsellor. A conversation with him each day will make all the difference. It may be that in a few months you will one day hear a loud, piercing, trumpet sound, and then in a moment your dream will be ended, for you will see Jesus of Nazareth in the air, and will know that your days of probation are over. Is He your intimate friend or not?—Edward Clifford.

WHY NO ENEMIES?

He hadn't an enemy in the world. This is getting to be a very common expression in our obituaries. Whether this is intended as a reproach on the Redeemer, who had so many enemies, I cannot tell. Just how any man, especially a minister of the Gospel, can pass through this world of sin without incurring the hatred of bad men is a mystery to me.

Christ said to his disciples; "And ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake." Again, "I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you." James tells us that, "Whosoever therefore will be a friend of the world, is an enemy of God." David often speaks of his enemies. Faithfulness to the Master cost Stephen his life; and Paul tells us in 2d Corinthians what his faithfulness cost him, and he tells Timothy, "Yea, and all that will live Godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." Deseribing the "perilous times" that shall come in the "last days," among other things he says, "Men shall be despisers of those that are good."

Good old George Whitefield, who probably had his full share of perseeution, in a sermon from the text, "Yea, and every one that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution," says, "Hence we may easily learn why so few suffer persecution; because so few live godly in Christ Jesus."

If ministers would say with good old Micaiah, "As the Lord liveth, what the Lord saith unto me, that will I speak," evil doers would soon cry out with wicked Ahab, "I hate them." But your compromising minister, who cries "Peace, peace, when there should be no peace," escapes all this hatred; they have nothing against him, for the very good reason that he has nothing against them. And the man that leaves this world without an enemy, will in all probability appear in the next without a friend. —J. G. Mattoon.

HARD ON INGERSOLL.

Dr. McAnnally, the venerable editor of the St. Louis Christian Advocate, paints Ingersoll in true colors in the following editorial, which recently appeared in that paper:

"You attended the lecture, did you, and heard all about the 'Mistakes of Moses?' It is easy to abuse Moses, now that he is dead and cannot talk back at you. A living ass can kick a dead lion. Moses when alive, and after he was eighty years old, commanded an army of six hundred thousand men for forty years, though encumbered with all their baggage, their wives and little ones, and gained splendid victories, emancipating, organizing and giving them laws which have stood the scrutiny and test of more than thirty centuries, and which now form the basis of the government under which we of this country live. It would be interesting to hear a man such as was Moses, on the mistakes of a colonel of cavalry, whose military exploits were confined to a single engagement, in which he was worsted and taken prisoner by a boy, and when exchanged, resigned his commission and turned his attention to the 'Mistakes of Moses.' Quite interesting. 'But he overturned the Bible.' Did he, indeed? Young man, listen: We have lived a considerable while, and during life have heard of the Bible being overturned, refuted and demolished many times. Every few years somebody starts up and overturns the Bible, and it is like turning over a huge rock that has been formed into a perfect cube, turn it as you will, it is always 'right side up with care.'

"Then when we read history, beginning away back at the time of Celsus, or earlier, and trace the history of Bible overturners down to the present, we find the work of every one of them has come to naught; and judging the future by a knowledge of the past, the works of such men will always come to naught. There are more Bibles in the world to-day, read and believed in by more people, than ever before since the world was, and the number increasing more rapidly.

"It might not be amiss for objectors to be a little less open-mouthed and less positive in their observations about the Bible; if for no other reason, than that of concealing their own ignorance."

"COMING! COMING!"

There was an old turnpike man on a quiet country road, whose habit was to shut his gate at night and take his nap. One dark, wet midnight, I knocked at his door, calling, "Gate! gate!"

"Coming," said the voice of the old man.

Then I knocked again, and once more the voice replied, "Coming."

This went on for some time, till at length I grew quite angry, and, jumping off my horse, opened the door and demanded why he cried "Coming" for twenty minutes, but never came.

"Who's there?" said the old man in a quiet, sleepy voice, rubbing his eyes. "What d'ye want, sir?" Then awakening, "Bless yer, sir, and yer pardon; I was asleep. I get so used to hearing them knock that I answer 'coming' in my sleep, and take no more notice about it."

So it is with too many hearers of the Gospel, who hear by habit and answer God by habit, and at length die with their souls asleep. Awake, O sleeper; for God "hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that Man whom he hath appointed," and then your idle answers will be brought to light.

The Boston Congregationalist says truly: "Probably nothing has helped on the misuse of the Sabbath, the neglect of the house of God, and hindered the progress of the church and religious work so much as the Sunday newspaper." The Christian Advocate adds, "It is often the first step in the religious ruin of a family to let it in. Many have lost the whole life of piety by it. It means no Bible read, no religious conversation, no prayer or meditation."

BY THE STREAM.

Sweet tangled banks, where ox-eyed daisies grow
And scarlet poppies gleam;
Sweet changing lights, that ever come and go
Upon the quiet stream!

Once more I see the flash of splendid wings,
As dragon-flies flit by;
Once more for me the small sedge-warbler sings
Beneath a sapphire sky.

Once more I feel the simple, fresh content
I found in stream and soil
When golden summers slowly came and went,
And mine was all their spoil.

I find amid the honeysuckle flowers
And shy forget-me-not,
Old boyish memories of lonely hours
Passed in this silent spot.

O God of nature, how thy kindness keeps
Some changeless things on earth!
And he who roams far off, and toils and weeps,
Comes home to learn their worth.

Gay visions vanish, worldly schemes may fail,
Hope prove an idle dream,
But still the blossoms flourish, red and pale,
Beside my native stream.

REMARKABLE MEMORIES.

There was a Corsican boy who could rehearse forty thousand words, whether sense or nonsense, as they were dictated, and then repeat them in the reversed order, without making a single mistake. A physician, about sixty years ago, could repeat the whole of "Paradise Lost" without a mistake, although he had not read it for twenty years. Euler, the great mathematician, when he became blind, could repeat the whole of Virgil's "Æneid," and could remember the first line and the last line in every page of the particular edition which he had been accustomed to read before he became blind. One kind of retentive memory may be considered as the result of sheer work, a determination toward one particular achievement without reference either to cultivation or to memory on other subjects. This is frequently shown by persons in humble life in regard to the Bible. An old beggar-man at Sterling, known about fifty years ago as "Blind Alick," afforded an instance of this. He knew the whole of the Bible by heart, insomuch that if a sentence was read to him, he could name the book, chapter and verse; or, if the book, chapter and verse were named, he could give the exact words. A gentleman, to test him, repeated a verse, purposely making one verbal inaccuracy. Alick hesitated, named the place where the passage was to be found, but at the same time pointed out the verbal error. The same gentleman asked him to repeat the ninetieth verse of the seventh chapter of the book of Numbers. Alick, almost instantly replied, "There is no such verse. That chapter has only eighty-nine verses." Gassendi had acquired by heart six thousand Latin verses; and, in order to give his memory exercise, he was in the habit of daily reciting six hundred verses from different languages.—Selected.

BRAVERY.

Henry Maag was a factory boy in Cincinnati. The factory caught fire. Instead of running out to save himself, he ran up stairs to tell the girls on the fourth floor. The stairways were already filled with smoke, and in going down, after giving the alarm to the girls, he lost his way. Instead of leaving by the main floor, he went down into the cellar. Thence there was no escape. There his dead body was found the following day. It was in a kneeling posture, and his hands were clasped, as if in prayer. He was a brave boy.

A train on the Pennsylvania Railroad was running thirty or forty miles an hour. The fireman threw open the door of the furnace to throw in coal, and the flames burst out with a tremendous blaze and roar. They caught on the woodwork and enveloped the engineer. He could have jumped from the engine and saved his life. But if he had, the train would have rushed on, and the flames would have rushed back and burned the passengers. He would not desert his post. He seized the lever, reversed the engine, and stood still amid the flames until the train was stopped. The lives of all the passengers were saved, but he was so badly burned that he died in a few hours. He was a martyr to his duty. He was a brave man.

One night a fire broke out in a tenement house in New York city. A family who lived in the fourth story escaped to the street, but in the terror of the moment left the baby behind. The baby's older brother, a little boy of twelve, bravely mounted, through smoke and flame, the three flights of stairs not knowing whether he should be able to get back or not. He found the baby, caught it up in his arms, and brought it in safety down. He saved the baby, and was saved himself, but he was so badly burned that he had to be carried to the hospital to be nursed and taken care of. He was a brave boy. He was willing to suffer for the sake of his baby sister.

A little boy and girl were playing by a bonfire. The little girl was sitting before the fire when somehow her apron of cotton caught fire and began to blaze up about her. She screamed with terror. Her little brother did not scream nor run for help: he caught hold of the blazing apron and tore it off her, and threw it upon the ground and trampled the flames out. He carried the scar of the burns on his hands for many days. It took a brave boy to do that: a boy who was willing to suffer to save his sister.

At the time of the gold fever in California a man went from England to the diggings and after a while sent money for his wife and children to follow him. While on the voyage a fire broke out in the ship. With their utmost efforts the sailors could not extinguish it. The boats were got out; the strong pushed into them, the weak were left to their fate. As the last boat was moving off this mother pleaded for her boy. The sailors said there was not room for both; they would take one. The mother kissed her son, handed him over the side of the vessel, and gave him this message to deliver to his father: "Tell him," she said, "if you live to see him, that I died to save you." He escaped; she died. She was willing to die to save another. She was a brave woman.

This is the very spirit of Jesus Christ, who suffered that he might make others happy, and died that he might make others live. Be brave, boys. You cannot be like Christ unless you are brave; unless you are willing to suffer for the sake of others.

In the bivouac of life,
Be not like dumb, driven cattle;
Be a hero in the strife."

LEARN TO BE USEFUL.

Ruskin says, "It is only by labor that thought can be made healthy, and only by thought that labor can be made happy; the two cannot be safely separated." Of all true education this is the key-note. The spending of long years in study is to better fit boys and girls for the duties that await them as the men and women of their day, and to teach them whatever will give best knowledge of the realities of life and the best methods of meeting the hardships that may come to them.

A woman likes to do dainty work, and pretty things grow naturally under her fingers; and the ability to give pleasure to eye and ear is greatly prized by her; but these accomplishments, attractive as they are, will always fail to fill a life. Of real practical knowledge of every-day work they cannot take the place. A girl may have a most thorough knowledge of music, may be able to charm all friends with sweet melodies, and yet her after life may be spent miles from a piano, where she will hear her only music in the humming of bees or the lowing of cattle, but if she know of the many curious effects of her simple housekeeping, and be able to see the beauty in her wild surroundings, and understand the changes or transformations nature carries on before her, she can make home full of happiness and joy, from which go out minds that will wield an influence in the world too great for measurement and of which the end shall not be told.—Christian Secretary.

TEMPERANCE.

TOBACCO.

A BRIEF SYNOPSIS OF GEORGE W. CLARK'S LECTURE ON THE TOBACCO MANIA, AT THE WESLEYAN METHODIST CHURCH IN WHEATON.

He said that the common use of tobacco, either chewing, smoking or snuffing, was an utter perversion of manhood, irrational and unphilosophical, and no valid reason or excuse could be given to justify the fearful mania that everywhere prevails for its use.

Tobacco contains no nutriment, supplies no waste or want of the physical system. It neither antidotes disease nor aids the intellectual powers. It is no friend to moral purity nor religious spirituality and on no rational theory can its use be excused. I do not say it is good for nothing, for it is an active poison, and may be used successfully as an exterminator of flies, moths, bugs, ticks, etc., and is an infallible remedy for lice on lousy cattle, and for killing fleas on dogs. Give it its due. Doctors administer it to prostrate the forces in men and animals and it does it most effectually. So poisonous is it that one dram of nicotine is equal to the same amount of prussic acid. The smallest drop it is possible to hold on the head of a pin when placed on the nose of a mouse will throw it into paralysis and kill it in less than no time. The refuse of a quid after the juice has all been extracted, if swallowed by the habitual user of the weed, would make him sicker than the whale was when he tossed Jonah on dry land. It contains the very breath of disease, and produces blindness, deafness, rheumatism, idiocy, apoplexy, paralysis and a thousand other ills. Cases of violent death from tobacco paralysis are becoming alarmingly frequent, and a large per cent of the sudden and awful deaths now occurring are attributable either directly or indirectly to the use of tobacco. Cancers on the lips and mouth are becoming more frequent every day from smoking, and terrible deaths the result: as Senator Hill and General Grant. The speaker himself had known many fatal cases of tobacco cancer and tobacco paralysis, and warned young men and boys against the vile and dangerous vice.

Many a poor sickly woman who is supposed to be dying of consumption is in reality pining away from the effects of inhaling her sweet husband's tobacco breath. Tobacco throws off two of the most deadly gases known, viz: carbonic oxide and carbonic acid gas, and few husbands and fathers realize how they are endangering the health and lives of their children and wives by filling their homes, their offices and stores with this vile smoke. Men on the street go puffing it into the face of the lady with whom they are riding or walking. What would they think of a lady who would be guilty of such a breach of manners?

Another evidence that it is not fit to use is that it makes every one deathly sick when they first begin using it. The speaker referred to his own experience and thanked God that he had been led to stop its use before it had become a confirmed habit. It creates a thirst for strong drink by exhausting the saliva which was placed in the mouth to assist digestion. Not every one who uses tobacco becomes addicted to strong drink, but many of them do. It is acknowledged that not many of our women die suddenly and not many of them use tobacco. The southern women have a most disgusting habit of "dipping," and one house in New York manufactures one hundred barrels of the strongest kind of Scotch snuff a month especially for this southern trade; but as a rule women do not use tobacco in any form. Why should our animal economy which naturally revolts at the use of it be subject to such violations. Man has no right to entail on his offspring the evil effects consequent on its use. We should never forget that inexorable law which says that the iniquity of the father shall be visited upon the children of the third and fourth generation. It brings young men and boys into bad company. Smoking, drinking, rowdyism, and crime are inseparable. Take a drink and take a cigar are synonymous terms. The wooden Indian with his handful of wooden cigars, and the bloated Bacchus grinning over his favorite glass go hand in hand and stand side by side on every business street. You seldom find a man who argues that the use of tobacco does any good. Nicotine feeds disease instead of healing it. It reduces its dupes to the most abject slavery. Alcohol victims are not more firmly bound. Many is the man who has endeavored to break off the habit and found it impossible. The speaker advised the boys to let it alone, and remarked that it was not necessary to caution the girls which showed that he was not as well posted about the girls as he was fifty years ago, for it is a fact that too many of the girls of to-day know the taste of cigarettes. The more's the shame, and the more's the pity, if 'tis true!

Mr. Clark closed by appealing to the young, and urging parents, ministers and teachers to expose and warn the people of this great and wide-spread evil.

VICTIMS OF DRINK.

William Drummond, an old gray-haired man, through whose rags and dirt might be traced an air of semi-respectability, stood before Justice Foote yesterday charged with stealing papers and letters from the lamp-post mail boxes for the stamps. Drummond is of a good family, learned, able—but a drunkard. He was not so long ago Chief Justice of the Territory of Utah. He graduated from one of the eastern law colleges early in life, and made a successful lawyer; later he graduated from the bar as a chronic whisky drinker, and when in luck, is no slouch at that either. Justice Foote sent him to the Bridewell on a $5 fine.—Chicago Daily Paper.

W. P. Potter, who gained some notoriety lately through causing the arrest of J. C. Calvert and who afterward refused to prosecute, was in custody himself yesterday. Potter's love for strong drink has been of the strongest character, and lately he has been doing his utmost to drink himself to death. His wife said they had been married fourteen years and had lived quite happily until a short time ago, when he drove her from the house and when she returned abused her. She wanted her husband sent to the Washingtonian Home, and Justice White fined Potter $30 and costs, the same to be served out in the drunkard's refuge.—Chicago Daily.

Sir W. Gull lately testified to a surprising case before the committee of the House of Lords on intemperance. A large, bloated man, who was suffering from difficulty of breathing and great distention of the venous system, died at Guy's Hospital. At the post mortem of the following day there was no sign of decomposition, and the body was believed to be distended with gas. "When punctures were made into the skin," said sir William, "and a lighed match applied, the gas which escaped burned with the ordinary flame of carburetted hydrogen. As many as a dozen of these small flames were burning at the same time.

There is no exaggeration when we say that throughout the United States 6,000,000 persons frequent saloons and indulge immoderately in all alcoholic drinks.

If intemperance should break out among horses and cattle, there would be an extra session of Congress called in less than three weeks to stay the evil. But, pshaw! it's only men that get drunk.—Golden Era.

Barnum once said he would give the highest prize he had ever paid for a curiosity, to see a drinking man who was ultimately successful in business. I think he might offer a like prize for a rum-seller's family "who turned out well."—Selected.

Among the regulations of a newly-formed church among the Zulus in South Africa was the following: "No member of this church shall be permitted to drink the white man's grog, or native beer, nor touch it with his lips."

The Philadelphia, Pa., liquor dealers are well organized, and propose to keep a record of every congressman, legislator, councilman, and judge, who favors laws or acts that affect their business unfavorably, and to seek to defeat the re-election of such individuals by all honorable means.

As a result of shutting up the drinking-places in Ireland on Sunday, there has been in the last five years a decrease of $27,500,000 spent for intoxicating liquors.

LITERATURE.

The Religions of the Ancient World, including Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia, Persia, India, Phœnicia, Etruria, Greece and Rome, by George Rawlinson. pp 180. Price 60 cents. John B. Alden, New York.

This is not the first American edition of this work, thongh none have appeared in so compact or popular a binding. In so brief a work the learned author makes no attempt at a critical or extended analysis or comparison of ancient religious systems. He says in brief that in his judgment the time is not yet come for the construction of a "Science of Religion," and so comprises in this work a collection of materials, facts, which may hereafter be used in a more extended treatise. We can only regret that this labor was not partially included at least. The conclusions of the author respecting the isolation of the Christian Scriptures and religion from those of the heathen surrounding the Hebrew tribes are of great interest: also the fact that the farther we trace these gentile systems to their origin we find them assimilating to the simple worship of one God begun by the progenitors of the race after they left Eden.

Footprints of Temperance Pioneers. Compiled by J. N. Stearns. 108 pages: paper. Price 25 cts. National Temperance Society, New York.

This valuable compilation is prepared in honor of the temperance centennial year, 1885, and very properly gives ample space to Dr. Benjamin Rush of Philadelphia, the pioneer. His entire essay on "The Effects of Ardent Spirits on the Human Body and Mind" is printed. Sketches from their writings in favor of temperance is given from some forty eminent divines, statesmen, and physicians. Such names as Lyman Beecher, Moses Stuart, Dr. Mussey, Dr. Jewett, Lebbeus Armstrong, Geo. B. Cheever, Francis Wayland, Albert Barnes, etc., add character to the volume.

"Facts and Arguments on the Tobacco Question" by Rev. J. T. Hobson of Medora, Ind., though not a remarkable, yet is a useful and practical addition to the literature of the anti-tobacco reform, and will be, perhaps, more valuable in the hands of many tobacco-users than an argument which could be understood only by a scientist or a scholar. The pamphlet will be mailed for 15 cents.

Third Party Prohibition and Policy Temperance Voting by Rev. O. M. Owen, Rochester, N. Y. While Bro. Owen's argument has special reference to his Free Methodist brethren, it is valuable reading for every Christian voter, thousands of whom would be profited by reading. Send 15 cents for a copy to the author.

Alden's Cyclopedia of Universal Literature. Part I. Abbot to Alcott. Paper bound; 160 pages. Price 15 cents. John B. Alden, New York.

The enterprising publisher for the people has begun in a most unpretentious way a work that will prove to be deservedly popular. It is designed to be not only a useful work of reference but a selection of entertaining reading also, and its scope is wider than any similar work of which we are acquainted, namely, "to present in a convenient form and at a very moderate cost, a complete survey of the written literature of all ages and of all peoples." The parts can be exchanged for bound volumes.

The English Illustrated Magazine for August is an entertaining number. Its illustrated papers are "The Crofters," those Highlanders of Scotland for whose trials from landlordism the sympathies of republicans have everywhere been drawn out; "A Pilgrim of the Thames" with historical allusion to portions of the famous valley; and a continuation of the illustrated poem, "The Sirens Three." It reveals much of the crushing poverty of the Crofters to observe that in the sketches of laborers upon the land only women are engaged.

"The Literary Magazine for August numbers among the authors: Manrice Thompson, Arthur and William T. Arnold, The Marquis of Lorne, Alfred H. Guernsey, Senator John Sherman, etc. "James Russell Lowell," "The Queen and her Family," "Socialism and Atheism," "On the Origin of the Higher Animals," "British Armies in India," "William E. Gladstone," and "John Ruskin and his Works" are among the titles that promise a rich reward to the reader.

The Book of Knowledge and Gems of Song and Story are among the attractive magazines for yonng readers issned by John B. Alden of New York. These with the Story-Book are issued monthly at the very nominal price of 25 cents per year.

"The Holy Catholic" church is one thing. Popery, which was five and a half centuries later, is another. Jesuitism, which now runs the church, being a thousand years later than Popery, is another still.

THE CHURCHES.

—Pres. J. Blanchard preached in the College Chapel, Wheaton, on Sabbath morning. The service was in part a memorial of Bro. E. B. Thompson late of Highmore, Dakota, who was for some thirty years a member of the College church.

—D. L. Moody, the evangelist, has been seriously ill at Newport, R. I., and has not yet recovered.

—The revival at Milledgeville, Ga., continues, and the various churches are being blessed by numerous accessions.

—It is announced that 1,000 new members have united with the Methodist churches at Chicago, Ill., during the last three months.

—Rev. H. W. Eklund, the popular pastor of the First Swedish Methodist church of this city, has been transferred to Stockholm, Sweden, and made pastor of the St. Paul's church in that city. He sails from New York Aug. 16.

—A Swedish translation of the Gospel of John is the first book printed in the language of the Congo. It was translated by the Swedish missionary Vestlind, who has labored for many years in Equatorial Africa.

—Rev. Henry Cogswell preached for the Tonica, Ill., church on the Sabbath, Rev. Mr. Wise, the pastor of that church for some two or three years, having removed to Huntley, Ill.

—By order of Bishop Kephart, of the United Brethren church, Rev. W. S. Spooner is appointed presiding elder of that part of Dakota Conference lying in Dakota, and attached to Elkhorn Conference.

—Bro. Alexander Thomson of the N. C. A. Board, addressed the Y. M. C. A. at Elgin, Ill., on Sabbath July 26, and made some useful and pointed comparisons of the lodges of to-day, the so-called "handmaids" of religion, with old Jezebel and her work in which the Sabbath-schools are now receiving instruction. Bro. Thomson preached in Bartlett last Sabbath.

—Rev. R. G. Wallace of Bellaire, Ohio, who was mentioned in last Cynosure as the author of the Wheeling memorial on the lodge to the United Presbyterian General Assembly, has just met with a terrible loss. A dispatch from Bellaire, July 20th, says that on the evening of that day "some boys started ont in a skiff from the Ohio shore to eross the river to the Riverside Steel works. Two men, Messrs. Hackett and Hughes, started after them to get the skiff. When about the middle of the river Jimmie Wallace, aged fourteen, jumped out. He began to sink, when his brother George, a boy of sixteen, jumped in after him. A death struggle ensned in which both boys were drowned. They were the only two sons of Rev. R. G. Wallace, the United Presbyterian preacher of this city, who is well known in Pittsburg and vicinity. The parents are about distracted." The bodies were not found at dark, but the search continuing, both were recovered next day. Mrs. Wallace, who was in poor health, is completely prostrated by the blow.

—A committee of prominent United Brethren lately issued the following call for a convention to meet during the present week: "At the request of many persons in the church of the United Brethren in Christ, both ministers and laymen, we hereby make a call for a constitutional convention, to be held at Hartsville, Bartholomew county, Indiana, Augnst 4th, 1885, 2 o'clock, P. M., to continue two days. The object of this meeting is to devise ways and means to maintain our confession of faith and our church constitution inviolate. To this convention all ministers and laymen in the church who are opposed to the church commission are cordially invited. All delegates to the General Conference who opposed the commission are expected to be present if possible. Let us come together, dear brethren, in the spirit of the Master."

—The out-door meetings which are held in Pittsburg and Allegheny City have thus far, says the United Presbyterian, been encouraging, both as to the number and character of those who attend them. The "Gospel Songs" are generally used in meetings where our pastors take part, a number of selections being printed on sheets, which are distributed among those present. The ministers of the cities are very largely taking part in conducting the meetings.

—The Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, son of the London preacher, is pastor of a flourishing Baptist congregation in Aukland. The last number of the News of that city contains the account of the opening of a new tabernacle capable of seating 2,000 persons.

—The conferences which have been held in Scotland by the Scottish Presbyterian Union Association, consisting of members of the three large Presbyterian churches in the country, have resulted in no practical suggestions, and the conferences are to be closed. The great obstacle is the prominence of the question of disestablishment, upon which the churches are divided, and which tends to separation rather than to union—the time for which has evidently not yet come.

—April 19th, 1859, a society to aid Evangelical Lutheran congregations in Russia, was organized, with headquarters at St. Petersburg. Within a little over twenty years this society has received and disbursed over $700,000. From its treasury 219 pastors have been assisted; 72 churches, 26 prayer-houses, and 54 school and prayer-houses have been erected. It also aids 108 parochial school teachers.

—The Presbyterian church has twelve physicians in China. Dr. Kerr has practiced thirty years in Canton. In 1883, he with his two assistants, treated 16,000 persons, and performed 2,000 operations.

—An American medical missionary, Dr. Allen, who settled some time ago in Seoul, the capital of the Corea, has commended his cause to the authorities so much by his skillful treatment of numerous officials who were wounded in the recent insurrection, he himself remaining at his post when all other foreigners had removed out of danger, that the government is now going to establish a hospital for him.

—The Chinaman in America is being more and more cared for. According to the New York Tribune, "twenty-two Chinese missions have been established in New York city and Brooklyn since 1878, and are in a flonrishing condition. What is more, a large proportion of the converts 'stick.'"

—Attention has been drawn of late to the peculiar work for Christ done in India by a famous fakir, named Gulab Shah, and his band of followers. Long reported a holy man, eleven years ago, he was converted and baptized by a missionary, and gradually won over his disciples. Since then, they have retained their hermit life in a cave at the foot of the Himalaya mountains, though making frequent expeditions to evangelize their countrymen. It is said they are sought out by thousands of Sikhs, and that their influence is very great.

BAPTIZED FOR SERVICE.

Two weeks since we reprinted from the Independent a brief account of the wonderful work of grace attending the very earliest labors of the devoted yonng missionaries from England, among whom were several students from Cambridge University, converted during Mr. Moody's last visit there. Another account says:

"These letters show that they began their missionary labors on shipboard, and that their whole journey was marked with the same earnest consecration that was so conspicuous from the beginning of their Christian life at Cambridge.

"On the streamer from Suez their labors were continuous and followed by most encouraging results. Holding Bible-readings every day and singing-meetings every evening on deck, with short addresses, at which the first-class passengers and officers of the ship would gather listening attentively, with special meetings and conversations among the second class passengers, their influence pervaded the vessel. The captain of an Indian steamer, who was a passenger, and who was notorious for his swearing, drunkenness, blasphemy, and atheism, through their fidelity was led to trust in Jesus and to testify thankfully and boldly of the new peace and joy he experieneed. Several of the stewards and crew and all the seeond-class passengers were converted, and backsliders were restored.

"At Colombo, Penang, Singapore, and Hong-Kong, where they landed, they held meetings, at which great good was done, and on terminating their jonrney at Shanghai they held a series of meetings for the English residents, at which the interest increased daily. One notable result was the conversion of the British chaplain in charge of the cathedral, who publicly confessed that for the first time he had committed his soul to the Saviour's care, and had a calm certainty that he was saved by the grace of God.

"Snch was the preparation for their work of these yonng men of great intellectual promise and social position, who have devoted themselves to the work of bringing the heathen to Christ, and in whom is centered the interest of many who were cheered to hear of their conversion, and who will follow their missionary labors with hope and prayer."

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

The Improved Order of Red Men which lately held its Great Council at Desmoines, Iowa, had for its officers a Great Sachem, Great Senior Sagamore, Great Prophet, Great Chief of Records, Great Keeper of Wampum, Great Saunap, Great Mishinewa, Great Guard of the Wigwam, and Great Guard of the Forest.

Among those who have acted as Grand Orators for the Grand Lodge of Iowa are eleven professional clergymen. Rob Morris acted three times in that capacity and Cornelius Moore twice. Gov. B. R. Sherman was the lodge spouter in 1876 and Hon. John A. Kasson in 1869.

—There are 457 Masonic lodges in Iowa enrolled, but 46 are extinct. The initiations numbered 712 last year, and 695 members took their demits.

THE BEREA EVANGELIST

AIMS TO ADVOCATE

CHRISTIANITY,

AND TO

Help Break Down Everything that Hinders Its Spread.

IT TEACHES that men need to be converted to a person—the personal Christ—and not simply to a system of truth; and that there must be implanted in them a divine life, as well as a correct belief.

THE EVANGELIST seeks to show that the DIVISION OF CHRISTIANS into parties—denominations—sects—is a great wrong, and a very serious obstacle to the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom, and it seeks to show Christians and Christian churches how they may be ONE IN CHRIST, in the "Apostle's fellowship," and to persuade and help them thus to unite.

THE EVANGELIST also opposes INTEMPERANCE, SECRET SOCIETIES, all WORLDLINESS, and the spirit of CASTE, and aims to "war a good warfare" against all wrong.

In thus opposing evil the EVANGELIST carefully endeavors to avoid harsh speaking, believing that it is as much duty to speak truth kindly as it is to speak it at all.

"THE AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST," and a new Portrait of GENERAL GRANT.

The American Agriculturist has just issued a magnificent stipple-style line portrait of General Grant, executed by one of the very first artists of the country. The great warrior is sitting in an easy chair in his now famous library; the expression on his countenance is exceedingly life-like, and the whole picture is grand and striking in appearance, far surpassing any previous likeness of the General. Its great merit is due to the fact that it is from General Grant's last sitting; that is, it presents him as a picture of health as he was just before his present and probably fatal malady overtook him. Other portraits, while presenting him in health, do not show his features and general appearance at a late period.

The regular price of the American Agriculturist is $1.50 per year. We have made arrangements with the publishers whereby we are enabled to send, post-free, in a tube specially made for the purpose, this portrait of General Grant, the American Agriculturist from now until the end of the year (eight months) and the Cynosure for the same time, all for the sum of $2.20.

The portrait alone sells for $1 in New York, we are reliably informed; no copies have been disposed of at less than that figure.

HOLDEN WITH CORDS,

OR THE POWER OF THE SECRET EMPIRE. A faithful representation in story of the evil influence of Freemasonry, by E. E. FLAGG, author of "Little People," "A Sunny Life," etc. This is a thrillingly interesting story, accurately true to life because mainly a narration of historical facts. 384 pages. In cloth, $1; per doz., $9. Paper, 50c; per doz., $4.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"There is no important history extant but has connected with it numerous other histories of which it was the initial point, or the dominating influence. The abduction and murder of Morgan set ten thousand secret springs in motion, as the surrender of the charters of so many lodges at that time, and the severing of their connection with the order of some forty thousand of its members indicated. This story is one of these histories, and is a collection of facts woven into a story. It cannot fail to be read with interest."—Free Methodist, Chicago.

"The republication of the Reform Story which run through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these make a helpful addition for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind."—Christian Cynosure.

"It is one of the most fascinating narratives we ever read and teaches its lesson in a manner not soon to be forgotten. It is evidently written for the heart and its words go to the heart. It is singularly free from wild denunciation. Those who are interested in the secret society question would do well to form the acquaintance of this interesting work."—Lutheran Standard, Columbus, O.

"The exciting scenes of the fall of 1826, at Batavia, N. Y., when Wm. Morgan was murdered by Masonry, are woven into the story so as to give the truth of History a setting of attractiveness. The forty chapters of the volume are soon compassed by the eager reader who begins the volume. This volume ought to be read and will be sought as its merits become known."—United Brethren in Christ.

"The story is intensely interesting and the author has succeeded in weaving into it a great deal of information in regard to this mysterious order, which is certainly startling if true, and he gives what seems to be undoubted evidence to prove his assertions. The book is one which should be read by both Masons and Antimasons."—Wayne Co. Herald.

"In an incidental way the story tells much about the manner of conducting lodges and much about the spirit and methods of Masonry. The story covers the period of the abduction and murdering of William Morgan. The strategic position from which the author writes put a charm in the book, while it gives a good opportunity to show the workings of the order. We wish all the people would read it."—Telescope.

FARM NOTES.

THE CHECK-REIN.

The check-rein is in nearly every case painful to the animal and useless to the driver. Because it fastens the head in an unnatural posture, and as the horse's shoulder and head fall together, cannot be of any real support in stumbling.

When from some defect in the animal the check-rein is used it must be slackened. Because in addition to the easier position of the neck, a greater portion of weight can be thrown into the collar, especially going up hill, thus saving a great expenditure of muscular power.

There is an important difference between a tight check-rein and a tightened rein, although not generally understood. The first is injurious, and cannot help the horse, while the latter is often useful. Because the latter is a steady support to the animal's head from a distinct and intelligent source—the driver; whereas the former is only the horse's head fastened to his own shoulders. That the check-rein is inconsistent with the action of the horse's head is clearly shown by the fact that when the horse falls it is always broken.

In contrast with the check-rein is the natural position of a horse's neck. Here nature's arching neck and curving lines are easily discovered and worthy of admiration. Why an intelligent animal like the horse should be disfigured, tortured and permanently injured, by the the use of an institution closely allied with ignorance is one of those conundrums that is continually forcing itself upon humanity, and one that is rarely answered in a common-sense way.

IRON IN TREES.

Has oride of iron, or iron itself, an invigorating effect when applied to the wood of decrepit trees? This question is now being discussed by the rural papers in the State of New York. Two years ago, on a farm near Clyde, N. Y., several large rusty iron spikes were for some purpose driven into a very old, partially decayed apple-tree, that for years had been almost entirely barren, and that seemed to be fast exhausting what remained of its vitality. The spikes were left in the trunk and the result was that last year it bore a magnificent crop of fine, large apples, and this year gives promise of a repetition of the marvel. The owner believes the rusty spikes restored it to youthful vigor and fecundity. Of course he is experimenting on all the old apple-trees in his orchard.—The Critic.

Nest Eggs.—The bad eggs often left in nests for nest-eggs are wholly unfit for this purpose. The shell of the egg is so porous that bad odors from one rotten specimen speedily affect all the good ones. This is especially true in warm weather or when artificial heat is applied in setting. If eggs are looked over at the close of the first week those that will prove bad may be easily distinguished and removed, to the great advantage of the hen and the eggs remaining.

Cucumbers.—These are not objectionable to healthy stomachs, nor to most invalids, if eaten fresh as part of the meal. If kept any time they should be placed in the refrigerator or in cold water.

Cost of Cabbage.—Joseph Harris says that the entire cost of cabbage planting, cultivating, harvesting, storing and marketing, need not be over one cent a head.

Melons and Grass.—Melons do not tolerate grass and weeds in their patches. If you let the grass and weeds grow the melons will not. Take your choice.

Those who use lime as a fertilizer apply from 10 to 50 bushels per acre; ashes may be applied at the same rate, salt at the rate of 200 to 400 pounds, and plaster at the rate of 100 pounds.

Don't overfeed the hogs and let them eat sour feed or feed left over, but give them three times a day all they can eat and relish. Add to the corn diet, turnips, pumpkins, potatoes, apples, etc., as a relish. It will help them to eat and digest more corn.

The successful farmer is the reading one in nine cases out of ten. It is only by reading that one can keep up with the times in which we live. It has been aptly said that an agricultural community without books and papers relating to farming is like a ship at sea without rudder or compass.

The Coming Conflict.

A NEW AND STRANGE STORY BASED ON STARTLING FACTS, VIVIDLY PORTRAYING A MYSTERIOUS AND DANGEROUS POWER AT WORK IN THE GOVERNMENT, THE CHURCH, AND THE HOME.

"All will agree that this is a powerfully written story."—Evangelist, (Chicago, Ills.)

"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D. D. in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia.)

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

"The book will create a sensation in Masonic circles, and evoke criticism of a most relentless character. The courage of the author in attacking such a rock-rooted bulwark as Freemasonry is something to admire, Fanatic though he be."—Nebraska Watchman.

"Light is needed on this subject and needed badly, and we welcome this contribution to the literature of anti-secretism, and cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers."—United Presbyterian, (Pittsburgh.)

"A charming work, fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin;' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the book, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.'"—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ills.)

WEBSTER'S PRACTICAL A NEW DEPARTURE IN DICTIONARIES.

An Industrial Revolution.—In a large Connecticut manufacturing establishment there is in operation a new style of furnace which produces more steam-power from a consumption of 1,000 lbs of coal than can be generated from 20,000 lbs burned in the ordinary way. In other words, the new contrivance already saves nineteen-twentieths of the fuel, and it is believed that before being publicly announced it will be so improved that the saving will reach 49 fiftieths! The facts already developed are simply incredible to one who has not actually seen them verified.

A Remarkable Coincidence.—While the new Furnace was in process of construction, the editors and publishers of Webster's Unabridged were engaged upon their new work which is as great an improvement upon all previous Dictionary productions, and just as valuable in its way as is the incredible fuel economizer above alluded to. Webster's Practical is not only a new compilation by the leading Dictionary House of the world, but it embodies several new features which, for ordinary use, render it pre-eminent among dictionaries—not excepting even the Unabridged.

1st, Condensation—By grouping all derivative and compound words under their root or leader (as in the "Book" example quoted below), such words are adequately treated in one-third of the space required by the old arrangement. By this means nearly all the desirable material of the four and five-dollar dictionaries is presented in a convenient and handy form in Webster's Practical.

2d, Association.—We comprehend as well as remember things chiefly by their associations. For this reason any one who shall carefully read the "Book" paragraph which we reproduce from Webster's Practical Dictionary, will not only comprehend it more readily, but will be able to remember two or three times as much as would be gained by reading about the same words when treated separately as in other works.

3d, Ready Reference.—Not only do we comprehend and remember more readily by the new grouping method, but we do it in less than a fourth of the time required when the words are classified in the old way. Hence, no one who values time would hesitate to pay one dollar for Webster's Practical rather than accept the best of the older dictionaries as a gift.

4th, Derivative Terminations.—Only the larger dictionaries hitherto published give the derivative terminations. The New American Dictionary, for instance, does not give any of the four variations of so common a word as forbear, while they are all given in Webster's Practical.

5th, The Illustrations in Webster's Practical are more numerous and better executed than those of any other abridged or low-priced dictionary.

6th, Prefixes and Suffixes.—Another important feature of Webster's Practical is its peculiar treatment of prefixes and suffixes, which is believed to be more desirable than a separate department of two or three hundred pages which is sometimes allotted to them.

7th, Compendium Matter.—Still another invaluable feature of Webster's Practical is its compendium matter, over one hundred pages of which is devoted to the most complete Pronouncing Vocabulary ever compiled of Biblical, Classical, Mythological, Historical and Geographical Proper names. With Webster's Practical Dictionary at hand, one need not be at a loss to correctly pronounce or spell the most difficult words.

8th, An Invaluable Book.—The importance of supplying every child with Webster's Practical for his very own, is not generally appreciated. As an educator it is worth a hundred times its price, and a little self-denial to provide one or more copies in every family will prove a better economy than an endowment of hoarded bank-stocks later on in life.

The following paragraph is reproduced from Webster's Practical.

Book, bŏŏk, n. A collection of sheets of paper, etc., bound together; a literary composition, written or printed; a subdivision of a literary work. (Mer.) A volume in which accounts are kept. — v. t. [BOOKED (bŏŏkt), BOOKING.] To enter, or register in a book. — -Book'ish, a. Given to reading; more acquainted with books than with men. — Book'-bind'er, n. One who binds books. — -bind'ery, n. A place for binding, etc. — -bind'ing, n. Art or practice of, etc. — -case, n. A case with shelves for holding books. (Bind.) A book-cover. — -cov'er, n. (Bind.) A case for a book; a cover of cloth or other material prepared for casing a book. — -keep'er, n. One who keeps accounts. — -keep'ing, n. Art of recording mercantile transactions and keeping accounts. — -learned, -lĕrnd, a. Versed in books; ignorant of life. — -learn'ing, n. Learning acquired by reading,—esp. as opp. to practical knowledge. — -mak'er, n. One who writes and publishes books; a compiler; a sporting man who makes a record of bets. — -mak'ing, n. The practice of, etc.; compilation; systematized betting. — -mark, n. Something placed in a book by which to find a particular place. — -plate, n. A label indicating ownership, place in a library, etc., usually on the inside of the cover of a book. — -post, n. The post-office arrangement by which books are mailed. — -sell'er, n. One who sells books. — -shelf, n. A shelf to hold books. — -shop, -stall, -store, n. A place for selling books. — -stand, n. A stand for selling books in the streets; book-stall; a support to hold books. — -worm, n. A worm or mite that eats holes in books; one excessively addicted to study.

THE QUANTITY TEST.

Webster's Practical Dictionary, ($1) 600,000 Words and 1,400 Illustrations.
New American Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Popular Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Standard Dictionary, ($1) 210,000 Words and 612 Illustrations.

Quality Test.—Aside from all advantages above alluded to, there is still another and very important feature of the new work to be considered, viz.: its quality as compared with the cheap dictionaries which have had the largest sales, and which have been compiled chiefly from the old editions of Webster on which the copyrights have expired. Hence Webster's Practical contains more matter than any other dollar dictionary. Its quality, to say the least, is the very best, while its arrangement and all other new and desirable features, including first-class illustrations, paper, printing and binding are added without extra charge.

A Subscription Book.—As Webster's Practical is not for sale at book-stores, our readers will be able to procure it only from canvassing agents, unless it be ordered in connection with this journal in accordance with our special offers.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Ohioago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

Thurlow Weed's Great Letter

On the abduction and murder of WILLIAM MORGAN in 1826, which has been the most widely published of any Anti-masonic document. The dedication of a noble granite monument to the memory of Morgan, and the able and eloquent addresses of the Convention make this a most valuable pamphlet.

SEE WHY.

It contains—
1. Portrait of Morgan.
2. Portrait of Thurlow Weed.
3. Fine picture of the Monument.
4. The great letter of Thurlow Weed and his affidavit—almost the last public act of his life.
5. Address by J. E. Roy, D.D.
6. The monument oration by Pres. C. A. Blanchard.
7. Addresses on "Christian Politics" by Pres. J. Blanchard, on the Character of Freemasonry by Prof. E. D. Bailey, on the "Freedmen and Secret Societies" by Rev. H. H. Hinman; and very interesting personal and historical reminiscences.

Ex-President John Quincy Adams' Letters on the Nature of Masonic Oaths, Obligations and Penalties. Thirty most interesting, able and convincing letters on the above general subject, written by this renowned statesman to different public men of the United States during the years 1831 to 1833. With Mr. Adams' address to the people of Massachusetts upon political aspects of lodgery; an Appendix giving obligations of Masonry, and an able Introduction. This is one of the most telling anti-secrecy works extant, aside from the Expositions. Price, cloth, $1.00; per dozen, $9.00. Paper. 35 cents; per dozen, $3.50.

General Washington Opposed to Secret Societies. This is a republication of Governor Joseph Ritner's "Vindication of General Washington from the Stigma of Adherence to Secret Societies," communicated to the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, March 8th, 1837, at their special request. To this is added the fact that three high Masons were the only persons who opposed a vote of thanks to Washington on his retirement to private life—undoubtedly because they considered him a seceding Freemason. 10 cents each; per dozen, 75 cents.

College Secret Societies. Their customs, character, and the efforts for their suppression. By H. L. Kellogg. Containing the opinion of many prominent college presidents, and others, and a full account of the murder of Mortimer Leggett. 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

History of the Abduction and Murder of Capt. Wm. Morgan. As prepared by seven committees of citizens, appointed to ascertain the fate of Morgan. This book contains indisputable, legal evidence that Freemasons abducted and murdered Wm. Morgan, for no other offense than the revelation of Masonry. It contains the sworn testimony of over twenty persons, including Morgan's wife; and no candid person, after reading this book, can doubt that many of the most respectable Freemasons in the Empire State were concerned in this crime. 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Reminiscences of Morgan Times. By Elder David Bernard, author of Bernard's Light on Masonry. This is a thrilling narrative of the incidents connected with Bernard's Revelation of Freemasonry. 10 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

Freemasonry Exposed. By Capt. William Morgan. The genuine old Morgan book republished, with engravings showing the lodge-room, dress of candidates, signs, due guards, grips, etc. This revelation was so accurate that Freemasons murdered the author for writing it. 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

ON FREEMASONRY.

Light on Freemasonry. By Elder D. Bernard. To which is appended "A Revelation of the Mysteries of Oddfellowship (old work,) by a Member of the Craft." The whole containing over five hundred pages, lately revised and republished. In cloth, $1.50 each; per dozen, $14.50. The first part of the above work, Light on Freemasonry, 416 pages, 75 cents each; per dozen $7.50.

Hand-Book of Freemasonry, by F. Ronayne, Past Master of Keystone Lodge, No. 639, Chicago, gives the correct or "standard" work and ritual of Masonry; the proper position of each officer in the lodge room, order of opening and closing the lodge, dress of candidate, ceremony of initiation, the proper manner of giving the signs, grips, etc., are fully illustrated and explained. First three degrees. Paper cover, 35 cents.

The Master's Carpet, or Masonry and Baal Worship Identical, explains the true source and meaning of every ceremony and symbol of the lodge, and proves that Modern Masonry is identical with the "Ancient Mysteries" of Paganism. Bound in fine cloth, 420 pp.....75 cts.

Freemasonry at a Glance illustrates every sign, grip and ceremony of the first three degrees. Paper cover, 32 pages. Single copy, six cents.

Freemasonry Illustrated. A complete exposition of the seven degrees of the Blue Lodge and Chapter. Profusely illustrated. A historical sketch of the institution and a critical analysis of the character of each degree, by Prest. J. Blanchard, of Wheaton College. Monitorial quotations and nearly four hundred notes from standard Masonic authorities confirm the truthfulness of this exposition and show the character of Masonic teaching and doctrine. The accuracy of this exposition legally attested by J. O. Doesburg, Past Master Unity ☐ No. 191, Holland, Mich., and others. This is the latest, most accurate and complete exposition of Blue Lodge and Chapter Masonry. Over one hundred illustrations—several of them full page—give a pictorial representation of the lodge-room, chapter and principal ceremonies of the degrees, with the dress of candidates, signs, grips, etc. Complete work of 640 pages, in cloth, $1 00 per dozen, $9.00. Paper covers, 75 cents; per dozen, $7.50. First three degrees (376 puges), in cloth, 75 cents; per dozen, $7.50. Paper cover, 40 cents; per dozen, $4.00. ☞The Masonic quotations are worth the price of this book.

Mah-Hah-Bone; comprises the Hand Book, Master's Carpet and Freemasonry at a Glance. Bound in one volume. This makes one of the most complete books of information on the workings and symbolism of Freemasonry extant. Well bound in cloth, 589 pp.....$1.00

Adoptive Masonry Illustrated. A full and complete illustrated ritual of the five degrees of Female Free Masonry, by Thomas Lowe; comprising the degree of Jephtha's Daughter, Ruth, Esther, Martha and Electa, and known as the Daughter's Degree, Widow's Degree, Wife's Degree, Sister's Degree and the Benevolent Degree. 20 cents each; per dozen, $1.75.

Knight Templarism Illustrated. A full illustrated ritual of the six degrees of the Council and Commandery, comprising the degrees of Royal Master, Select Master, Super-Excellent Master, Knight of the Red Cross, Knight Templar and Knight of Malta. A book of 341 pages. In cloth, $1.00; $8.50 per dozen. Paper covers, 50cts; $4.00 per dozen.

Grand Lodge Masonry. Its relation to civil government and the Christian religion. By Prest. J. Blanchard, at the Monmouth Convention. The un-Christian, anti-republican and despotic character of Freemasonry is proved from the highest Masonic authorities. 5 cents each; per dozen. 50 cents.

Judge Whitney's Defense before the Grand Lodge of Illinois. Judge Daniel H Whitney was Master of the lodge when S. L Keith, a member of his lodge, murdered Ellen Slade. Judge Whitney, by attempting to bring Keith to justice, brought on himself the vengeance of the lodge, but he boldly replied to the charges against him, and afterwards renounced Masonry 15 cents each; per dozen. $1.25

Oaths and Penalties of Freemasonry, as proved in court in the New Berlin Trial. Also the letter of Hon. Richard Rush to the anti-Masonic committee of York County, Pa., May 4th, 1831. The New Berlin trials began in the attempt of Freemasons to prevent public initiations by seceding Masons. These trials were held at New Berlin, Chenango Co., N. Y., April 13 and 14th, 1831, and General Augustus C. Welsh, sheriff of the county, and other adhering Freemasons, swore to the truthful revelation of the oaths and penalties. 10 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

Stearns' Inquiry into the Nature and Tendency of Freemasonry. With an Appendix treating on the truth of Morgan's Exposition and containing remarks on various points in the character of Masonry, and a Dialogue on the necessity of exposing the lodge. 338 pages: cloth, 60 cents each per dozen, $5.00. Paper covers, 40 cents each; per dozen, $4.00.

Masonic Oaths Null and Void; or, Freemasonry Self-Convicted. This is a book for the times. The design of the author is to refute the arguments of those who claim that the oaths of Freemasonry are binding upon those who take them. His arguments are conclusive, and the forcible manner in which they are put, being drawn from Scripture, makes them convincing. The minister or lecturer will find in this work a rich fund of arguments. 207 pp., postpaid.....40 cts.

Bernard's Appendix to Light on Masonry. Showing the character of the institution by its terrible oaths and penalties. Paper covers: 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Freemasonry Self-Condemned. By Rev J. W. Bain. A careful and logical statement of reasons why secret orders should not be fellowshiped by the Christian Church, and by the United Presbyterian church in particular. Paper covers: price, 20 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Masonry a Work of Darkness, adverse to Christianity, and inimical to republican government. By Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong (Presbyterian), a seceding Mason of 21 degrees. This is a very telling work and no honest man who reads it will think of joining the lodge. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

The Mystic Tie, or Freemasonry a League with the Devil. This is an account of the church trial of Peter Cook and wife, of Elkhart, Indiana, for refusing to support a reverend Freemason; and their very able defense presented by Mrs. Lucia C. Cook, in which she clearly shows that Freemasonry is antagonistic to the Christian religion. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

Sermon on Masonry, by Rev. James Williams, Presiding Elder of Dakota District Northwestern Iowa Conference, M. E. Church—a seceding Master Mason. Published at the special request of nine clergymen of different denominations, and others. 10 cents each; per dozen, 75 cents.

Are Masonic Oaths Binding on one Initiate. By Rev. A. L. Post. Proof of the sinfulness of such oaths and the consequent duty of all who have taken them to openly repudiate them. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Freemasonry Contrary to the Christian Religion. A clear, cutting argument against the lodge, from a Christian standpoint 5 cents each: per dozen, 50 cents.

Thirteen Reasons why a Christian should not be a Freemason. By Rev. Robert Armstrong. The author states his reasons clearly and carefully, and any one of the thirteen reasons, if properly considered, will keep a Christian out of the lodge. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Oaths and Penalties of the 33 Degrees of Freemasonry. To get these thirty-three degrees of Masonic bondage, the candidate takes half-a-million horrible oaths. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

ON ODDFELLOWSHIP.

Sermon on Odd-fellowship and Other Secret Societies, by Rev. J. Sarver, pastor Evangelical Lutheran church, Leechburg, Pa. This is a very clear argument against secretism of all forms and the duty to disfellowship Odd-fellows, Freemasons, Knights of Pythias and Grangers is clearly shown by their confessed character as found in their own publications. 10 cents each; per dozen 75 cents

Odd-fellowship Judged by Its Own Utterances; Its Doctrine and Practice Examined in the Light of God's Word. By Rev. J. H. NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE GRANT OBSEQUIES.

The family of General Grant decided, Tuesday, to inter his remains in Riverside Park on the Hudson just north of Central Park. It is probable the name will be changed to Grant Park.

President Cleveland on Thursday appointed pall-bearers for General Grant's funeral as follows: Generals Sherman and Sheridan, Admiral Porter, Vice Admiral Rowan, Generals Joseph E. Johnston and S. B. Buckner. Hamilton Fish, Geo. S. Boutwell. Geo. W. Childs, John A. Logan, George Jones and Oliver Hoyt.

At the Cabinet meeting Thursday it was decided that the President and all the members attend the Grant obsequies in New York.

Mrs. Grant requcsted President Cleveland that if he should select a prominent Union officer among the pall-bearers also to name a prominent Confederate.

A meeting of citizens at Washington Tuesday night protested against the interment of General Grant in Riverside Park and suggested the Soldiers' Home in Washington as the more fitting place.

A severe electric storm prevailed on Mount McGregor Thursday evening. One bolt followed the electric light wires into the Grant cottage and extinguished the lamp immediately over the casket of the dead and a portion of the plastering was torn away. Four persons were stunned by the severe shocks.

A Southern Senator now in Washington says he will introduce a bill next session giving Mrs. Grant a pension of $5,000 a year for life.

The last time General Grant signed his name was a few days before his death when he endorsed a check for $1,000 which he had received from the Century Publishing Company.

President Cleveland's friends at Albany say that immediately after the Grant obsequies he will start with two or three friends on a fishing and hunting excursion in Northern New York, to be absent a month, and that no official appointments will be made till October.

COUNTRY.

During a ball at Rogersville, Tenn., on Wednesday night a revolver dropped from the pocket of a young man and was discharged, the bullet passing through the heart of Miss Martha Brown, a beautiful girl, killing her instantly.

Near Leadville, Col., Friday night he engine and tender of a passenger train were wrecked by the explosion of a dynamite cartridge which unknown parties placed on the track. The passengers escaped unhurt.

A washout caused a wreck near St. Johnsbury, Vt., Friday night, two locomotives and six cars tumbling over an embankment. Three men were badly injured, and two missing were supposed to be under one of the engines.

Natural gas was struck Tuesday in the center of Ithaca, N. Y., and oil operators declare that petroleum will also be found.

A drove of cattle wrecked a train near Delphi, Ind., Wednesday morning, the engine and baggage-car tumbling down an embankment. The fifty passengers escaped unhurt, but the baggage-master was severely injured.

The walls of a rolling mill at South Wilmington, Del., fell Wednesday morning, killing two men and wounding half a dozen others, some of them mortally.

Strikers armed with clubs assembled in the vicinity of the mills at Cleveland early Tuesday morning, and set upon two yard employes, whom they beat in a brutal manner. The police quickly made their appearauce and the mob dispersed.

In a sham battle between Pennsylvania troops at Conneaut Lake, Thursday, the men became so excited that they believed they were engaged in a. real conflict. Wads from cannon seriously injured four men, and the colors of one company were blown to pieces. Two of the wounded are believed to be disfigured for life.

The wheat crop of Minnesota has suffered 10 per cent by recent storms, but in Dakota the harvest is turning out well. The statistical agent for Nebraska states that the crop will exceed previous estimates and places the total at 16,000,000 bushels. The department at Washington thinks the yield in Nebraska will reach 29,000,000 bushels.

For tearing up a lithograph of Gen. Grant, Wm. Monaghan was fined $25 in a justice court in this city last week. He told the justice that he revered the memory of the dead hero, and offered drunkness as an excuse for his actions. The court told him the fine would have been $100 had he been sober.

FOREIGN.

Dispatches from Aries on the Rhone state that a terrible explosion occurred there July 21. A large gunpowder and petroleum warehouse was blown to atoms and a number of people killed.

M. DeLesseps, in his report on the Panama Canal Company, maintains that the canal will be completed in 1888. Two new contractors have undertaken to complete the work for 19,200,000 francs. The total cost of piercing will be 28,000,000 francs, to which must be added the interest on capital, etc.

The committee having in charge the investigation of the statements of the Pall Mall Gazette in regard to vice in London, made a report Wednesday substantially affirming the charges.

The Ameer of Afghanistan has advised his people to cultivate the friendship of England, as it would be a bad day for them if they ever came under the tyrannical rule of Russia. But it is stated that the report that the Ameer had assented to the establishment of a British cantonment at Candahar is absolutely untrue.

In the whole of Spain, on Thursday, there were reported 3,168 new cases of cholera and 1,252 deaths.

The subscriptions to the new loan of $45,000,000 for the relief of the Egyptian government closed in London Thursday, the amount offered aggregating four times that required.

A Wonderful Woman,
A Wonderful Life,
AND
A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Elizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

HON. SAMUEL PLUMB whose death, two years ago, was so widely lamented by the friends of every leading Christian reform—for all found a place in his generous and great-hearted sympathy and warm co-operation—will be the subject for our next biographical sketch and portrait. This we hope to publish next week. Mrs. Plumb kindly furnishes the portrait, which is an excellent one; and Pres. C. A. Blanchard, who was one of the most intimate friends of Mr. Plumb, will write the sketch. Our readers may confidently expect a valuable number. A temperance centennial number is in preparation for September. An excellent portrait of the celebrated Dr. Benjamin Rush, believed to be the only one in the country, outside of expensive biographical volumes, is ready, and material for the accompanying sketch is being prepared with some expense and research. The editors and publisher will make every effort to increase the value of the Cynosure to every one of its readers.

The burial of General Grant last Saturday was an occasion worthy to be observed throughout the country in a manner suitable to the character of the man whom both friend and foe have learned to esteem and honor. Simple and unostentatious in his habits, republican in his tastes, without personal ambition or delight in the gewgaws and finery with which despots dazzle the sight of their serfs, the nation did him little honor when it stood gaping on the streets to see the lodges marching by in solemn mockery of the dead. Funeral parades largely made up of secret lodges, such as draggled through the rain and mud of Chicago Saturday were as much out of place and character as the heathen performance at the Washington monument last February, or the Masonic "monkeying" over a court house corner-stone. The people have become so accustomed to the sight of some lodge performance on such occasions,—seized upon for the purpose of an advertisement—that they no longer wonder but look on with simple stupidity. And at the tomb, too, the sacred rites of the church were strangely elbowed into a corner to allow the Grand Army lodge to perform its ceremony, in spite of protest and unfitness. But the real fame of General Grant will outlive these fly-blows of the lodge, and the great lessons of his career will yet be quoted for their overthrow.

The Mexican editors who have been traveling about a month through the chief cities of the United States have just closed their tour at St. Louis. As an evidence of the work done by one of our American ministers who established a number of Masonic lodges in that country, it is reported by Masonic journals that nine of the company are Freemasons, among them, of course, the president and secretary of the excursion.

The late street car strike in this city was a proof of the union that exists between the various secret lodges which may at any time develop into a power dark and threatening to every lawful interest of the people. A combination of the bricklayers and stonemasons lodges has just been formed here, with the stone-cutters, to refuse to lay any building stone dressed outside the city. If such material is brought to a building the contractor will have to lay it himself. How exactly do these men in their secret machinations fulfill the Revelator's vision: "That no man might buy or sell, save he that had the mark or the name of the beast" in his right hand or in his forehead!

The Knights of Labor lodges have gone even beyond boycotting in the support of the strikers on the Wabash railway. That line being now in the hands of a receiver appointed by the United States court, and so virtually controlled by the court was a dangerous affair to meddle with; but in the blindness of their folly and confidence in the superior power of their lodge combinations they assailed the men employed by the receiver to run the road, and attempted to prevent them from so doing. Judge Treat, with something of the servity of Washington police justice the other day, promptly committed the bold lodge-men to jail for contempt of court. In this he was clearly right, since the strikers were preventing the carrying out of the decree of court, and so guilty of contempt, for which imprisonment is a perfectly legitimate punishment. But such was the amazing audacity of the lodge that a deputation was posted off to Washington to get the President to interfere and override the decision of a United States circuit court. They had their labor for their pains and returned a much chop-fallen company of Knights.

The French Chambers, in a late discussion of the Madagascar invasion, has voted a credit for further hostilities in that country. It is to be regretted that De Freycinet, who has been widely esteemed as one of the few French statesmen whose moderate and sound republican views would help to direct the national life into healthy and useful channels, took an active part in securing this vote. The wretched policy of France in her foreign aggressions may be in part explained by the following from a speech in London recently by M. Reveillaud, the eloquent young convert whose labors for Protestantism have already been felt throughout the republic: He said: "To-day France is a tabula rasa—a nation without a religion. In that fallow ground, it is true, weeds grow. Frivolity and licentiousness abound, especially in Paris and in some other districts. But foreigners, who have themselves contributed to make Paris what it is, must not judge of all France by Paris. And the day of grace for France has not passed yet. She has given more martyrs than any country in Europe. The sowing time in France has been a time of weeping. It is often so, as the sower thinks of the risks that intervene between sowing and reaping. But in this case the harvest is certain, for God is faithful."

Through the kindness of Rev. John Boyes we have received a copy of the report of the secret commission of the London Pall Mall Gazette, containing the evidence just laid before the special committee of examination, who have reported the fearful exposition sustained by the evidence. The Gazette devotes the profits from the sale of this publication to a special fund for carrying on the work of investigation, prevention, and rescue. The Salvation Army, it seems, first suggested the investigation and has supplied much information which would naturally come from its relations to the criminal classes in large cities. General Booth, the commander, has been active in the effort to secure a law to prevent this commerce in the virtue of young women, and secured in a few days a petition from a half million signers. This immense petition, a mile and a half long, was borne in a special carriage to Parliament, accompanied by a large procession which attracted enormous crowds of people. Mr. James Stuart, a radical member, and long distinguished as an educational philanthropist and champion of educational privileges for women, was entrusted with its presentation. The agitation of this matter met a favorable response from the public and has resulted already in the terrible punishment of Sir Charles Dilke, one of the leading members of the late Gladstone cabinet, the exposure of whose unlawful relations with the wife of a London gentleman has driven him into temporary exile, if it has not forever ruined his influence as a public man in England.

The state of the public mind in England appears in this whole matter to be far in advance of that in America. The stories connected with the private life of President Cleveland which were vouched for by the Republican press of the country, if true, should have forever sunk him out of sight of the position he now holds. But they are now as little thought of as are the vices attributed to the gods of Olympus. Nay, the very force and apparent truth of those reports, now that their hero sits in the White House, has reacted fearfully upon the virtue of the whole nation. No doubt a state of things almost equally as bad as London might be unearthed in any of our great cities. But their exposure, alas! we fear would have no such effect here. Our Chicago authorities, it is true, under pressure from the Society for the Suppression of Vice, have prevented the sale of reprints of the London exposure, except in the Chicago Tribune. They can have little use here except to pander to the most degrading vices.

BATTLING AND BUILDING.

BY REV. WILLIAM MOERDYK.

When the Jews, after returning from captivity, began to rebuild the ruined temple and holy city, they met with strong opposition. Their enemies reproached and ridiculed them, and when that failed, they formed a bloody design against them to hinder the good work by force of arms.

Over against this opposition Nehemiah took refuge in prayer to God. But that was not all. He set a watch against the enemies, thus uniting watching and prayer. Besides posting guards, he armed all the builders with weapons. So they builded on the wall, "Every one with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon." The Jews builded and battled alternately or simultaneously.

All Christians, like these Jews, are, or ought to be, engaged in building, enlarging, strengthening, and beautifying the church of God. Now, as then, the extension and prosperity of the church are the grief and vexation of its enemies, and the builders meet with opposition. In this emergency Christians, like Nehemiah, must "make prayer unto our God." But it is a mistake to think, as some Christians seem to think, that when we pray for the growth and purity of the church we have performed our whole duty. By prayer alone, the temple and the walls of Jerusalem would never have been rebuilt. Prayer alone is a mockery. God will not work miracles, when human agency can do the work. Christ would raise Lazarus, but the by-standers must "take away the stone." So we must take away the stones, the obstacles. Like Samson, we must not only pray, but at the same time lay hold of the pillars, exerting all our might to pull down the strongholds of the enemy; or, to stick to the text, we must battle and build at the same time.

Christians are compared in Scripture to soldiers as well as builders. A Bible Christian is a battling Christian. No matter how peaceable a Christian may be, he must fight; he can't help himself. Every Christian knows by experience that building the temple, whether it be applied to the upbuilding of one's personal Christian character, or to the establishment and maintenance of a local church, or to the extension of Christ's kingdom on the earth, meets with opposition. We cannot build without battling the enemies.

Just now the battle rages all along the line. The Christian pulpit, press and people, are waging war against infidelity, intemperance, impure literature, Sabbath desecration, and a host of enemies which unite in opposition to the upbuilding and extension of God's kingdom. Not to fight against such enemies would be treason to the Captain of our salvation.

To this point all Christians are agreed. All the above-named are acknowledged to be the enemies of truth and vital godliness. But when in the list of enemies we include secret societies, many dissent and protest; they cannot bear to hear anything said against the lodge. They refuse not only to join us, but they try to dissuade us from fighting secret societies; they say we are fighting our friends; they say we are disturbing the peace of the church and creating schism in the ranks of the Christian army. All will assent that those who preach and work against infidelity, intemperance and Sabbath desecration are doing a noble service to the cause of Christ.

But suppose some church members should object to our warfare against intemperance or the profanation of the Lord's day, ought we therefore to cease battling and let these enemies break down the walls and ruin the church of Christ? But some say, "These are real enemies." So say we with equal right of oath-bound secret societies.

England, Germany, Russia and America all testify that secret societies are dangerous to civil and social life. Organized secrecy, both in church and state, has wrought nothing but evil. It stands self-condemned. One wonders that while this tree is so well known by it fruits, one Christian can yet be found to help plant and cultivate it; we should expect that all would unite in cutting it down and casting it into the fire, where it belongs.

Secret societies require oaths from their members without being authorized thereto by civil or divine power. Hence he who joins them takes the name of the Lord his God in vain; and they who require these oaths are guilty of greater sin. Freemasonry mutilates the Scriptures; its ceremonies are mockeries of sacred things and degrading to manhood; the pompous titles of its officers are blasphemous; its prayers are Christless, unless the name of Christ is permitted by common consent for the sake of expediency; in the lodge the minister of Christ is the "brother" of the Jew and the infidel and the saloonkeeper and the drinker and the gambler, so being "unequally yoked together with unbelievers," and by his membership and attendance "helping the ungodly." The lodge-room is the ante-room, the nursery, of the saloon; its members steal time which ought to be spent in the family or in promoting the welfare of the churches to which they belong; they steal money which ought to go into the Lord's treasury.

Who dare say that such a society is not an enemy to the cause of Christ against which all Christians ought to battle? Would that all the tribes of Israel might arise in their might and unitedly come to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

THE UNHONORED PROPHETS ARE THE LIVING.

BY REV. LEVI KELLY.

I met a man a few days ago who is a Freemason, but said he had left them never to meet with them again, because he was in danger of being led into the habit of social drinking. He said that almost every time the lodge closed he was invited to some drinking place to partake with them. It seems that in almost every testimony against the lodge this is the case. The lodges must be the great patrons of the rum power.

This man, however, thought it would not be required of him to say anything against them as far as his obligations were concerned. I told him that the Lord might think otherwise about it, and that he might be called to warn others. He did not deny, however, but what such penalties as I mentioned to him, were fixed on every one of the members. I can not conceive how any man of intelligence can take such obligations and not find his manhood degraded.

Besides this case I met two others, one had been minister of the M. E. church, and member of the Troy Conference, New York. He is not now in the active work. He told me that the expose of Morgan was correct. He trembles a little, and would tremble more if I should tell his name. What a power secretism must exert over its dupes!

The other man has been for years a leader in that church, but who never testifies against the lodge only to say he found something better. If he has found something better, he ought to tell in what the difference consists. It seems to me a man is not justified before God unless he has something to say against such a binding, blinding and enslaving order. There is a fearful day of revelation coming. God knows the lodges.

Another matter came to my mind. The more a church backslides from her original position the more she uses in connection with her institutions the names of the founders. The Roman Catholic church has everything holy and sainted. She puts on all the the paint of saintship. That church is largely filled with the worst element in this country, and yet, if her profession is true, every member must be holy, since she is holy as a church. She is traditionally holy, not personally. What a sham!

Just as other churches become formal they do the same thing. The men who founded those churches would not be allowed to preach in their pulpits, and yet they glorify their names and use them to make a profession of sanctity.

It may be said of them as Jesus said of the Pharisees: "Ye build the tombs of the prophets, and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous and say, 'If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets.'"

The men of to-day who take the same stand, as the men did whom these fallen churches almost worship, they spit on them their foul names and brand them as disturbers of their peace. The reason why they do not murder them is because they dare not.

I read in a very lengthy article in the New York Christian Advocate, written by one of the M. E. bishops, what great work some of the Roman Catholic bishops are doing for temperance among their people, and it commends their work to the Protestant preachers as examples to follow. I was astonished to see how easily Episcopalianism plays in harmony, where farther down blending would be declared heterodox. How any man much less a bishop, can see virtue in such actions is more than I can understand.

Think of a church—any church, if you please, urging its members to sign temperance pledges, or urging them to abstain from rum! What a condition of morality! Yet that same church will absolve its members from all sin if they confess, though they never forsake. The rum-sellers by thousands are members of that church, held in its communion and patronized. If the testimony of its ex-priests is true, then the greater portion of her clergy drink.

If the churches of this land would endorse and support prohibition, we could carry the country against saloons in favor of homes, but such godless playing into the hands of political double-leaders will kill temperance.

Is prohibition dangerous? Is it certain to increase taxation? Will it ruin our young men? Will it destroy the happiness of home? Will it make sober men drunk? Will it beat wives and children? Will it empty our churches? Fill our prisons? In the name of God and humanity why will you not vote for and promote it?

That Americans—a new order among the nations of the earth—should perpetuate the aristocratic class distinctions of the medieval ages is altogether too ridiculous: yet we meet those who appear to think that they shed some luster upon or add some glory to simple Americanism by their union with societies organized obstensibly for this very purpose. We meet those who dangle on their fob-chain, or wear about their persons the Maltese cross, who know no more about Malta or its history than the "man in the moon." But they claim to be "Knights of Malta," and so on, through a long line of imaginary dignification; and this because they have passed through a "hocus-pocus" operation, of which our modesty prevents us giving a description. If true chivalry could be rubbed into a man, and true Christian knighthood" could be instilled through the tomfoolery of encampment process there might be some tolerance given to these pretensions. But when a man pays his money, degrades his manhood, discounts his simple American citizenship, and gets nothing in return but the conceit that he has become thereby something better than his unmanipulated neighbors, then a swindle has been imposed upon him; if he is too simple to realise it he ought to become the ward of the commonwealth. Men who yearn after this kind of addenda to their Christianity, or their American citizenship, must certainly have a very low grade of the former, and do not sufficiently esteem the character and dignity of the latter to be worthy of it. —Free Methodist.

LETTER FROM GREECE.

ANDROS, Greece, via Syra, July 10, 1885.

DEAR BROTHER:—I take the opportunity to write to you and tell you about my trip to Smyrna and Constantinople.

About a month ago I reached home and began to build a small house, the stone of which we had already prepared. As we see now, it will cost double the amount which we had calculated and we shall not be able to plaster it inside; but we believe that the Lord will provide. If we had to rent a house, the rent is so high and what is still worse, there are no houses to rent. A friend of ours rented us his house for six months but he wants it now.

I must say a few things in regard to Smyrna and Constantinople. You know the history and how long it is since the American Board began work in Turkey. It was the only Board which sent missionaries to that part of Europe and Asia. Now you will find several different denominations in Constantinople. And I was surprised still more to see that even the Mormons have a missionary there: and with the multiplication of denominations there, trouble has come. I suppose you saw some of the complaints which the American Board made against the Baptists there in regard to the field; that the Baptists had no right to send missionaries there and that there was an agreement as to the division of the field between the American Board and the Baptists; that is, that where one Board will send missionaries the other Board will not send. The press of the Baptists took the matter up and say that there never was such an agreement. And we ask the question, if they had a right to make such an agreement with the Baptists, if there was such an agreement? Christ said, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." And what right has one Christian to make a castle and shut out another Christian if Christ gave him such liberty?

A very queer thing took place between the Church of the Disciples and the missionaries of the American Board. A missionary, or preacher, of the Disciples baptized a Turkish lady. The American Board missionaries told her that the baptism was not good and so she was convinced and rebaptized by the latter. I met the missionary of the Disciples, Mr. Shismanian, and had a good talk with him. He was very much angered against the missionaries and asked me if such a thing was ever heard of elsewhere. I told him that they must have charity with each other and Christian love in their hearts or their history will be like the history of the Greeks and Catholics in the past. They began quarreling with each other and left off sending the Gospel to heathen nations.

It seems that different denominations are not only found in Constantinople but are spreading out into different parts of Asia and European Turkey, and most of the members of the other denominations are taken from the churches of the American Board and are not new converts. In Smyrna there are twenty-five members of the Church of the Disciples, as their preacher says, and all of them were members and attendants of the Congregational church there.

I asked some of the natives in Constantinople what is the reason that so many denominations came pouring in now all at once. They answered me in this way, that the missionaries for the past thirty years have taken entirely new steps in regard to the education of the natives, forbidding any young man going to America. If any young man managed to escape and go to America, he was persecuted from one school to another and they had been so irritated for so long that they were ready to be anything but Congregationalists.

Some of the young men went to America, some to England, and some to other parts of Europe, and to-day they are coming back bringing every one of them a new denomination with them. I asked them if these different denominations are good for this part of the world for the present; they say no! For the people of this part of the world are not ready yet for so much liberty. This may do for America, England and other parts of the world, but not for Turkey.

Now what is the remedy? There is no remedy for this, for the other denominations came in and no one can put them out, only the American Board and her missionaries have to learn to treat their native churches differently from what they have done in the past, to have better schools than they have now, to give a better education to the native ministers' and to treat them as Christians and as brethren.

I was very glad to meet Rev. Mr. Filian, the missionary ordained at Wheaton, and hear him preach in the Bible House and of whom I expect to say something in my next letter. Your brother in Christ.

A. D. Zarapiionithes.

FREEMASONRY ANALYZED.

The Jews rated all religions but their own as heathen and idolatrous. The pagan mysteries, from which the modern trace their descent, therefore belonged to this class. But as no religion at that time was confined to or incorporated with a mechanical calling, figurative or real, none of the ancients were Freemasons. On the other hand, as the guilds of stone masons of the Middle Ages, from which the sect also claim descent, were not religious bodies, and as historians say that pagan religions had long since been extirpated from Christian countries, neither can these be identified with the modern association. Consequently speculative Freemasonry could not have existed until these two ingredients were united in 1717, and the combination is therefore a modern institution formed by the union of ancient idolatry and a guild of operative Masons extended to embraec other favored classes.

Speculative Freemasonry never engages as such in the occupation of a stone mason, for the corner-stone layings and dedications are religious rites, and the name is therefore a blind counterfeit and fraud. On the other hand, as they perform its offices, Freemasonry must be a religion, and is therefore simply and wholly ancient idolatry, disguised in the garments of a handicraft.

History is full of the depravities of ancient morals and religion, and it is the boast of Christianity that their viees and enormities were swept away by the superior precepts of Christ. Consequently, if the ancient religions exist at the present time, they are the enemies of and at war with Christian institutions and ethics—modern marriage, the golden rule, etc. This is a subject for the investigation of the legislator. *

WHY WOMEN CANNOT BECOME MASONS.

Let a careful comparison be made of the two answers given below, the first from the Freemason, of Detroit; the other from the Record, of Blanchard, Iowa. Notice the silly hypocrisy and insult to woman in the one: weigh well the candid reasoning of the other.

THE MASONIC REASON.

The question is often asked, why cannot women be Freemasons? A Nevada orator recently undertook to answer it as follows:

Women sometimes complain that they are not permitted to enter the lodge and work with the craft in their labors, and learn all there is to be learned in this institution. We will explain the reason. We learn that before the Almighty had finished his work, he was in doubt about creating Eve. The creation of the living and creeping things had been accomplished, and the Almighty had made Adam, who was the first Mason, and created for him the finest lodge is the world, and called it Paradise No. 1. He then called all the beasts of the field and fowls of the air to pass before Adam, for him to name them, which was a piece of work he had to do alone that no confusion might thereafter arise from Eve, who he knew would make trouble if she was allowed to participate in it, if he created her beforehand. Adam being fatigued with his first task fell asleep, and when he awoke found Eve in the lodge with him. Adam being Senior Warden, placed Eve as the pillar of beauty in the south, and they received their instruetions from the Grand Master in the east, and when finished, she immediately called the craft from labor to refreshment. Instead of attending to the duties of her offiee as she ought, she left her station, violated her obligation, and let in an expelled Mason, who had no business there, and went around with him, leaving Adam to look after the jewels. This fellow had been expelled from the Grand Lodge with several others some time before. Finding that Eve was no longer trustworthy, and that she had caused Adam to neglect his duty, and had let one in whom he had expelled, the Grand Master closed the Lodge and turned them out, setting a faithful tiler to guard the door with a flaming sword. Adam repented of his folly, went to work like a man and a good Mason, in order to get reinstated again. Not so with Eve! She got angry about it and commenced raising Cain. Adam on account of his reformation, was permitted to establish lodges and work in the degrees, and while Eve was allowed to join him in his works of charity on the outside, she was never again permitted to assist in the regular work of the craft. Hence the reason why a woman cannot become an inside Mason.

THE ANTI-MASONIC REASON.

1. A woman can't be a Mason because Masons do not want her to sit with them in the lodge. She—they say—is not a good secret keeper, and if a brother Mason should commit an outrage against common decency, or the civil law, or the great moral law, she would not consent to conceal and never reveal the secrets of such a desperado.

2. Woman hates intrigues. She despises wire-pulling in polities and the every-day affairs of the home. If women were Masons there could be no caucuses held after the respectable members had gone home, because the wives and daughters of the caucus members would require their attendance home. Woman would persist in staying to see the lodge out. Therefore, she can't be a Mason.

3. A woman can't be a Mason because she is the tireless foe of the rum power. And the rum power is hid behind, and gets its strength from Masonry in particular and secret societies in general. The temperance people may rightfully charge home to secrecy all of the woe and misery upon women and children by the liquor traffic.

4. A woman can't be a Mason because she seeks the right of the ballot. If she were a citizen she would vote out of existence every saloon in the land. Then there would be no more bacchanalian Masonic feasts, no more midnight Masonic drunken revels.

5. A woman can't be a Mason because she could not be duly prepared for initiation. She could not go into an ante-room and be divested of her outer garments. She could not go into the lodge room with bared breast and knee and unshodden foot. She could not go into the lodge room hoodwinked and cabletowed. She could not thus be led around the long room, and she could not take the oath even of an entered apprentice, in which occurs the awful sentence:

"I, of my own free will and accord, in the presence of Almighty God, and this worshipful lodge erected to him and dedicated to the Saint John do * * * most solemnly and sincerely promise and swear that I will always hail, ever conceal and never reveal any of the secrets, arts, parts, or points of the hidden mysteries.

DEMOCRACY IN EUROPE.

The farther we traveled last summer the more we were disposed to soften down our prejudices about the tyranny and injustice of the ruling classes in monarchial countries. In extensive journeying through Great Britain and on the Continent, we failed to remark the wretchedness which we had been taught to expect.

Among the rural districts of England we were constantly struck with the air of content upon the faces of the working classes. To be sure, we saw women weeding the turnip-patches, hoeing the potatoes and beets, and making hay side by side with the men. Never in all our lives in the South did we see so many women at work in the fields, but they had no overburdened look, and as we watched their children, often scampering about them, it did not seem to us worth while to waste pity on them.

In Scotland we saw nothing among the lower classes that gave us any heart-wrench whatever. Plenty of poverty we did see, but it was that decent poverty for which one always has a profound respect; and the clean and careful thrift of which we were constant witnesses made us ashamed of the reckless waste which characterizes the poorer people in our country. From the Duke of Devonshire, of whose thrift we had some curious experience at Chatsworth, down to the pretty laundry-maid near London, there seemed to be absolutely not a penny's waste.

The only places where we met barefooted children were in the old High Street, Edinburgh; in Liverpool, and, of all places, in Hyde Park in the height of "the season." On the Continent, the wooden sabot is so universal that you never see a child of the people without them. Raggedness was very uncommon; we saw more between Philadelphia and Baltimore, on our return home, than during the whole of our foreign travel.

In France we were struck with the happy, contented look of the common people, and with the thorough zest which they threw into their enjoyments—a zest our lower classes never know. They did not seem the sort of people out of which communists could be made. At Dijon, a town founded by Julius Cæsar, we were struck with the serene contentment of the men in blue blouses, and the bonnetless women, in short petticoats, who thronged the old streets.

In Germany the ruling hand is more obvious, and stolid faces were common. Our Americanism rose triumphant when we saw women and dogs yoked together pulling carts, heavy laden, through the streets. Along the Rhine we saw poverty enough, but still it was not painful poverty, and seemed to have no element of wretchedness mixed with it. Perhaps in Cologne we saw more to move our pity among the hundreds of poor market-women than anywhere else in Germany. In Holland and Belgium, the uncommon thrift and industry of the laboring classes give an air of brightness to everything, and we saw no sign of suffering in either country.

Switzerland has nothing but its inheritance of sublimity and beauty; and as we traveled through its entire length, its pathetic poverty was a constant oppression. But the meagre possibilities of the country accounted for this. There is no tyranny to hold down its people; its government is as free as our own, and is administered so economically that its taxes are not burdensome. Yet the poverty is piteous and appealing. The barest necessaries of life are all that the dwellers in the little Swiss hamlets ever hope for. Their faces wear a look of sad resignation, and the children seem never to laugh. Nowhere did we see women made such use of—they are not only wives and mothers, but beasts of burden like horses or donkeys.

There were other features in the positions of the foreign democracy for which we were not prepared.

On the Continent we remarked the same wide margin for out-door enjoyment allowed to the poorest people. Driving in the Bois de Boulogne at Paris, we would come upon groups of the poor, sitting upon the benches with their children all about them, eating their dinners, while a big basket near contained the family mending. We observed this in the parks everywhere, in Brussels, in Antwerp, at the Hague, and in many of the German cities. One might have supposed that the beautifully kept public grounds, with their gravelled walks and velvet swards, and embowering trees, and lovely flowers, and fountains, and interminable iron benches and chairs and tables, were intended mainly for the lower orders of the populations.

Upon the whole, we returned to our own land with a heart considerably lightened as to the hardships and oppression of the laboring classes abroad. When we talked with our guide in Edinburgh about the misery that we occasionally saw in the Closes and Wynds, he said, "These people are wretched because they are wicked. If they would behave themselves, leave off drink, and do work they can always get to do, there need not be any such suffering."—Mrs. M. J. Preston, in N. Y. Evangelist.

The Anti-Catholic Secret Society.—The American Protestant Association, the anti-Catholic secret society, held last month its thirty-sixth annual meeting in Pittsburg. Delegates were present from Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, Kentucky and Mississippi. The order is not very extensive, and is, as a secret society, the fruit of the same darkness from which Popery sprung.—Lutheran Witness.

Some people are so utterly benevolent in principle, if not in practice, that they are horrified at any word expressed in restraint of charity. They will not listen to the suggestion that a gift, blindly bestowed, may prove an evil rather than a blessing. But such is surely true, and often happens to be so when the recipient of charity is a poor and not vicious person. That which discourages honest industry is bad. The woman who earns a dollar a day over the wash-tub is not encouraged to continue the struggle by finding that her neighbor gets the same sum by simply applying to the relief society. The day-laborer feels like knocking off hard work when he finds that some other fellow, fully as strong as he, gets a better living off the generosity of citizens who are making reputations for liberality. We say that benevolence should be wisely exercised. The notion that it is better to assist ninety-nine idle tramps than refuse one worthy person is erroneous. People should not be encouraged to lie, cringe, and beg when it is possible for them to earn an independent living. We believe in generosity; we believe in the poor girl, or poor boy, or poor woman or man being richly rewarded for industry. We believe in charity too, and think the cry of distress cannot receive too prompt a response. But what we mean has already been plainly expressed—that the begging business by lazy people cannot be too severely frowned upon.—The Present.

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER XXVIII. (concluded.)

Dacey would have run away, but aside from the lack of dignity in such a proceeding it would have been about as safe to attempt flight with the fangs of a bull-dog already fastened in his coat. As a last resort he appealed to the group in the doorway.

"This fellow, you must see, is insane, Mr. Deming. How can you allow him to insult and abuse me with sueh a paek of lies. Uncle Zeb, as a brother Mason"—

Here Uncle Zeb rose up in mighty wrath.

"You needn't 'brother' me. I was green enough once to jine the lodge, and I've made a kind of a joke of it when it was a sin I'd oughter have repented of. And if a thousandth part of what I've he'erd jest now is true, I'd advise you to be repenting, and in a mighty hurry."

"This is prolonging a most unprofitable interview," said Daeey, taking refuge in the eoolest effrontery he could muster to hide his inward seare. "Here is a man ready to take my life, and not one of you stirs a finger."

But Mr. Deming had enough of the Anglo-Saxon sense of justice not to interfere till really obliged to do so. He knew very well that but for these revelations now so strangely made by this unknown man he might in the next hour have been in Dacey's power—how deeply and inextricably he trembled to think. Such a villain ought to be in state's prison, and though a good fright would go but a small way towards paying him his deserts, it was better than nothing.

So pre-occupied were the group that no one saw the blaek curiously-shaped eloud with lurid greenish edges so swiftly approaching from the southwest, bearing desolation and death in its track. Yet the very birds had felt the awful shadow of its coming and flown away in terror.

"Ye sneakin' varmint!"—and with the old panther fury blazing in his eyes Jesse Dukes would have sprung on his adversary, but a Hand parted them.

Those in the house heard a dull, distant roar, but there was no time for flight before, eutting for itself a path even and clean as if done by a mower's seythe, the tornado swept past, wrecking farm and outbuildings, felling trees, and filling the air with the flying dust and debris.

The storm demon did his work of destruction in that one brief, dreadful instant. Dora had shut her eyes in shuddering terror when the blow came on. She opened them to find herself, rather to her own surprise, still a denizen of this world. Uncle Zeb was groaning and praying like an old-fashioned Methodist. Not one of the group had been injured by even a scratch.

But assailer and assailed!—where were they?

Jesse Dukes had really no intention of taking Dacey's life. He meant to chastise him soundly and show him up for the unprincipled villain that he was. The justice Masonie courts refuscd to give him he meant to administer for himself according to the rude ideas of justice prevailing among his primitive mountain race. But Dacey's insulting words had heated the furnace of the trapper's wrath seven times hotter. There was murder in his soul, murder in the fierce grip with which he beld his enemy till wrenched apart by that terrible Power.

* * * * * * * * * *

He knew nothing more till one flash of vivid lightning rent the gloom, followed instantly by the reverberating erash of the swiftly descending thunderbolt. The rain deseended in sheets, in cataracts. Jesse Dukes raised himself from the sodden earth and suddenly realized that he was alone—that the form stretched lifeless on the ground a dozen yards away was that of James Dacey. God had avenged him of his adversary, and saved him from bloodguiltiness.

He staggered to his feet, gave one dazed glance around and covered his face with his hands, moaning, "O Lord, I'm a poor sinner!"

CHAPTER XXIX.

GOING DOWN INTO EGYPT.

The political contest had assumed new features, and as usual the saloon and the lodge were both active. By this means some curious complications were preparing which would be a surprise to many who never thought while so confidently predicting results to make allowance for these two important factors—particularly the latter. "The way of a serpent upon a rock" is about as easy to trace as the way of the lodge in polities, but we will essay the task, first giving the reader a map of the political situation that he may better understand what follows.

The Republicans nominated as their choice for Governor Judge Dyer, a Christian man of strong temperance prineiples—in all respects an irreproaehable candidate. The determined stand made by the Prohibitionists at the previous election had forced this concession from the unwilling party leaders. To nominate again a demagogue like Gen. Putney, even at the bidding of the Grand Army, would be too mueh of a risk. On the other hand the Democrats nominated as before an ex-confederate who stood high in favor with the saloonists. Had the Republican choice been less worthy the Prohibition ranks would have stood firm, but when to its nominee's unquestioned charaeter for integrity and patriotism were added vague promises of submitting a prohibitory amendment to the people, even the staunehest third party men wavered. Stephen Howland himself, after a little inward struggle, left the Prohibition Moses and joined the rest who flocked to Judge Dyer's standard in the sanguine belief that they already saw the dawn of a new day.

But Martin Treworthy was not so hopefully inclined, though if he could have conscientiously cast his vote once more with the party of his first affections, so inseparably assoeiated with the memory of his old battles for human freedom and the name of his mourned and martyred chief, it would have rejoiced him from his heart.

"Mr. Treworthy, what do you think of voting for Judge Dyer," asked Nelson, who was now in his new position of foreman at the works.

He was tolerably sure of keeping it, and could speak lightly of his own losses to Stephen Howland as compared with others whose all had been swallowed up in the bank's failure. At the same time to have to begin over again the task so nearly accomplished of earning a home for himself and Martha was not a very inspiriting outlook. Besides this there were disagreeable things connected with his new position, for while the majority of the men liked him, he knew there existed an unfriendly element which made itself felt in various ways, and which would not only have gladly ousted him from the situation, but would doubtless have suceeeded in doing so with an employer of less stubborn make or less firmly his friend than Matthew Densler, who turned a deaf ear to all complaints, grimly assuring the fault finders that he was boss over his own eoncerns, and if they didn't like the new foreman they might leave and welcome—the sooner the better.

Martin leaned forward in his leathern arm-chair, and was silent a moment before replying. Then he said:

"Judge Dyer is a fine sort of a man. He's clear of the lodge; I've taken the pains to find out that. And once, at least, he's wrote or said something against it. And he's got a good clean temperance reeord, but then I don't know —"

"Whether it is best to vote for him?" inquired Nelson, as Martin seemed to go off in a deep reverie, leaving the unfinished sentenced suspended on his lips. "I don't see as there is any other alternative. I have said I would never go again with the Republican party, but I think I shall vote for Judge Dyer."

"'Woe unto them that go down to Egypt for help,'" repeated Martin slowly and solemnly to this declaration; "'to strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh and to trust in the shadow of Egypt. Therefore, shall the strength of Pharaoh be your shame and the trust in the shadow of Egypt your confusion.'"

But Nelson could not see that this Old Testament prophecy had the slightest bearing on the subject, and answered wonderingly:

"What do you mean, Mr. Treworthy?"

"Didn't the Jews go for help to a nation eaten up by false worships? And ain't that just what the prohibition Israel is doing to-day?—seeking help from a party given over to the heathenism of the Masonic lodge?"

"Not more than the Democratic party, surely."

"That ain't the question. Masonry controls 'em both. Do you think I want the Democrats to win? Don't I remember their rule thirty years ago under Pierce and Buchanan, when I was whipped and put in prison and chased by bloodhounds? But that is all over and done with. I don't owe the Democratic party anything now, or they me."

"Then why not vote for Judge Dyer? such an exceptionable candidate—I really can't see."

"No, you can't see," retorted Martin, with quiet sareasm; "but may the Lord open your blind eyes. Here you be, you and other Prohibitionists, and you ean't see that a vote for either of the old parties is a vote for the lodge, and a vote for the lodge is a vote for the saloon."

Martin Treworthy shut his lips and said no more.

But it was a very cheerful going down into Egypt. The Republieans were confident of victory now they had captured the Prohibition vote; the Prohibitionists equally so now that the Republicans had seemingly acceded to their demands. And though there were some like Martin Treworthy to feel suspicious of this era of peaee and good will, they were in too small a minority for their votes to be missed.

BEARDING THE LION IN HIS DEN.

He has little eonception of true moral courage who does not see a rare Christian heroism in the Memphis ministers who have begun the work of separating the secret lodge infamy from the ehurches of Jesus Christ. We print below the summons sent by the lodge to Rev. R. N. Countee, who had renounced and publicly pointed out its dangers, and warned his people in the name of Jesus Christ, the Head of the chureh, to be separate from its contaminating influences. The charges preferred against him and his reply, as published in his paper, the Living Way, appear below, also the report of a debate. Read, too, his letter on page 6th:

PERSECUTION FOR CHRIST'S SAKE.

Rev. R. N. Countee summoned to meet before a body of ungodly men for inviting Christians to come out from among the wicked, and be not yoked with unbelievers.

Memphis, Tenn., July 28, 1885.

Bro. R. N. Countee, Dear Sir and Bro.: You are hereby notified to appear at Odd-fellow's Hall, corner of Union and Second streets, August the 5th, 1885, at 7½ o'clock P. M. sharp, to answer a charge now pending against you in Tennessee Union Lodge 1623, G. U. O. of O. F. Yours in F. L. & T.

R. H. Rideout, Advocate.

To Tennessee Union Lodge No. 1623, G. U. O. of O. F.:

The undersigned, Edward Duncan, C. W. Govan, and W. H. Herron, of Tenn. Union Lodge No. 1623, do hereby charge Bro. R. N. Countee of your lodge with conduct unbecoming an Odd-fellow, that is to say the said brother did on or about the 11th day of June A. D. 1885, and has since so continued to do, violated every obligation taken by him with the order by a heteroclitical set of false lectures in which he has falsely misrepresented, slandered and defamed the order, and also used his influence to prevent the increase of its membership, also to induce persons now members to quit the order. Yours in F. L. & T.

Edward Duncan,
C. W. Govan,
W. H. Herron.

Signed R. H. Rideout, Advocate.

Mr. Countee first called the attention of the public to the Odd-fellows' picnic as a place unfit for respectable people, ladies and gentlemen, to go, for they were filled with the most disreputable characters in the city, who took charge of the amusements to the exclusion of all others. This has been the course of the O. F.s for years, and has grown worse and worse, and for this cause, with many others which cannot be denied, Mr. Countee had occasion to call the attention of the members of his ehurch to the unchristian and demoralizing condition of these organizations, and upon the authority of God's word has renounced his alliance with them and invited, yea, urged every Christian to come out from them. "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers. . . . . Wherefore come out from among them and be ye separated, saith the Lord." 2 Cor. 6: 14–17.

He has further stated that these institutions had themselves denounced the moral teaching of their rituals, and not only so; but that they had obliterated from them the name of the Lord Jesus Christ in order that they might initiate into their ranks all classes and creeds, Jew and Gentile; and the name of Jesus cannot be found in their ceremonies, and no Christian can or has any business in an organization that drives Jesus out of doors. I now repeat the assertion, and say to every Christian man, Jesus Christ your Saviour says, "Come out from among them."

They have again deseended the high point of morality that they held out in this city ten years ago. Character cuts no figure regarding your admittance to the order, but the money is all with whom I was once allied. God says to me in his word, Come out, and I must rather obey God than man. I shall meet no committee whatever. I have severed my connection with all ungodly organizations, and say to all Christians, "Come out from them and obey your God. Surely we are having some things new under the sun.

Here a set of men have the audacity to call a man to account for preaching God's word. All that I have said can be easily proved, and if proof is demanded we will have no corner work about it, but we can have it outside where the world shall judge, and know if I have spoken the truth. If you desire, we can have all the evidence through the columns of the Living Way. So you can send all your testimony to this office and I will cheerfully publish your statements and reply. No more corner work, wide open work, come out with your evidence and we will meet you. Yours for truth,

R. N. Countee.

P. S. P. H. Hill and Joseph Davis inform us that they did not authorize any one to put their names to the above document. A lie out.

DISCUSSION RARE.

The following resolution was opened for discussion on Friday night last by our B. M., Rev. R. N. Countee:

Resolved, That societies, as conducted in Memphis, retard rather than advance the moral status of our race.

Mr. Countee, in opening, spoke earnestly and fervently and endeavored to show that they were detrimental to our moral interest, in proof of which he noticed. First, the meetings of the lady department keeping women away from their husbands and children until midnight and sending them home alone. Second, the picnic feature which is demoralization itself. Men and women thrown indiscriminately together, all kinds of clans, cliques, and classes, indulging in dancing and beer drinking, equalled only by the description Dr. Talmage gives us of the low dives and dens of New York in his book, "The Mask Torn Off." He then spoke of the financial feature and showed where thousands of dollars are thrown away every year, and for which the people received nothing as an equivalent, and finished by asserting that they were demoralizing to the highest and grandest interest of the nation, the Christian religion.

He was followed by Mr. Dan Johnson of Mississippi, who made an excellent speech showing the benefits to be derived from being a Mason or an Odd-fellow; and descended below the part of decent and gentlemanly discussion by making an uncalled-for allusion to Mr. C., and his object of endeavoring to get the Christians to sever their alliance from all societies and take their stand on the Lord s side. Mr. Johnson ridiculed this idea by saying that Mr. C. wanted to be the Grand cyclops, and branded the idea of such a thing as a fact of Christians being moral cowards and afraid to mix up with sinners. He lauded the Masons of Mississippi, and told the amount of money paid out there by them to widows, and now they were ready to marry more Masons. He also informed the audience that a Mason brother would be helped along in his travels to the lodge, but not so the churches; and if a brother was even to stop at the Taberanacle Baptist it would always be the day to take up the pastor's collection—another unkind and impolitic assertion, and unbecoming in debate. It took, inuendos always do with a class. He did not refer once or show by any argument that societies, as they are conducted in Memphis, were beneficial to the moral interest of our race. He closed his argument, if it was such, brilliantly by saying, "Be good, honest and true to your obligations, and when time should be no more we should lay our regalia by and enter the Grand Lodge above, and our password would be Redeemed." The discussion will be continued to-morrow night.

—There is in progress at Brookville, Ky., a revival conducted by Mrs. Vonholz and her daughter, of the M. E. church, which during the last month has resulted in the conversion of five hundred and ten souls. That is marvelous work indeed, and it would be a grand thing if this revival could be kept up until it had reached to the utmost boundry of our nation. But when it is announced in the same paragraph of the Western Christian Advocate that one hundred and forty souls have been sanctified, it seems a little incredulous. Nevertheless, even this "is a consummation devoutly to be wished." For we are sure that less than one hundred and forty in every five hundred and ten of those professing to be converted in other churches, are sanctified. And some of them have been converted a long time. But a revival with two objects is a good thing, and carried on successfully must result in good to the world and and the church. And what does the world need more than conversion, and the church than sanctification.—Christian Nation.

AN OBITUARY OF MR. ELMER B. THOMPSON.

FROM A SERMON BY THE SENIOR EDITOR, IN WHEATON COLLEGE CHAPEL, AUG. 2, 1885.

Elmer B. Thompson was born in Stoddard, N. H., Oct. 8. 1818, and so was just the age of the State of Illinois. At ten years of age he went to Southboro, Mass., where he grew to manhood, experienced a change of heart, and united with the Congregational church of that place; in which profession of faith he continued till he died, killed by a most fearful cyclone at Highmore, Dakota, on the 15th of July last. The remainder of his family escaped by descending into the cellar. The house was instantly demolished, blown into a thousand fragments, and some of the contents blown twelve miles. Mr. Thompson himself was borne forty rods, striking on his head; his neck broken and life extinguished in an instant. He had resided in Wheaton some thirty years, and last year had purchased property in Dakota where he was to close his life. The storm which killed him is described as unutterably fearful; consisting of a succession of seven funnels, descending, bursting, and again forming, till the seventh had completed the terrible havoc of its march. The press generally has described the desolation of its track, and appealed to the charitable to relieve the fearful destitution of the survivors: and the friends of Mrs. Thompson, who was known and respected by a large circle of Christian friends, are already moving to restore some portion of the comforts which the united industry of the family had gathered, and of which they have been in a moment bereft. It is hoped that multitudes will hasten to share in this blessed work of relief, which all may sometime need.

The Bible everywhere treats convulsions of nature as messengers of God; and none more so than "stormy wind fulfilling his word." Ps. 148: 8. But it is a great error to suppose they are sent only upon wicked men. Job was a "perfect man and upright," who had "not his like on earth," yet "a great wind from the wilderness smote the four corners of the house" where his children feasted, and killed them every one.

It is so with the storms and plagues and earthquakes which are to precede and presage the coming of Christ. The anger of the elements doubtless reflects the anger of God; and Cowper was justified by the Scriptures in holding that the wholesale murders, vices and crimes of the West Indies, wet with the blood of slaves, called down tempests which reflected the frowns of God:

> "Who foreseeing what vexations
> Afric's sons should undergo,
> Fixed their tyrants' habitations
> Where his whirlwinds answered, No!"

So, throughout the Bible, Sabbath-breaking, blasphemies and like defiance of God, and violations of his beneficent laws, attract God's displeasure as steel draws lightning. But the very whirlwind which the sins of men occasion, may bear his beloved Elijahs to heaven: and though Christians may die amid tempests which sin has kindled and called down; yet, "precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

Mr. Thompson was no ordinary man. His mind reflected the law of God, as a mirror reflects material objects. When he saw men paying more money for cancer-producing tobacco than would support the pauper lists and school lists of the world, his mind, from possessing that one fearful fact, came to be possessed by it. Slavery, and the lodge which brewed the slavery rebellion, seemed to him before, as they seemed to others after they had reddened our soil with blood and ridged it with graves. He loved property, and toiled unremittingly to accumulate; but he poured out his money like water to promote reform, and he has quit his business and traveled all the way to the Atlantic seaboard, to make one in conventions which were seeking to open the eyes of the American people to the impending lodge-curse. And though at times he had the asperity of a Hebrew prophet, his heart was gentle at bottom, and his manner softened as he drew near life's farther gate. He was a respected trustee of Wheaton College through the furnace-heat of its trials; and thousands who hated his earnest opinions, now that he is gone will find the wish rising in their bosoms that the records which they leave may be like his.

The church will miss his testimony, and the college which he loved will honor his worth. His means were every ready in its early struggles; and when Satan put us into his seven-times heated furnace, this brother stood calmly and bravely in the blaze of its blast. Few indeed are the men who have achieved as much as he did with the advantages which he possessed. His life has been one strenuous, unwearied endeavor to do good. Like Elijah he cheerfully bore the reproach of being a "troubler of Israel;" and like that prophet, he has passed "by a whirlwind into heaven."

CORRESPONDENCE.

VACATION RAMBLES.

Washington, D. C., July 21, 1885.

Dear Cynosure:—Our long cherished desire to see the nation's capital has at length been granted. Rather more than a vacation day's journey from near the Catskill mountains, twenty miles by stage to Catskill, thence by rail to New York, and after a fine ride on one of the fine ferry boats that run in every direction about the metropolis to Jersey City, and thence by rail, brought us to our pleasant temporary home in this city.

Our first view of the city from a hotel window, at a time when rosy-fingered Aurora puts aside the curtains of the night and ushers in the dawn, revealed the Washington monument shrunken as it seemed to us to one half its real height as given in figures and realized in the fact that it is said to take ten minutes to reach its giddy summit by the elevator. One's first impression, that grows into a conviction on further acquaintance, is that the mind that planned these broad and beautiful streets and avenues with their ever-recurring parks, adorned or to be adorned with statues commemorating the nation's heroes or great events, had some presentiment of the coming greatness and of the needs of the capital of a mighty people. The capital itself, saving the impression of want of height, which its vast proportions give, now that its two wings have been completed, is a truly grand and imposing structure. This one defect is to be remedied, not as in case of most buildings, by adding to the top, but by taking off something from the top of Capitol hill and improving its foundations.

A visit to the base of the monument gave us a more realizing sense of the vast elevation of that wonderous shaft than we could possibly get from a distant view. Five hundred and fifty-five feet heavenward is indeed a dizzy height. The base is yet altogether unfinished and, as we were informed, not even planned, yet the work seems to be going on slowly. We visited most of the departments and may say something about them hereafter.

We found Bro. Hinman at work as usual, though rather feeble in health and in doubt whether he is able to enter upon the Southern work at all. He certainly could not during the intense heat. Prof. Bailey, in addition to editorial and official duties, is doing an excellent work in the new Central Mission, having charge of the Sunday evening meetings and often taking an active part in the street and other evening meetings. We attended several meetings at the mission and rejoiced greatly to hear the testimonies of many who had been recently rescued from lives of shame and sin, and were now praising God and actively engaged in rescuing their fellows from the ways of the destroyer.

We shook hands with the Chief Magistrate of the nation and were not a little charmed at the severe republican simplicity everywhere manifest. The President, unlike some if not all of his predecessors, makes himself very accessible to the people of all conditions and color. Every afternoon at 1:15 o'clock the east room is thrown open and the President shakes hands with every one that comes. He is particularly attentive to little children. He wears at these receptions simply a business suit, with no gloves. As fine a carriage and team as that in which he takes his daily drives may be found in any livery stable.

The White House itself, although a respectable mansion, situated as it is between two immense buildings, one for the Treasury which extends across three blocks and the other for the departments of State, Army and Navy, which, I think, when completed will be still larger, seems quite inferior. The grounds are beautiful, having a beautiful circular walk and drive with a fine park and fountain in front, and a fine park in the rear sloping down to the Potomac; with extensive green-houses on one flank, and on the other a flower garden.

Aug. 5th.—At this present writing I am seated at a window at West New Brighton on Staten Island, within a stone's throw of which large ferry boats from New York pass every few minutes. At Bergen Point, just east and in sight are the vast works and dockage of the New Jersey Standard Oil Company. This island which is fourteen miles long and seven miles wide is to be one immense delightful suburb of the great city. A new railroad is to be built entirely around the border of the island, each train to connect by rapid boats with New York from the nearest point, which is seven miles from the city.

Yesterday after our arrival we rode in the grip-cars over Brooklyn bridge, went to Brighton Beach, and on our return walked over the bridge. This morning we are off for a ride on the bay and a day in Central Park. Judging by its appearance, the base of the Bartholdi statue must be near completion.

A PRESSING APPEAL FROM THE SOUTH.

WHAT SHALL THE N. C. A. DO FOR MEMPHIS?

MEMPHIS, Tenn., July 31, 1885.

A few weeks since I learned of your paper, the Cynosure, as being an exponent of the evils of secretism and its opposition to the Christian religion. I wrote and received a copy. I am unable to subscribe for it, nor do I ask you to give it to me; but I have a request to make of your Association: I am trying to raise my race, the Africo-American, in my city, from under the servitude of these miserable, deceptive institutions. I have been a member in good standing in the Masonic, Odd-fellows, Knights of Pythias and one or two others, and am financial in some of them until January, 1886. I have openly denounced them and severed my connection and invited the members of the church of which I am pastor to do the same thing: more than half of whom have done so.

I want about six hundred of your tracts or pamphlets: three hundred of the one called "Thirteen Reasons why a Christian should not be a Freemason, and three hundred of "Sermon on Odd-fellowship," by Rev. J. Sarver. We are unable to buy all of these works, and I am informed that your Association would help us in this matter. We can pay some and would like to know what they will cost us. Our poor people here are just fleeced out of their hard earnings by these ungodly organizations. I forward you a copy of the Living Way and would be pleased to have you exchange with us. It is a company work, owned and controlled by the colored Baptists, and we are trying to storm this citadel of destruction. Respectfully yours,

R. N. COUNTEE.

He is a representative of all the lodges hereon mentioned and is an officer in most of them. Add to this long string of titles those of Rev., B. D., D. D., LL. D., and they would not be sufficient to convince any man that he is a minister of the Gospel. The titles of lodgery outnumber those of the greatest preacher the world has ever known, and, of course, they ought to have the preference in determining his calling. Please send him a sample copy of the Cynosure. Yours truly, A. B.

NOTE.—The interpretation of some of these cabalistic capitals is thus: Free and Accepted Ancient York Masons,—Royal Arch Chapter—Knight Templar—Grand United Order of Oddfellows—Knights of Pythias, Past Grand Keeper of Records and Seals. The last two represent offices in some colored order. What place is left in a mind so filled with Satan's follies, for Christ and his work?

PITH AND POINT.

THE ILLINOIS STATE CONVENTION.

I think that Galva would be a good place to hold the N. C. A. convention. If Mr. Stoddard or some other suitable person could go to Elmira and stir up the United Presbyterian and Gaelic congregations there, we might get many additions to our membership. The Lord who ordained this reform will not suffer it to perish for want of a place or seeming lack of human instrumentality to it forward.—MRS. WEED, Monmouth. Ill.

ABOLISH THE TITLES.

I have said in the past that I would keep my pencil sharp to note the folly, to my mind, of your fallacious titles of honor, "Rev." and "Doctor of Divinity"—unconstitutional, unauthorized in the divine law of him whom we love. "'Tis folly worse confounded," my brethren, for us to assail Masons for their human titles when we are also guilty. I heartily wish that Masonry, with the many other secret societies were abated by law. I am ready to lecture or work in any legitimate way for their overthrow, if I can do so consistently. I have voluntarily lectured against them with good effect in the past, and would resume if arrangements could be made to suit.—JAMES SPRINGER, Springerton, Ill.

COUNT THE COST.

I feel moved by the hand of God for humanity's sake to take a bold stand and to cry out against the lodge. It may be asked, what has renouncing and exposing Masonry done for me? In the first place, it has turned father against son, brother against brother, and those that were once my friends are now my foes. It has ruined my business prospects as far as human aid is concerned; that is to say as far as Masonic influence can reach; and that influence reaches far outside the lodge. When in good Masonic standing there were friends all around, ready to stretch forth their hands to help. To day those very ones are doing all they can to destroy me, though financially better able to cope with the world than a few years ago. That is Masonic charity. How I praise God that he has power to save from this fearful demon. His cleansing blood saves me. Praise his holy name.—D. BENJAMIN, Seymour Lake.

WHAT THE CYNOSURE IS WORTH TO A TOWN.

Do send us your paper for our reading rooms, as it is of so much incalculable value to the people of our town. It is setting so many on the right track.—(Rev.) A. L. RUSE, Berwick City, La.

BIBLE LESSONS.

THIRD QUARTER.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS.

LESSON VIII, Aug. 23, 1885.—Elijah at Horeb.—1 Kings 19: 1-18.

GOLDEN TEXT.—And after the fire a still small voice. 1 Kings 19: 12.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Fear of man is caused by a failure in our faith in God. vs. 1-3. It is very possible that Jezebel threatened simply because in the then excited state of the public mind she did not dare to do more. Wickedness is cowardly, and generally resorts to threats for the reason that it dares not employ actual violence against a good man, knowing that the general sentiment of the community will be on his side. But even were there every reason to suppose that Jezebel, had he remained, would have found some means to compass his death, why not as when he prophesied before Ahab of the coming famine, wait the Lord's word? Better the brook Cherith and the widow's meal barrel than the juniper tree and the cave in Horeb. Men fear the lodge, rulers bow at its bidding, and pulpit and press are muzzled, simply because, like Jezebel, it can threaten. Loss of office, deranged business, divided churches, and diminished salaries are not comfortable threats to face. Yet whenever they are faced, boldly in the name of the Lord, it will be found that he is abundantly able to preserve his own.

2. The Lord is pitiful of his servants' physical weakness. vs.4-8. That Elijah's prayer for death was owing, at least partly, to an exhausted physical frame seems probable from the peculiar form which the answer took. He is not reproved or reasoned with, but miraculously fed by an angel. But it is certainly noteworthy that the lion-hearted prophet who in a moment of weakness fled from a wicked woman to save his life now finds that life so valueless that he prays for death. The whole lesson contains no more important point than this: That life is worth living just in proportion to the courage and faith with which we front its trials and tasks. Death may come to "a brave man doing his duty," but he will never weakly pray for death—still less seek it.

3. God's deepest revelations to men are made by the still small voice of the Spirit. vs. 9-18. Elijah had pressing business in Israel—none in his lonely cave on Horeb. A great reformation had been inaugurated, but at the most critical moment his faith had failed. He himself needed a closer and more personal revelation of God. A great wind rends the mountains, earthquake tears the rocks, fire leaps forth, but God is not in wind, earthquake, or fire, but in the still small voice asking the solemn question, "What doest thou here, Elijah?" It is in the round of daily experience rather than the rush of great events that God speaks to us. The reform is not to stop because Elijah has grown weary and faint-hearted but he is sent to anoint Elisha in his room. However useful or valuable our lives may be, worthy successors are waiting to wear our mantle. "God buries the worker but carries on the work."

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Does the Lord pity our physical weakness? Ps. 103: 13. How does Elijah's prayer for death illustrate a saying of our Saviour's? Luke 17: 33.

"Then Jezebel sent a messenger unto Elijah." Either she sent this messenger privately, unknown to King Ahab, or if he knew it, he was too vascillating and too much under her influence to prevent it. Away from her, he might have been half convinced of the truth. Only a strong character, thoroughly convinced and decided to do right, could, when under the positive influence of such a character as Jezebel, withstand its power. Positive, strong, undoubting convictions are a mighty power for good or evil.—Pel.

It is evident that for the moment Elijah had lost faith in God, otherwise he would certainly have waited for the "Word of the Lord," which had hitherto invariably guided his movements. (1 Kings 17: 2, 8; 18: 1).—Pulpit Com. He who had experienced the sufficiency of the Lord's protection from prince, prophets, and people, now shrinks at last, at the crisis of his highest duty, from the face of a woman, whom his Master could, if he had seen fit, have cut off in a moment. He fled; and, lacking their great guide, and the prime leader in this auspicious movement, the people became discouraged, and the impression made upon the king's mind rapidly cooled down, both relapsing into nearly their former state. Truly in this did Elijah show himself "a man of like passions as we are."—Kitto. The removal from Jezreel into the wilderness should not, as is so often done, be looked on as properly a "flight," a lack of faith, courage and firmness. He recognized in the threat of Jezebel a providential admonition, which, however dark and hard it might appear to him, he did not believe himself at liberty to resist, since no higher direction to remain had come to him. For him, the strong man, firm as a rock, heroic in temper, it was an infinitely more difficult and humiliating duty to give up to the anger of a godless, wicked woman, than to bid her defiance, and make trial of the Lord. He bowed beneath the inscrutable decree, as becomes a true servant of God; and so his going away was an act of faith no less than his appearing before the persecuting Ahab. (18: 15 sq.)—Lange.

"He himself went a day's journey into the wilderness." Elijah did not feel himself safe till he was beyond the territory of Judah, for Ahab might demand him of Jehoshephat (1 Kings 18: 10), with whom he was on terms of close alliance (1 Kings 22: 4). He therefore proceeds southward into the desert, perhaps not yet with any place in view, but simply to be out of reach of his enemies.—Cook.

"I am no better than my fathers." That is to say, "I am a mere weak man, no better nor stronger than those who have gone before me, no more able to revolutionize the world than they."—Cook. These words clearly reveal the great hopes Elijah had formed as to the result of his mission, and his terrible disappointment.—Spence.

He was off his guard, after his glorious and heroic work. "It has been observed of the holy men in Scripture that their most signal failures took place in those points of character for which they were remarkable in excellence. Moses, the meekest of men, 'spake unadvisedly with his lips.' John, apostle of charity, sinned in intolerance; Peter, the brave, in cowardice. If there is anything for which Elijah is remarkable, it is superiority to human weakness. It was this man, so stern, so iron, so independent, that in his hour of trial gave way to a fit of petulance and querulous despondency."—(Robertson)

Observe also how God prepares a table in the wilderness. It is not the first time he has given angel's food in the desert (Ps. 78: 25; Neh. 9: 21; Deut. 8:16).—Rowland. For us, too, and for our hours of lack of faith and despair, God has prepared bread and water which will nourish and quicken the soul. This bread, this water, is his Word, the everlasting Word of God, which is the life of God and strength of God (Matt. 4: 4)—Wirth.

There is a physical basis for our spiritual work. Our bodies are temples of the Holy Ghost, and we must keep those temples in repair. Our life is like a tree which "grows more from heaven than earth," and yet must be well rooted in the ground if it would bear good fruit. This is not the whole cure; the spirit can triumph over the body, and much more is needed than a healthy body. But the wise man never neglects or despises this part of the cure.—Pel.

What dost thou here, Elijah? The inquiry should pursue others who have fled to caves in which they would fain hide themselves from responsibility. (1) It comes to the impenitent in the cave of concealment of their sin. (2) It comes to the penitent in the cave of despondency. (3) It comes to the indolent in the cave of sloth. (4) It comes to the sorrowful in the cave of murmuring.

Go forth, and stand upon the mount. That is, just outside of the cave. This was not fully done till after the still small voice. He began to go forth, went towards the opening so as to see the storm and fire, but not so far as to feel their effects. When he heard the voice he went out of the cave (v 13) and stood in front of it in the open light. The design was that he should receive, as Moses did (Ex 33: 18-34: 7), a revelation of the real nature and character of God through the language of outward symbols and manifestations.—Todd.

"The Lord was not in the wind." This was not his marked and peculiar manifestation. The Lord in one sense is everwhere, but these wild, devastating powers are not the best symbol of his nature nor the greatest expression of his power.

"And he said," etc. The words are the same as in ver. 10, but probably they were spoken in a different tone, and with a different spirit.

"And it shall come to pass," etc. Hazael and Jehu each was God's instrument to punish; each was like the sweeping storm and the devouring fire; each was an engine of destruction; but by neither of these were the hearts of men turned to the Lord. It was the sword of Elisha, the sword of his mouth (cf. Isa. 11: 4; 49: 2; Rev. 1: 16; 2: 16), should constrain men to hide their faces and humble themselves before God.—Pulpit Com.

A WOMAN'S VICTORY;

OR

THE QUERY OF THE LODGEVILLE CHURCH

BY JENNIE L. HARDIE.

This simple and touching story which was lately published in the Cynosure is now ready for orders in a beautiful pamphlet. It is worth reading by every Anti-mason —and especially by his wife. Get it and take it home to cheer the heart of your companion who may desire to do something for Christ against great evils, but is discouraged from making any public effort. Price, fifteen cents. Ten for a dollar

A Wonderful Woman, A Wonderful Life, AND A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Elizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

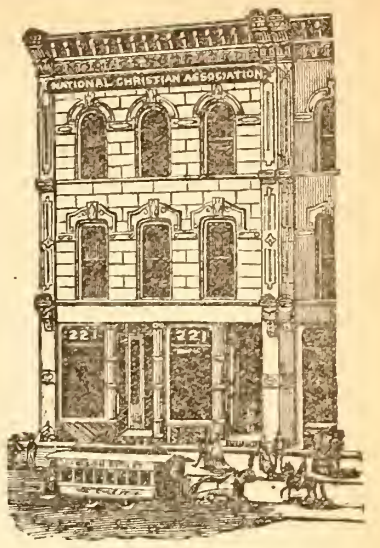
The American Party.

First Nomination for President at Oberlin, Ohio, May 23, 1872.
Platform Adopted at Chicago, June 28, 1872.
Name Adopted at Syracuse, N. Y., June 3, 1874.

PRESIDENTAL CANDIDATES:

1872—Charles Francis Adams and Joseph L. Barlow.
1876—James B. Walker and Donald Kirkpatrick.
1880—J. W. Phelps and Samuel C. Pomeroy.
1884—J. Blanchard and J. W. Conant nominated; the former withdrawing, Samuel C. Pomeroy was nominated. Both nominees withdrawing, the support of the party was generally given to John P. St. John and William Daniel, candidates of the Prohibition party.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.



ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, AUGUST 13, 1885.

"PRAYER AND FASTING" are necessary to make our supplications "effectual" and "fervent." We rejoice that the Lecturers' Convention, appointed to meet at Wheaton, Aug. 17th, is to open with an earnest compliance with Christ's instruction for the casting out of evil spirits, who have been "long time" entrenched in the souls of their victims.

THE CYNOSURE begins to despair of the Telescope and United Brethren printing house. When Bishop Wright was reappointed, and his Star and the Chambersburg paper merged in the new paper at Dayton, we had hoped the Dayton brethren had seen that the lodge must fall, and so would befriend those who were seeking its destruction, But the Telescope gives a decidedly unfriendly notice of the new Conservator; and, having started a Commission to tinker constitution and creed, to divert attention for three years from the lodge-serpent coiling around and poisoning with its fangs the heart of the church, it accuses the Conservator of falling into the snare. We shall see.

REV. DR. C. L. GOODELL, of St. Louis, addressed the annual convention of the American Home Missionary Society at Saratoga, June 3d last, at its opening. His speech was fervid and earnest. He dwelt on the "many adversaries" to Christ's reign on the American continent. Among these he enumerated "the growing heathenism of our great cities," "subtle skepticism among cultivated, and blatant infidelity among all men who have lost their faith and their brains," "strong drink among all ranks," "Socialism," "Sabbath-breaking," "conflict between labor and capital, and the wave of ungodliness and general worldliness induced by wealth," etc. But he failed to mention the net-work of secret orders which either originates or aggravates every one of the perils which he named. We have not the lodge statistics of St. Louis, but up the Ohio river, at Louisville, the colored people alone have eighty secret societies, in which the most moral "brother" with the most immoral classes. These night orders consume more time and money, destroy more virtue, hatch more strikes, and breed more infidelity, "subtle, and "blatant," than all the causes enumerated by Dr. Goodell put together. And they not only produce but are "the heathenism of our great cities." They are religious without Christ, and that is "heathenism," and the prolific mother of heathenism.

THE UNITED BRETHREN STRUGGLE.

On Monday last a "Constitutional" United Brethren convention was to meet in Hartsville, Ind. It was called by Halleck Floyd, L. Davis, David Shuck, H. T Barnaby, Wm. Dillon, and Wm H. Clay We shall report their proceedings.

The Cynosure loves these excellent brethren and bids them Godspeed. The constitution of their church is with them. Before the time when Otterbein left Germany for the United States, which was 1752, Rebold's "History of Freemasonry in Europe," a work dedicated to all the lodges in Europe and America, on page 54, tells us that,

"*The Reformation led by Luther * * * gave the death blow to the Masonic corporations in every portion of the European Continent*"

Otterbein and Behm founded and became bishops of the United Brethren church in 1775. This was fifty-one years before the Morgan murder and excitement. This explains the universal loathing of the secret lodge by German Lutherans. The Brethren church excluded Freemasons from its membership, and declared by its constitution that "joining a Masonic lodge excludes a man from our church." There was no need of trial or process; only to ask if the brother had joined the lodge.

The lodges snaked their way into this church, as Satan into Eden. Then arose the agony which still agitates that communion, and will agitate it till it is all secret or all open, or until it is split; and then there will be war between the pieces, as there would have been between the States if the Union had been divided.

The fight brought to the surface three classes of men: (1.) Those opposed to the lodge leprosy; (2.) Those who would save the church; and (3.) Those who loved the "leeks and garlics" of the secret lodge system. Our Saviour called the church-leaders of his day, who preferred the revenues and success of their church to the "kingdom of heaven" which he preached, "serpents and generation of vipers." Bishops Weaver and Glosbrenner, Drs. Warner and others avowed their motive in seeking a change to be to gain church wealth and popularity, especially in cities: and, while proclaiming their wish to make their church popular in cities where society is governed by the lodge, they had the assurance to declare that they were opposed to secret societies! The Saviour called such church-leaders "hypocrites" and "vipers," and asked them how they expected to "escape the damnation of hell" (Matt. 23: 33): and that, while they "outwardly appeared righteous unto men." For this they crucified him.

The issue between Christ and the "Scribes and Pharisees," was identical with that in this terrible struggle. Like the lodges of the present day, they had a religion without Christ. They would not have him to reign over them. They left him out and took "traditions."

Now it is to be regretted that the friends of Christ in the Brethren church have allowed his contemners to change the issue in debate from simple Christ vs. anti-Christ, to a question of human words and constitutions. The lodge contains neither Father, Son, nor Holy Ghost, and yet promises to restore fallen man to God; not the God of the Bible, but to the Grand Architect or "god of this world." At Fostoria, last May, a majority dropped the real issue between Christ and Satan, and set up a commission of twenty-seven to so revise the constitution and confession of faith as to give peace to the church, WITH FREEMASONRY IN IT! If the secretists were out of the church there was no trouble with the constitution. The reformers (alas!) have accepted this false issue, and the result threatens to be a wordy debate, confusing instead of clearing the minds of men and the discipline of the church. The lodge-sympathizers do not deny that Otterbein, Behm, Geeting, etc., loathed and disfellowshipped the lodge. The Itinerant says of Bishop Wright's Richmond Star, which has been consolidated with the Conservator: "Thus has passed into oblivion another shining light of the radicals." If the Conservator shall allow the "hypocrites" to change the discussion to this or that form of words, the bugle-blast of the Itinerant is not blown in vain. But if they shall dare to follow Christ into his temple—with his "scourge of small cords," upsetting the "tables of the money changers," who prefer "gain to godliness," Christ will cleanse his temple as he would have done eighteen centuries ago, if he had had faithful and fearless followers at his back. The lodge, and Satan, its god, are cowards:

> "And Satan trembles when he sees
> The weakest saint upon his knees."

Let prayer be offered by the church continually, And let brethren be appointed who shall take and print in the Conservator the census of the Masons and other secretists in the Brethren churches. When slavery had chloroformed the Society of Friends, Benjamin Lay seized the young child of a Pennsylvania slave-holding family, slung the child over his shoulders and fled to the woods. When the whole neighborhood, roused by the weeping parents, had followed him to rescue the child, they found him at the house, returned by another route. Thus he taught slave-holding Quakers how their slaves felt to have their children taken from them, however well they might be treated. After that, the Maryland general meeting of Friends lost but a single member in enforcing the emancipation of their slaves, and Benjamin Lay is now a patron saint. The Benjamin Lays are not all dead. Let some of them be sent to canvas the United Brethren church.

SECTS AND SCHISMS.

"The withering condemnation of sectarianism by the apostle must be heeded and obeyed before the church recovers her purity and spiritual power.—J. Blanchard, in Christian Cynosure.

Since sectarianism consists in "adherence to a separate religious denomination," (according to Webster.) therefore the way to get rid of sectarianism is to break off such adherence—leave the sects.—J. F. B.

This is mere destruction.—J. Blanchard.

What reasoning!—Berea Evangelist.

We so love Bro. Fee, and so hate sectarianism, that we reluctantly dissent from what comes in his paper. But if calling on all the Christians in the United States to withdraw from their respective communion tables, without giving them any other, is not "mere destruction," we know not the meaning of words. To form a new sect whose creed is that there shall be no sects, is an absurdity. The land is full of sects who call to us: "Come all and join us, and then there'll be no sect or schism!"

All the present sects, or nearly all, now recognize each others' baptisms, and accept each other's members if they can get them. But few insist on their particular shibboleths and rites, as pre-requisite to admitting decent professors of other communions. The English State Church calls dissenters "brethren;" and even popery begins to concede salvation outside its pale: and this is approaching the oneness in Christ which he prayed for. But if all Christians should to-day unite under one name, and in one organization, local societies would still be rivals and envious as now.

The cure for the divisions of Protestantism is not organization or come-outism, but salvation from sin and error. "If we walk in the light as he is in the light we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin."

In the long agony with slavery we held a convention with Friend Joseph Dugdale at Green Plains, Ohio. There was no village. We let the women occupy the houses, and Friend Joseph put seventy-five men to sleep in a barn loft, on carpets spread on hay. In that long row of sleepers lay Salmon P. Chase, afterwards Governor, Senator, Secretary and Chief-Justice, an Episcopalian; Thomas Morris, then United States Senator; Samuel Lewis, Episcopal Methodist, and other distinguished men. A Baptist preacher lay on one side of the writer, who was then a Presbyterian pastor in Cincinnati, and a Quaker preacher on the other; and no sectarians! The lodge has more money, more men, and more devils than slavery had, and before its myrmidons and janizaries are routed from the church of God, sectarianism will take a Turkish-bath sweat; and a sect-name means no more than "the church of Smyrna," "Sardis," or "Berea." Meantime let Bro. Fee's Evangelist "have free course;" and when he is driven to sleep in a stable-loft, on carpets spread on hay, he will find plenty to come and sleep by his side.

If the Anti-masons were a separate sect to-day, that sect would not be sin-tight; and when we should discipline and exclude offenders, as we must, they would form a new sect. It would greatly help the lodge, to change our issue from assault on idolatry to a war on sects.

THE MISSION SWEDES.

We give below a paragraph from Dr. Hasselquist, President of the Augustana (Swedish) College, Rock Island, Ill. It is to be hoped that Dr. Waldenstrom, the recognized leader of the 100,000 Swedes who have broken loose from the Lutheran State Church in Sweden, is either misunderstood, or else that he himself misunderstands the nature of the lodge which Christians are commanded to disfellowship (See Eph. 5:11). We are also forbidden even to eat with a Christian professor who is an idolator" (1 Cor. 5: 11): and Freemasonry is idolatry; being religious worship without Christ; not commanded by "the Divine Word," and so forbidden by the second commandment, as expounded by the Westminster catechism.

It is mischievous error to hold that a man who has given satisfactory evidence of regeneration must be received or retained in the church after falling into open sin: and idolatry is sin as much as incest.

WALDENSTROM VS. SECRET SOCIETIES.

Recently Ph. Dr. Waldenstrom in Sweden was questioned in regard to the reception of secret-society members into the churches. His answer, published in the magazines, was to the effect that he did not himself belong to any secret society, and dissuaded brethren from uniting; but that a member of a secret society, if a Christian, could not be denied membership in a Christian congregation, and a congregation that refused such a person membership acted in an unchristian manner and made itself unchristian. Is not Mr. W. even in this respect very much like our Congregational friends? H.

THE TENNESSEE CHURCHES RALLYING AGAINST THE LODGE.

Rev. H. Woodsmall, an esteemed Baptist minister whom the Holy Spirit led out of Masonry years ago, wrote in these columns, June 18th last, that light was breaking upon the minds of many of the colored pastors of the South, and by God's grace they were beginning an open and courageous war upon the lodge in their churches. A letter, July 30th, from Rev. B. A. Imes, pastor of the Congregational church in Memphis, Tenn., told us also of a most interesting revival of honest and open dealing against the secret society system in that city. The Living Way of the same date (July 30th), a Baptist paper of Memphis, reveals something of the history of a remarkable movement now progressing among the colored churches of that city. On other pages appear the summons of a lodge addressed to R. N. Countee and the bill of charges against him, followed by a brief explanation and defense; also the report of a debate in the "Memphis Lyceum," between Bro. Countee and a lodge champion from Mississippi. Both articles are from the Living Way, of which Mr. Countee is business manager, being at the same time pastor of the Tabernacle Baptist church on Turley street in that city. The same number contains an earnest appeal to Christians to choose between the lodge and Christ, and the third of a series of articles by Bro. Imes,

Bro. Countee's letter and request for documents on the 6th page proves that this remarkable movement in Tennessee is going on, and we who have long known the unholy influence and ferocious nature of lodgery most warmly sympathize with him in this battle for Christ which he is waging, and can speak for the National Association that every practicable material aid that can be rendered shall be ready. We shall mark with the deepest interest every step in this struggle in Tennessee and report to our readers, whose prayers and sympathies we ask for these brethren who are, in the name of Christ, casting out this lodge demon.

—Our missionary brother and correspondent in South Africa, William Hazenburg, has not been sowing the good seed of truth in vain in that remote region. The other day an order came from E. J. du Goit, Paarl, South Africa, for books with a request for circulars for distribution. Let the light go abroad to the uttermost parts of the earth.

—Rev. C. F. Hawley, the well-known Wesleyan evangelist, has returned home to attend the lecturers' convention and enter the lecture work—where we have not yet learned, but the Minnesota friends have been in correspondence with him. Any State Association might be thankful to secure his services.

—Bro. E. Mathews is ready for work until the court takes up his case in September. He goes to western New York first, and will speak at Ransomville, Niagara county, August 29th and 30th in the Free Methodist church. He will make his home with Bro. Peter D. Miller, Wright's Corners, Niagara county, until Sept. 6th, and will speak at other appointments. As the expense of his trial will be considerable he reasonably looks to his Anti-mason friends to assist him in this way. Let him be kept busy until he must go into court, and pay him well for his work, too. He will speak on the lodge, on temperance, or on labor topics. The never-failing remedy for these evils will be always a part of his lectures. Those who wish to hear him should be prompt in writing him at Wright's Corners, N. Y., and remember he can speak out doors or in, as may be necessary, and never fails to draw the people.

—The Lecturer's Institute, to open next Monday evening, promises to be a meeting of the greatest profit to all who attend, and we therefore hail the invitation of Secretary Stoddard to all who wish to participate in the meetings. Those who do not propose to enter the lecture work can yet attend at their own expense and secure the great advantages of this meeting. Among those whom we expect will make addresses is Mrs. Laura G. Haviland, whose labors in the abolition reform and for the suffering in the war deserve an imperishable monument in the hearts of the American people. The institute will close with a county convention.

—The United Brethren convention at Hartsville, Ind., last week, took the initiatory step toward a national convention which should be the best and greatest our reform has yet known, a convention which should speak to the churches with a voice as potent as that of Elijah to the wavering Hebrews, to call them to a decision and to put away the strange gods they have so long held in unholy embrace in their communion. Such a meeting must come—how long it will be delayed depends much on how we pray. The Arm that overthrew sun worship in Israel in a day, though old Jezebel supported it, can do as much for sun worship in the United States. The power that moves that arm is prayer.

—It was one of the gravest criticisms of Henry Stanley, the African explorer, that he so far exceeded the caution of an explorer as to engage in real battle with the native tribes, whom he slaughtered with impunity with his modern arms. The London Herald of Peace says that recently Mr. Joseph Thomson appeared before the Royal Geographical Society and gave an account of his latest African explorations. He possesses the satisfaction of having accomplished a march of three thousand miles, without losing a single man of his company by violence; nor did he interfere with a single native. Twelve hundred miles of it was new ground, and the information he has brought back is of a very valuable character. His mission ended when he reached the waters of Victoria Nyanza—his starting point being Zanzibar.

AN IMPORTANT DAY.

The anti-secrecy lecturers training class will meet in the President's office in the college at Wheaton, Monday, Aug. 17th, at 7:30 P. M., for organization, consultation and prayer. Tuesday, the 18th, will be observed as a day of fasting and prayer for the blessing of God on our lecturers, agents and agencies, and for the overthrow of the lodges, dram-shops and all forms of evil, and the coming of Christ's kingdom and the doing of his will "on earth as it is in heaven." All Christians and especially all the friends of the N. C. A. work are earnestly requested to join in this specially important service.

"Though sundered far, by faith we meet Around one common mercy seat."

The meeting will hold sessions for one week or more, each day and evening; class exercises will be held each day at 9 A. M., and 3 P. M. in the President's room at the college. The evening sessions will be of a more general character, consisting of addresses by members of the class and others. The local public and all friends from abroad are cordially invited to attend such sessions as may suit their convenience and we can assure our friends and opponents who favor us with their presence, that no grim tyler with drawn sword will met them at the door to dispute their entrance. We have accepted Christ, who "ever spake openly to the world," as our pattern, and as to the Gospel feast so to the sessions of this meeting "whosoever will may come," without money and without price. Pres. J. Blanchard, Pres C. A. Blanchard, Rev. J. Travis, Elder J. F. Browne and Elder J. L. Barlow are among the leading spirits who have promised their presence and the benefit of their instruction at this gathering, which with the Saviour's blessing is sufficient of itself to assure a lasting and happy effect. J. P. Stoddard.

THE NATIONAL CONVENTION OF ANTI-LODGE CHUCHES.

THE UNITED BRETHREN CONVENTION FIRST TO MOVE.

Dublin, Ind., July 8, 1885.

Editor Christian Cynosure,

Dear Bro:—The Constitutional Convention of United Brethren ministers and laymen in their late sitting took the following action:

Preparatory to a call for a general convention of anti-secret churches for the purpose of cultivating closer fraternal relations and of harmonizing more fully in the work of our common Lord and Master, Rev. Halleck Floyd, of Dublin, Ind.; Rev. L. Davis, D. D., of Dayton, Ohio; and Rev. Z. McNew, of Indianapolis, Ind, were constituted a committee to confer with committees which may be appointed by other denominations.

It is desired that the Cynosure give this initial step such notice as may be necessary to bring the matter before its readers, as also all other journals favoring the movement. We had a very successful convention. Yours fraternally,

Halleck Floyd.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

Itasca, Ill, Aug. 10, 1885.

This is an enterprising little town twenty-one miles from Chicago, on the C. M. & St. P. R. R. The principal business is butter and cheese; and, in addition, there is quite a quantity of milk shipped to the city. Dr. E. Smith, now the principal land owner in the town, settled on the wild prairie in 1841, and has lived to see this region filled up with a thrifty population. He is, with his excellent and devoted wife, hale and hearty, enjoying the esteem of his neighbors, a competency of this world's goods and practices to a limited extent among his old patrons and friends. Until recently the town was without a place devoted to religious services. The school house was occupied for a Sabbath-school and occasional meetings, until it came under influences adverse to religion, when both meeting and school had to be abandoned. A house of worship, a very neat and commodious structure, with a capacity equal to the present needs of the village, is now erected. E. O. Nichols, Esq., has been the active spirit in the movement while others have not been wanting in co-operation. Mr. Nichols is a conductor on the C. M. & St. P. R. R., and when the church building was in process of erection procured the use of a car in which to hold religious services on Sabbath. The managers of this road are deserving the commendation of the Christian public for this action, and it should be placed to their credit, and Bro. Nichols merits the thanks of the road and all good people for the course he has taken. Dr. Smith gave the lots on which the church stands, the most sightly and desirable location in town. In addition to this donation he added one-fourth of the entire cost of the building, and he bears the same proportion of the incidental expenses and the support of the minister. With this estimable brother and his energetic companion I passed a most delightful Sabbath and in the absence of their usual supply, Bro. E. R. Worrell, I occupied the pulpit. The evening congregation was full and especially attentive. May God bless and reward and prosper these good and true and faithful workers and liberal givers.

Bartlett.—A few minutes here with Bro. Alex. Thompson, a handshake with Dr. Guild and Rev. Mr. Monroe were an inspiration. I was compelled to forego for want of time the pleasure of meeting Bro. Hench and his companion.

Elgin.—I determined to push on to this place where I could meet the fast train for the city. It was well, for I fell in with Bro. W. Northrop, of Bloomingdale, and besides an agreeable conference, I received his subscription to the Cynosure, to put along with Bro. Elijah Smith's, who is constitutionally opposed to all secret societies and heartily favors Wheaton College, to which he has contributed from time to time. A few minutes at Elgin gave me an opportunity to call on the president of the Y. M. C. A., who gave me a most cordial greeting and will attend a part of the time at the training school at Wheaton next week. My heart was strongly knit to the heart of this earnest young Christian brother as we talked for a few moments of our experience and respective fields of labor. Bro. Weeks will in future be an interested reader of the Cynosure.

Bro. and sister Smith, Bro. Northrop, and Bro. Thompson, expect to attend the Du Page county convention on the 25th inst. Rev. Mr Monroe and Dr. Guild each favor and will attend if practicable.

FROM KANSAS.

Clifton, Kans., July 25, 1885.

Editor Cynosure:—It has been harvest time here during the last month; money is scarce and the people weary. But it is encouraging to find them so ready to turn out to appointments at the country school-houses. I have spoken at five and missed two on account of rain. The attendance was fair and the people very attentive. I have evidence that the truth was favorably received, and a desire expressed at every place, that when the busy season is over and the nights longer, they might hear more on the subject. The way is opening, and prospect encouraging, but how vast the field! Let us pray the Lord of the harvest to send more faithful laborers into every department of his vineyard.

R. Loggan.

The Catholic Examiner boastingly says: "Catholic mothers are training the future rulers of this country." It lets the cat out of the bag by further boasting that "upward of ten thousand Protestant children are attending Catholic Educational Institutions in the United States." This is the kind of food that will choke the silly Protestants who are thus giving ground for more insolent bragging in the assertion that "it is now apparent that at the present rate, very few Protestant churches will be open in a decade or two." It is time for Protestants to heed the admonition thus given, and at the opening of the school year, rescue these ten thousand of their children from such a doom.—St. Louis Evangelist.

A gentleman who has had not a little to do with the education of the colored people of the South remarks that one great difficulty is the pernicious influence of a sort of cheap, pictorial literature. In some cabins the walls are papered with portions of the Police Gazette and other such vile publications, and the minds of the young early become accustomed to the hateful images thus thrust upon them. It were well if the example of Texas, South Carolina, Virginia and West Virginia were followed in all the South, as well as in many more States of the North, and the sale of the meretricious literature were vigorously prohibited.

—Miss Caroline F. Whiting, principal of Grammar School No. 14, New York City, celebrated the fiftieth year of her service as a teacher, June 6. The room was decorated with flowers and her desk covered with bouquets. She has had as many as 10,000 pupils under her care. Some of the grandchildren of her first pupils are now attending her school. Mrs. Abram S. Hewitt had charge of the celebration. A letter was read from Whittier, regretting his inability to be present. The sum of $1,000 was presented to her, which will, at her request, go to the founding of a hospital library. Peter Cooper and Lindley Murray were members of the Board of Education when she began teaching. Letters and telegrams of congratulation were received from all over the world.

The Home.

AFTERWARDS.

Hebrews 12: 11.

Not now, but "afterward" will be revealed
The precious fruit of peace and righteousness,
The bud, the flower, in God's hand lie concealed,
The hand that smites and chastens but to bless.
And while beneath the storm we bow the trembling head,
The stricken heart is dumb, and every hope seems dead,
E'en then is ripening, 'mid chilling darkness drear,
The sweet fruit we shall gather, but not now, not here!

John 13: 7.

Not now, hereafter only shall we understand
Those things which now we gaze on in surprise,
Mysterious dealings of His mighty hand,
Which to our feeble and sin-blinded eyes,
Seem passing strange, oft hard, and oft call forth the cry,
"What dost thou, O Master? Why is this and why
May I not understand?" While Jesus whispers low:
"To-day, trust me, my child—hereafter thou shalt know."

John 16: 12, 13.

Another time—not now—will Jesus speak
Those wondrous words he hath for us in store,
Things which to bear our spirits are too weak,
And which would crush us with their heavenly power;
But when to list'ning saints the Spirit doth reveal
The secret of the Lord, then, yes then shall we feel
That his own time was best, that hearts need to be taught
Before they can receive the truth which he has brought.

1 John 3: 2.

And then! ah, then shall we at last behold
Our Saviour's face—no longer veiled and dim,
But radiant, glorious, brighter than fine gold,
Himself, just as he is—and face to face with him,
While lost in love and wonder we adore
The One who lives and reigns for evermore,
Behold! ourselves transformed, we'll stand before his throne,
Seeing him, be like him, and know as we are known!

Am. Messenger.

A WASTED LIFE.

Down on the Jersey coast the pastor of a small church died the other day. His church was a little brown shanty, set down on the marshes, his flock a few poor fishermen and crabbers, with their wives and barefoot children. Naturally, there was but very little stir in the world when the old Dominie went out of it, and yet there had once been strange lights and promise shining into his life. When Amos Dunn was graduated, some fifty years ago, Harvard College waited expectant, ready to write him down one of her successful sons. He began to practice law in New York with remarkable good fortune. Four years later he was "converted." The whole flood of his energy and enthusiasm turned into a new direction. In spite of the protests of his friends he gave up his profession and studied for the ministry.

"I must serve God. I must do what good I can," he urged. "Why else am I here?" His father was a man of large political and social influence. The trumpets were blown loudly before young Dunn. When he began to preach the church was crowded. He had exceptional learning and a certain fiery eloquence which swept his hearers with him almost against their will. He married a girl whom he dearly loved, a gentlewoman, without a penny. Children came fast. His father died insolvent, to the amazement of the town. But what were riches? He had his work for God in hand, and his salary would support wife and children.

Down in some prison or slum, doing his work, he contracted a low fever, which left him at the verge of death. His congregation gave him a year s vacation. But at the end of the year he was still unable to preach. His voice had sunk to a hoarse whisper, and his sight was almost gone. They were very patient and kind. But the powerful pulpit orator was gone, of whom they had been so proud, and in his place was a feeble, broken invalid. He resigned and gradually sank out of notice. For a few years he tried clerical work, then teaching, and at last, his voice coming partially back to him, accepted a call to this church on the Jersey beach. "We may want the necessaries of life," he said to his wife, "but life itself—work for God, remains."

For forty years the man did his work faithfully. But when life was nearly over, and the old Dominie, as they called him, summed it up, he could lay his hand on no results. He had been a man of learning, feeling, and fine poetic fancy. This man his parishioners did not and never could know. They were illiterate and coarse grained. Their thoughts ran in low, muddy channels. They wanted from him on Sundays a discourse on some dogma, in which all sects that differed from them "got some hard whacks." For the rest, he was to marry them and bury their dead. They paid him just as they paid for the wedding-cake or the coffin. "And dog-goned easy he earns his money," observed his principal deacon.

He could not always keep the man he was at soul buried out of sight. Sometimes the surge of feeling within broke into words, and they had a glimpse of his pasionate love of nature, his devotion, his rapture of faith. They listened with gaping amazement and contempt, and set him down as "craeked," as the canny Scotch did Irving. When he drew near to death they were kind, for they are a warm-hearted folk. But they were secretly relieved that they were done with the queer old man, and would get "a real rantin', tearin' man of God that could wrestle with the Methodists tooth and nail."

Old Amos used to creep to the beach this summer and sit for hours looking at the great gray plain of the sea with its eternal plash, plash upon the shore, wondering what good his work had done the people? Or his children? He had educated his two sons and sent them out into the world. They had not inherited his talents nor his temperament. They were sharp, practical makers of money—nothing more. Early in childhood they recognized their errand into life and they never turned from it since. They were both well-to-do, pushing business men in the far West. As for self-sacrifice, or tender affection, or working to make the world better or purer, these words were idle to them as the crackling of thorns. They had a half-contemptuous pity for their visionary, unpractical father, measuring the success of his life by his $400 salary.

The old man did not see he had sacrificed his life to give lesser men than himself a place in the world. But he knew that his work had been wasted on them. All his life's work had gone for nothing, like this eternal cry, cry of the sea to the hard shore. The answer had never come. So one day, with the cheerless cry still in his ears, he died.

A few days later two strangers came down to this lonely bit of coast, one a man who stands high in the respect and love of the nation, a man who, again and again, has helped to keep the country on the side of justice and humanity. "I brought you here," he said to his friends, "to see this old man who is dead. I spent a summer here years ago. It was a critical time of my life. He was my salvation. His humility, his patience, his lofty faith moved me as the sight of the old martyrs must have done the heathen. If I have done anything to help the world it is to him I owe it. I often meant to write and tell him so. But I never did."

But the old Dominie had gone to the land where he knows the answer to all lives, and knows that no good work in God's just world is lost.—Philadelphia Press.

THE AGED AND THEIR SORROWS.

It is a mournful fact that as age advances on a man, he is less able, unless God shall help him, to bear the sorrows, disappointments, anxieties, and cares of life, than he was in his halcyon days. And then it often happens that these various ills multiply as he descends the declivity of his pilgrimage, so that some of the most pitiable sights we ever behold are some of these old men on whom these varied ills have accumulated to the last degree, with no corresponding strength to bear them. Alas, in how many cases does the "silver chord" snap under this terrible pressure! How many worthy men have we known who might have lived many years, judging after the manner of men, but who gave way under the tenfold power as the infirmities of age came upon them! Dear reader, these "days of darkness will come and they shall be many!" Prepare to meet them. You will need all the resources which your faith, and courage, and patience can store away in your multiform experience to meet with a manly spirit the days of adversity that lie between you and the final goal. Think! it is far easier to do the will of God, than to suffer his will. Hence more stress is laid upon suffering than doing. The brightest types of piety that have ever gone from earth to heaven, have literally gone through floods and flames. Even in this world, we always measure true heroism by the intervening embarrassments, obstacles, trials, it overcomes to compass its purpose; for so soon as these opposing forces cease, the man ceases to be a hero. And is it not much more so as viewed from the heavenly world? Will not that saint be accounted worthy of double honor who not only meets with fidelity the ordinary duties of his calling, but who confronts with an unfaltering faith the darkest clouds, and endures with unmurmuring patience the most crushing calamities? Deal tenderly with, speak gently to, the old man, bowed down, not only under the weight of years, but of calamities of which you little dream! You may be ministering to one who shall stand, ere you meet him again, on the sea of fire among the white vested throng! You may be cheering the heart and steadying the footsteps of one who is just on the eve of passing up to the sun-bright clime where "there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying," and when the former things shall give place to the fruitions of glory!—Christian Index.

ARE WE TO WAIT FOR THE SPIRIT?

The command of the risen Lord to his disciples was, "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem, until ye be endued with power from on high." Is this command appropriate to us? It was uttered at a time when "the Holy Ghost was not yet given, for Jesus was not yet glorified." The first disciples were to "wait for the promise of the Father." They were to tarry until they were endued with power from on high. But is the church of Christ still waiting for that promise? Has it not long ago been fulfilled? Has not the Comforter come, and made his abode in the church, to depart thence no more? If this be the case, then there is no command for the church to await the coming of the Comforter who is already here; nor to tarry for the outpouring of that Spirit, which long ago was poured "upon all flesh."

The presence of the Holy Spirit is to be recognized in the earliest dawnings of conviction for sin; for he convinces "of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment." And those who are truly thus convinced, and are converted, have felt the power of the Holy Ghost; for "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost." Hence those who really confess him as their Lord, do it under the power and direction of the Holy Spirit. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." This guidance of the Holy Spirit is one of the marks of sonship and heirship. "The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost;" and if we are destitute of that indwelling love, we are unsaved; for "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of his." Hence to deny the presence of the Holy Ghost in our hearts is to confess ourselves "none of his."

Surely, then, no Christian is justified in waiting for the coming of the Holy Spirit. Persons who have not been converted, whether in the church or out, should seek the Lord, and wait for the Holy Ghost; but Christians have something else to do. A better understanding of the word of God should teach Christians to "quench not the Spirit" which so often prompts to service which they refuse to perform; and to "grieve not the Holy Spirit of God," by which they are sealed unto the day of redemption, and who, doubtless, is often grieved by worldliness, frivolity, vanity and sin. There is no need to wait for the coming of some new, strange power. It is for us to confess our sins and shortcomings, and honestly seek, as in his own presence, to know and do the will of God.

The Holy Spirit is here! It is only because our eyes are blind, and our ears are dull of hearing, that we fail to catch the impulse of his ever-present power, and to be humbly led in obedience to Divine control. And if men, instead of crying to God to send the Holy Ghost—as if he had forgotten to be gracious and failed to fulfill his promises—would turn from the forbidden paths which they tread, and from the worldliness in which they are absorbed, they would find that God is not very far from every one of them; and that the Holy Ghost, ever present in that church which is "builded together for an habitation of God through the Spirit," still helpeth the infirmities of the people of God, and guides, and keeps, and sanctifies his saints.—The Christian.

"None of us can prevent the sun from shining, but all of us can prevent the sun from shining on us. The great orbit of day still floods the earth with undimmed luster; but we can shut ourselves away from his beams, in caves and holes of the earth. So we may shut ourselves away from that Sun of the soul who lighteth every man that cometh into the world. We cannot make God less loving, less merciful, less gracious than he is; but we can stand apart from that love, that mercy, that grace. 'Behold the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save; neither his ear heavy, that it cannot hear; but your iniquities have separated—are separating—between you and your God, and your sins have hid his face from you, that he will not hear.' Would you have the Sun shine on you? Tear down the wall and roof of separation which you have built between you and him."—S. S. Times.

THE BAREFOOT BOY.

Blessings on thee, little man,
Barefoot boy with cheek of tan!
With thy turned-up pantaloons,
And thy merry-whistled tunes:
With thy red lip, redder still,
Kissed by strawberries on the hill,
With the sunshine on thy face,
Through thy torn brim's jaunty grace;
From my heart I give thee joy!—
I was once a barefoot boy!—
Prince thou art—the grown-up man
Only is republican.
Let the million-dollared ride!
Barefoot trudging at his side,
Thou hast more than he can buy
In the reach of ear and eye,—
Outward sunshine, inward joy;
Blessings on thee, barefoot boy!

* * * * * * * *

Cheerily then, my little man,
Laugh and live as boyhood can!
Though the flinty slopes be hard,
Stubble speared the new-mown sward,
Every morn shall lead thee through
Fresh baptisms of the dew;
Every evening from thy feet
Shall the cool wind kiss the heat;
All too soon these feet must hide
In the prison cells of pride,
Lose the freedom of the sod,
Like a colt's for work be shod,
Made to tread the mills of toil,
Up and down the ceaseless moil,
Happy if their track be found,
Never on forbidden ground;
Happy if they sink not in
Quick and treacherous sands of sin.
Ah! that thou could'st know thy joy,
Ere it passes, barefoot boy.

EMPEROR AND PRISONER.

In the gray of an early morning, during the reign of good Joseph II. of Austria, a strange scene occured in one of the streets of the old city of Presburg. We can forgive history much of its dry detail and stiff formality when it also records for us heart-touching incidents of real life like this that we have here to tell.

The nearly silent street, flanked by its two rows of tall houses, most of the blinds and shutters still closing the windows at that early hour, was being swept by a gang of convicts, brought each morning through the prison gates for the purpose. In the line of prisoners was an old man whose hair and beard were white as silver, and whose ugly uniform did not wholly hide a certain stateliness of bearing, which he, however, did not allow to hinder his work. But in spite of his prepossessing look and manner, it was to be noticed that only he of all his wretched companions dragged at his leg a chain, weighted by a heavy bullet. Yet it seemed impossible to believe that he excelled in crime the repulsive-looking wretches about him.

As the work of cleaning the streets progressed, the thoroughfare, in spite of the early hour, came at last to have one passer-by. A tall, elderly man, very plainly dressed, but wearing a kind of uniform, advanced along one of the pavements, and as he looked at the gang of sweepers his eye quickly singled out the old prisoner. This observer seemed soon to notice that although the white-haired, aged man, in spite of having the chain and ball to drag, managed by sheer exertion to keep up with the others in his work, the overseer was nearly always shouting at him in anger, and finding fault without cause. The spectator stepped into the road to the old man's side.

"What," he asked, "is your crime, that you are treated in this way?"

The old prisoner at the sound of a voice which had in it a tone of pity, looked up and stood still, resting his broom upon the stones. It was a terrible story of persecution and cruelty he had to tell. He belonged to a distant province, and his position there answered to the class in England called "yeoman;" he having been owner of a small property of his own. But, most unfortunately for him, the farm lay on the skirt of the great estate of Count ——, and this nobleman had fixed an envious eye upon its scanty fields, as King Ahab did long before on Naboth's vineyard. Their owner, prizing the spot as having been the home of his forefathers, refused to sell it to the Count. From that hour began his persecution. One legal process was served upon him after another, costs being run up at every stage. In the end he was fairly ruined, and was forced to agree to sell the farm to the rapacious nobleman, but he bar gained that he was to remain in the house for one year more. One day soon after this he was standing at his gate, deep in grief at the prospect. A wounded hare unexpectedly ran by, and without thinking what he was doing, he instinctively raised his stick and put the poor creature out of his pain. At that moment the Count's servants came up and arrested him on the spot, and although he had not laid a finger upon the hare he was taken to prison. There he lay for six months before he was tried, and when he was placed before the judge the influence of the wicked Count secured his being sentenced to two years' imprisonment. In the meantime his wife and children were turned out of the house and plunged into utter poverty.

"That, sir," concluded the aged prisoner, "is my history."

"But can this persecution be possible?" asked his sympathizing listener; "why is your emperor not informed of it?"

"Oh," sighed the old man, getting his broom again in motion, "the emperor is far away; and besides, in a quarrel with a nobleman a poor man like myself must be in the wrong."

"I will see the governor of your prison," was the next remark.

"Nay, nay, sir," the prisoner hastened to say, in a trembling voice; "pray do not try to intefere in my favor. A person once did so, and as the result, I suffered fifty lashes, and have had to drag this heavy chain. Do not speak for me, or I shall suffer for it."

Another voice now broke in, speaking in loud, harsh tones. "There you are again, you lazy fellow, chattering away your time instead of working. Have you found another soft-hearted fool to listen to your whining? Do you wish another fifty lashes, and a chain and bullet for your other leg?"

The brutal speaker was the overseer, and he raised his stick to strike the old man. But the gentleman parried the blow with his walking-cane, sending the truncheon flying.

"Sirrah," exclaimed the furious overseer, "I will arrest you for daring to interfere with an official. You are a prisoner, sirrah!"

Leisurely the stranger unbuttoned his surtout, disclosing to view a glittering star upon his breast. It was the Emperor Joseph himself. He was accustomed, when traveling, to walk out alone, early and late, seeing things with his own eyes.

"Mercy! mercy!" cried the terror-stricken overseer, falling upon his knees.

"Away!" replied the emperor. "Lead me this moment to the governor."

The governor sank into a panic still worse than that of the overseer on hearing that the emperor had entered the jail. He, however, stammered out that the blame rested with the judge, who was a great friend of the count.

"O great God above, what villainy!" exclaimed the emperor. "But woe be to him who now injures a hair of that old man."

Hurrying back to his castle, the emperor ordered the judge to be summoned before him. The result was that the judge was put into prison, where he first of all received fifty lashes, answering to those he had, by his unjust sentence, inflicted on the old man; next the chain and cannon ball was transferred from the innocent prisoner's leg to his own, after which he was made to clean the streets of Presburg like other convicts. And among his companions in this task he soon found out the ex-governor and the ex-overseer; the latter of whom now found the stick he had so mercilessly ill-used often coming down upon his own back.

Nor did the good emperor stop here in doing justice; he sent for the liberated old man, and thus addressed him:

"I will make you the governor of the jail, believing that you, who have suffered the barbarous cruelties of persecution, will show humanity to the prisoners under you. Farewell! Collect your family around you, and may God bless you!"

Before the amazed old man could thank the just, God-fearing emperor, the door of the apartment had closed upon him.—Day and Rest.

—Mexico supplies a notable instance of the immense influence of which the printed Gospel is capable. A missionary of the Presbyterian Board writes, that in a certain neighborhood where for six years the press had preceded him with its thorough, though silent work, within a radius of thirty-five miles, he has been able to gather sixteen congregations, with a membership of nearly four thousand persons.

The publisher of the East Oregonian had a subscriber who repudiated $1.56, claimed to be due for the paper. The delinquent was saucy and the newspaper men got upon their mettle and sued the aforesaid delinquent. The case was fought by nine lawyers for the defense and two for the prosecution. The plaintiffs got a verdict for the amount claimed, and the defendant had to foot a cost bill amounting to $74, besides the fees of nine lawyers. The moral of this case is that those indebted to newspapers for subscription will find it more economical to call and settle than to attempt repudiation.—Ex.

TEMPERANCE.

PROHIBITION IN IOWA.

A correspondent of the Inter-Ocean at Anamosa, Iowa, writes of the success of the new law against liquor: "In nearly all the small towns the new law is rigidly enforced, as in Jones county. There is not an open saloon that sells liquor over the bar in Jones county, as but a few years ago Anamosa had four, Monticello four or five, and other towns in like proportion, while to-day they are all closed. To be sure, we receive no revenue. But look! only a few short years ago, liquor cost Jones county thousands of dollars in prosecuting a murder suit, and finally one of the murderers got clear.

"In Buena Vista county there is a decrease in saloons, drunkenness and crime. The law is as well enforced now as at first. The Republicans as a rule are well satisfied with it. Whiskey, beer, etc., can not be obtained easily. In some places the law is not so rigidly enforced, however, as it might be, yet among several thousand people present at Storm Lake on the Fourth of July, not one was seen under the influence of liquor.

"In Dubuque county the law is enforced in, we might say, all the cities and towns save Dubuque. In Jackson and Clinton counties the law is well enforced, save in the instance of the cities on the river, and even there it is not sold openly.

"In Linn, Osceola, Allamakee, and Calhoun counties the law is a perfect success, as in the remaining counties. The following report of the success of prohibition in Ringgold county is taken from the Cedar Rapids Gazette of July 24th:

"Mount Ayr, July 23.—The law is a complete success in our county. The comparison in regard to saloons is that before the new law we had saloons in every town and city in the county, whereas under the new law there is not one saloon in the county. They have all left. Several drug stores that sold intoxicants have closed and left the State. There is one indictment under the new law to twelve before. The law is equally as well enforced now as at first. Republicans are well satisfied with the law, and also a good many Democrats. Whiskey and beer cannot be bought in the county except on prescription; crime is on the decrease largely; our sheriff hunted two men that had committed murder in this county eighteen years ago, to have cases enough to have a district court at the usual time.

"As to the most prominent candidate for governor, Wm. Larabee seems to be ahead in the minds of the politicians here. The Democrats talk Dan Stubbs, but they are very quiet.

"Forest City, July 22.—The prohibitory law works well, better than we had expected at first. It was not closely observed for a time, but last winter a whiskey revolution took place here in Forest City. Two druggists and one saloon-keeper were sued; the intoxicating liquors were turned out of their casks upon the street by our sheriff. There is not much intoxication here at present; no saloons where such can be obtained at present, though it is smuggled slightly by private citizens. No drunkenness on the 4th, and I have only seen one drunk since. This place and county used to be notorious for drinking people, but I believe it was the banner county of the State in voting for prohibition. The Republicans as a rule, I believe, are very well satisfied with it. Lake Mills (300 inhabitants perhaps) was a very bad place years ago; now it is very fair, not, however, as good as the county seat. The reports from the country are that no liquor is being sold. If any is obtained it is purchased in the towns. In short, prohibition works well.

"We might go on and give a list of all the counties in the State, but it is not necessary to prove that on the whole prohibition is a grand success."

In five years Iowa has gained 606,000 in population. We shall see whether the people are going to refuse to move to Iowa and raise their children because whiskey is not free, and "personal rights" to raise paupers is refused by the law. Prophecies of evil have been freely made by the prostration to business resulting from what are called its "sumptuary laws," but bad effects are nowhere apparent. If the cause of temperance could be kept separate from the domain of party politics, and the people of all parties unite in protecting themselves and their children from the rule and ruin of the saloon, no one can doubt the result to the State.—Inter-Ocean.

The Churches.

—Secretary Stoddard preached on the Sabbath in the Presbyterian church at Itasca, a suburban town northwest of Chicago.

—Elder Isaac Hiatt rejoices in another cheering accession to his church in Gilford Village, N. H. "Six," he writes, "were baptized, making eighteen who have been baptized and received into the church since the first Sabbath in last June. We humbly ask the people of the Lord to praise him and continue to pray earnestly for us."

—Rev. David W. Fall of the Chambers Street Reformed Presbyterian church, Boston, is, with his family, spending a vacation in Somerset, Nova Scotia.

—Rev. H. Woodsmall, formerly of Selma, Alabama, has for some time been engaged in missionary work among the colored churches. He is to attend the Baptist State Convention at Brinkley, Arkansas, August, 19th, and he is to spend a considerable portion of his time in that State. His home for the year is at Iuka, Miss.

—Dr. Samuel Collins, president of the N. C. A. National Convention, is now at Ocean Grove, N. J. Revs., James Harper, of Philadelphia, and R. W. Kidd, of New York, are with him.

—Pres. J. B. McMichael, of Monmouth College, is preaching regularly for a season at Keokuk, Iowa.

—The labors of Friends have reached, and the Gospel has been preached, to a greater or less extent, to the following tribes and portions of tribes: Shawnees, Quapaws, Kaws, Cherokees, Osages, Sacs and Foxes, Iowas, Modocs, Cheyennes, Senecas, Arrapahoes, Wyandotts, Ottawas, Potawattomies, Tonkowas and Mexican, Kickapoos, Kiowas and Comanches. There are now fifty-four Friends who are carrying on this work.

—Prof. Wm. G. Frost, of Oberlin, the Prohibition candidate for Lieutenant Governor of Ohio, is supplying the pulpit of Plymouth church, Milwaukee, during the pastor's vacation.

—The family of Rev. Geo. S. Bascom, of Vermillion, Dakota, have just been called to mourn the loss of the only remaining daughter, who died July 22d, of malarial fever. She was a child whose amiability, intelligence and piety had greatly endeared her to her friends.

—The Rev. A. C. George, pastor of the Langley Avenue Methodist church, Chicago, died at the residence of his son-in-law at Englewood, Friday morning. His death takes from the Methodist ministry one of the leading preachers of that denomination.

—The Rochester, N. Y., barbers have voted to close their establishments on the Sabbath.

—There are seventy-one Lutheran ministers working in Dakota Territory, serving over two hundred congregations.

—The second Presbyterian church of Cincinnati has extended a call to Dr. Geo. P. Hays, of Denver, Col., to become their pastor.

—A clergyman of Burlington, N. J., declares that hereafter he will not marry a man whom he knows to be intemperate.

—The Rev. Geo. F. Pentecost, of Brooklyn, has been preaching in the United church at New Haven. He was accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Stebbins, the celebrated Gospel singers. Sixteen hundred people attended services in the evening. It is with deep regret that the people of New Haven part with Mr. Pentecost, who now goes to his summer home at Northfield, Mass.

—Lord Salisbury will not listen to proposals to disestablish the Scottish church, and it is said the Queen approves his conduct.

—A Young Men's Christian Association has been started in Madrid, Spain, and is much needed to save young men amid temptations that are numerous and powerful.

—In Petersburg, Va., there are now fifteen colored men seeking admission to the ministry of the Episcopal church, and undergoing a course of theological training under the charge of a teacher appointed and supervised by the trustees of the Theological Seminary of Virginia.

—A series of Gospel meetings is being held in Boston under the auspices of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, the Boston Y. M. C. A., and some of the local churches. A tent has been pitched on a vacant lot on Union Park street, and there meetings are to be held every night except Saturday. The Rev. E. W. Bliss, the evangelist has charge of the enterprise, and is assisted by prominent clergymen of different denominations. The opening services, July 19, were well attended.

—The Church Missionary Gleaner reports that several notable conversions from Mohammedanism have occurred within the past year: one, a famous preacher against Christianity, at Calcutta; another, a medical man in Punjab; third, a medical man from Bombay; fourth, a hitherto bigoted Afghan lad at Peshawai; a fifth from Madras; three in Kashmere. These are only the prominent converts among many others. The statement so often repeated that no converts are made from Mohammedanism is a thing of the past. The coming years are to witness their reception into the Christian church in increasing numbers.

—In the midst of hopeful religious progress among the Telugus there is, on the part of opposers of the Christian faith, a new enthusiasm. Mr. Thomssen reports in the Baptist Missionary Magazine, that during the last few months many houses have been burned by the heathen, and in almost every village among the Telugus people appear bearing idol-houses on bamboos, with drums and shouts, seeking to arouse the people to a defense of their ancient faith. The Christians are severely treated, and yet on the whole they are standing firm. It is said that there has not been such a revival of idolatry in the land for forty years.

—Rev. S. M. Jefferson, appointed by the Christian Foreign Mission Society as a pioneer missionary to Congo, visited Mr. Stanley and others in London, for the purpose of obtaining information in regard to establishing a mission. He obtained the following facts: That the best locality for a mission is on the Upper Congo. The climate is healthful, the soil fertile, and the people willing to receive the truth. But in order to carry on a mission three stations must be established at a cost of ten thousand per annum. A steamer at a cost of $15,000 on the Upper Congo would be necessary, besides a thousand dollars per annum for current expenses. Mr. Jefferson disposed of his outfit and returned home, deeming it wise not to attempt a new mission at such a cost while there are so many other places easy of access as much in need of the Gospel.

—Meetings for the consideration of the second coming of Christ have been held in Neufchatel, Switzerland, recently. The eager attendance of the public and its sustained attention, prove how largely this subject is occupying the thoughts of many Christians. Professor Godet expounded the subject with extreme lucidity, completeness, and soberness. He was careful not to construct an anticipatory history of the future, lest we should fall into the error of the Jews, who had formed so complete a picture of the Messiah's appearance that they were unable to recognize in the person and work of Jesus the execution of the expected programme. Professor Godet thinks the saints will not escape the privilege of bearing witness in the fierce persecution of Antichrist.—Journal Religieuz.

BOSTON FREE SPEECH.

The "Preaching on the Common" case has been advanced another round on the court ladder. Judge Aldrich, before whom the cases came in the Superior Court. must have concluded that he was looking down on a singular scene. There were decorous preachers of the Gospel arrayed as for a grave offense. There were the zealous Salvationists in their fiery uniform. The Judge declared that the city, in the interests of order, had a right to pass an ordinance requiring preachers to obtain a license. The ordinance, he said, did not concern preaching alone, but provides that no person shall without permission deliver a sermon, lecture, address or discourse on the Common. The judge was somewhat sarcastic and thought every citizen, and every Christian citizen especially, ought to obey the law. A good citizen should obey the government and not set up a government within a government. These pious but naughty law-breakers, not having the opinion of the Judge on their side, were overshadowed with that terrible word, "Guilty." The various cases before the courts have been variously settled, by fine and by compromise, while the case of H. L. Hastings was "continued." W. F. Davis "appealed." The grave fathers on the bench of the Supreme Court will now bend their wigs down to this subject and examine it. If the city ordinance requiring a "permit" that one may stand on the Common and speak of Christ, be pronounced constitutional, then there should be no obstructions in the preacher's path to the possession of his "license." After the squabble in the papers and the courts, there is no more difficulty to-day, in obtaining this license than a permit to sell whiskey. It is reported though, that the Y. M. C. A. has not hitherto found it easy to obtain permission to hold religious open-air services. Are beer-saloons to be licensed more readily than the Gospel of Jesus Christ?—Christian Intelligencer.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

—The United Order of Bricklayers and Masons held a meeting a few days since in Chicago at which it was announced that the Treasurer, William Star, had decamped with funds of the association in his possession to the amount of $4,107.83. Some kind of "broken reed" it is that every lodge member will find himself leaning upon.

—The window-glass workers' convention met lately at Pittsburg and perfected a federation of all the window-glass workers in the world. James Campbell of Pittsburg was elected president of the universal organization, the office of which will be at Charleroi, Belgium.

—The Miners' Union of Pennsylvania met on the 22d ult in Pittsburg. President Harris stated that since last October he has increased the membership in the anthracite regions nearly 15,000. Some of the Pittsburg delegates favored annexation with the Knights of Labor, but the eastern delegates were strongly opposed to such action.

—Judge J. G. Rogers of the Superior Court in this city, is an Odd-fellow and a Past Grand Master. E B. Sherman, another Past Grand, is Master is Chancery in the United States Court in Chicago.

—Ex Governor Hamilton of Illinois has lately been helping form Knights of Pythias lodges.

—It is announced that the Masonic Grand Lodge of Canada, which was in session lately at Hamilton, has decided that a Quaker cannot be a Mason; also that no person can be initiated who does not believe in God. An Indian not franchised can be admitted into the order.

—On St. John's Day at Iowa Falls, Iowa, Past Grand Master E. A. Guilbert, of Dubuque delivered an address. A local paper says: "It was a masterly and searching history of the idea of organization as exemplified in Masonry from its inception in the remote ages of the past. He dwelt at some length on the miraculous birth, meteoric career, and noble life and martyrdom of St. John the Baptist. It was an able exposition of some of the teachings of this most ancient and honorable order." This P. G. M. would do well to patronize the Grand Lodge library and confer with Grand Secretary Parvin about Masonry in the remote past.

—A correspondent of the Inter Ocean tells some family secrets of the Knights of Pythias, which will not exalt that order in the minds of outsiders: "There is no thinking member of the order of Knights of Pythias in this State but has long since come to the conclusion that, in the conduct of our Grand Lodge, our system is sadly out of gear. Some years ago, under circumstances of which the least said the better, the very pernicious system of 'turning the crank' and moving each officer, from the door to the chair, up one notch, was begun—the politician got into our body, and as a result the availability, and not the capacity of the aspirant was canvassed. It was found that by advocating rotation all the holders of office supported the party who favored the elevator system; hence, to be otherwise brought one face to face with a solid opposition from the element in office, and with them their friends. The advocates of the theory have since, many a time and oft, had to sugar-coat their prescription, and scramble for the outer door.

THE
CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE
A NEATLY PRINTED SIXTEEN PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL, UNSECTARIAN AND OPPOSED TO SECRET SOCIETIES.

THE POLE STAR OF REFORM.

EVERY Christian, every Prohibitionist and every Patriot should read it for the following among other reasons:

1. Because it meets the wants of the general public by giving in brief the latest reliable information on all questions of Reform, having the special object of exposing and opposing organized secrecy. Besides able editorial, contributed and selected articles upon this topic, which is of more than national importance, it has interesting sketches of progress and incidents from the reform lecturers in all parts of the country, reform news and notes, letters from the Old World, etc., etc. It is the especial organ of this movement in America—a movement which is sustained by the utterances of some of the ablest statesmen and divines whom the country has produced. Every person interested in either the family, government, or religion—the most sacred interests of humanity—is directly affected by secret societies, and needs to keep posted in this movement.

2. Because it is uncompromising on ALL questions of the day. On temperance, tobacco, Sabbath desecration, Mormonism, the Southern and Indian questions, civil-service reform, monopolies, the rights of labor, and every other question, its only aim is to be RIGHT, and advocate the TRUTH. It is hence FEARLESS and OUTSPOKEN.

2. Because it emphasizes the fact that political action should be directed by conscience enlightened by the WORD and SPIRIT of God and that Christ must be acknowledged KING of NATIONS, and presents a platform epitomizing the science of civil governments based on the supreme authority of the DIVINE WORD.

4. Because, in addition to these features, it contains a choice selection of wholesome reading for the family, from oldest to youngest, with religious and secular news, market reports, etc.

It is now owned and published by the

IOWA STATE CONVENTION.

The Annual Meeting of the Iowa Christian Anti-secret Association will be held in the Friend's meeting house at West Branch, Cedar county, on the 25th, 26th and 27th of the eighth month (August), 1885. The place is reached by the B., C. R. & N. R. R. The full list of speakers has not been made out, but the General Secretary of the Association, J. P. Stoddard, the editor of the Free Methodist, J. Travis, and others, have promised to be present and make addresscs.

Geo. Warrington, President.
A. W. Hall, Sec'y.

KANSAS STATE MEETING.

The annual State Christian Association for Kansas will convenc, D. V., at Willis, Brown county, Kansas, twenty-five miles from Atchison on the Missouri Pacific, in the Wesleyan Methodist church, September 1, 1885. In view of the great work we are engaged in as reformers in defense of truth and against error—the anti-Christ—let every true Christian and lover of truth be present to help and encourage this much needed reform in Kansas.

We expect Rev. J. P. Stoddard, Secretary of the N. C. A.; Pres, C. A. Blanchard, of Wheaton; Rev. J. S. T. Milligan; Rev. B. F. Worrell, and other able speakers to adddress the convention.

Ample provisions will be made for all who attend. We cordially invite the co-operation of all in this effort to bring before the people "wiles" which threaten the peace and well-being of our civil and religious institutions, and to secure under the blessing of God the glorious remedy provided through our Lord Jesus Christ in the Gospel.

The convention will commence at 2 P. M. Tuesday, September 1. Let there be a grand rally! Address letters to Rev. G. H. Heminway, Willis, Kan.

J. A. Richards, Pres.
W. W. McMillan, Sec'y.

ELD. J. F. BROWNE, of Berea, Ky., will lecture a few times in Indiana or eastern Illinois, on his way to and from the Wheaton convention, if friends desire. Points situated on the "Kokomo," "Kankakee," or "Illinois Central" lines preferred For such service a reasonable remuneration would be expected. Address him at once at Berea, Madison county, Ky.

The DuPage County Christian Association opposed to secret societies will hold a convention at Wheaton, Ill., on Tuesday, August 25th. See announcement of programme in the next issue of the Cynosure.

We call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Lake Geneva Seminary which appears in this issue of the Cynosure. The Seminary opens September 23d. Send for a catalogue.

Iowa's new census, just completed, shows a total population of 2,200,000, against 1,624,615 in 1880.

The New York Daily Bulletin estimates the fire losses in the United States and Canada during July at $9,000,000, an increase of one-third over the average for the past ten years. For seven months of the present year the loss has been $60,000,000.

As a result of prohibition in Iowa, the State Temperance Alliance has received letters from 340 townships, ranging through eighty counties, showing a decrease of 590 saloons since July 4, 1884.

THE BEREA EVANGELIST
AIMS TO ADVOCATE
CHRISTIANITY,
AND TO
Help Break Down Everything that Hinders Its Spread.

It teaches that men need to be converted to a person—the personal Christ—and not simply to a system of truth; and that there must be implanted in them a divine life, as well as a correct belief.

The Evangelist seeks to show that the division of Christians into parties—denominations—sects—is a great wrong, and a very serious obstacle to the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom, and it seeks to show Christians and Christian churches how they may be one in Christ, in the "Apostle's fellowship," and to persuade and help them thus to unite.

The Evangelist also opposes intemperance, secret societies, all worldliness, and the spirit of caste, and aims to "war a good warfare" against all wrong.

In thus opposing evil the Evangelist carefully endeavors to avoid harsh speaking, believing that it is as much duty to speak truth kindly as it is to speak it at all.

"THE AMERICAN AGRICULTURIST," and a new Portrait of

GENERAL GRANT.

The American Agriculturist has just issued a magnificent stipple-style line portrait of General Grant, executed by one of the very first artists of the country. The great warrior is sitting in an easy chair in his now famous library; the expression on his countenance is exceedingly life-like, and the whole picture is grand and striking in appearance, far surpassing any previous likeness of the General. Its great merit is due to the fact that it is from General Grant's last sitting; that is, it presents him as a picture of health as he was just before his present and probably fatal malady overtook him. Other portraits, while presenting him in health, do not show his features and general appearance at a late period.

The regular price of the American Agriculturist is $1.50 per year. We have made arrangements with the publishers whereby we are enabled to send, postfree, in a tube specially made for the purpose, this portrait of General Grant, the American Agriculturist from now until the end of the year (eight months) and the Cynosure for the same time, all for the sum of $2.20.

The portrait alone sells for $1 in New York, we are reliably informed; no copies have been disposed of at less than that figure.

HOLDEN WITH CORDS,

Or the Power of the Secret Empire. A faithful representation in story of the evil influence of Freemasonry, by E. E. Flagg, author of "Little People," "A Sunny Life," etc. This is a thrillingly interesting story, accurately true to life because mainly a narration of historical facts. 384 pages. In cloth, $1; per doz., $9. Paper, 50c; per doz., $4.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"There is no important history extant but has connected with it numerous other histories of which it was the initial point, or the dominating influence. The abduction and murder of Morgan set ten thousand secret springs in motion, as the surrender of the charters of so many lodges at that time, and the severing of their connection with the order of some forty thousand of its members indicated. This story is one of these histories, and is a collection of facts woven into a story. It cannot fail to be read with interest."—Free Methodist, Chicago.

"The republication of the Reform Story which run through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these make a helpful addition for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind."—Christian Cynosure.

"It is one of the most fascinating narratives we ever read and teaches its lesson in a manner not soon to be forgotten. It is evidently written for the heart and its words go to the heart. It is singularly free from wild denunciation. Those who are interested in the secret society question would do well to form the acquaintance of this interesting work."—Lutheran Standard, Columbus, O.

"In an incidental way the story tells much about the manner of conducting lodges and much about the spirit and methods of Masonry. The story covers the period of the abduction and murdering of William Morgan. The strategic position from which the author writes put a charm in the book, while it gives a good opportunity to show the workings of the order. We wish all the people would read it."—Telescope.

FARM NOTES.

The butter globules in milk from farrow cows and cows nearly dry are smaller than from cows in flush of milk, and, in order to obtain all the butter, the cream from the former should be churned together, and the same of new milk cows.

In England beef growing is never carried on singly, but milk is counted on as carefully as the meat; and, after a century of selection for the large milk dairies near London, and near other large towns, the high-cross, Short-horn cow is used as the milk producer. This blood is there found satisfactory in milk production, as it is everywhere for meat production.

Cows giving milk should not be allowed to fall off in quantity from insufficient feed. It is more difficult to increase the flow of milk after a shrinkage from lack of full feed than to keep up a high activity of the secretion by artificial feed. When the habit of diminished milk secretion at a particular time of year is established, as it will be by repetition, it is not always easy to prevent it entirely by liberal feeding. The habit will also be transmitted to the offspring as a family characteristic that will diminish the value of the animal as a producer of milk. Give the cows extra feed so soon as the pasture begins to get short.

Prof. Arnold says: "The assertion is often made, and many people believe, that water washes out the flavor of the butter; but it only cleanses the butter of the buttermilk, sugar and milk acid which may adhere to it, just as clarifying sugar removes from it the foreign matters which modify its true flavor. The flavor of butter consists of fatty matter, which do not combine with water, therefore cannot be washed away by it. The effect of washing upon the keeping quality of the butter depends upon the purity of the water with which the washing is done. If the water contains no foreign matter that will affect the butter, it will keep better for washing the buttermilk out than by kneading it out."

A correspondent of the New York Tribune says: "As a rule, by letting the calf suck two or three days and milking at the same time, and with patience and gentleness, heifers will become docile to the milker, and stand even quietly untied in the open yard to be milked. Occasionally comes the exception. In that case I loop a rope around the near hind leg above the ankle, and draw it back till it becomes impossible to bring it near the pail or to disquiet the milker milking with both hands. At first the animal kicks ferociously, but daily it becomes less till 'all is quiet on the Potomac,' and it will do to make trial of the heifer without the rope. This is a humane and sovereign remedy for kicking heifers, also for those nervous cows that will kick on yearly farrowing."

SAVE THE STRIPPINGS.

The last milk drawn from the cow at each milking is much the richest part of the mess. The reason is the same that the top of a pan of milk which has stood awhile is the richest part of it. The cream, being the lightest part of the milk, rises or remains at the top of the udder, while the heavier, watery portion settles to the bottom, similarly, though not as perfectly, as when set in a pan. This richer portion of the milk being of greater consistency settles to the bottom of the udder but slowly as the milk is drawn off. Hence, after the first flow of milk has ceased, after the lapse of a few minutes or while the milker is drawing from the other half of the udder, a new accumulation is found in the part first drawn from. This will be found nearly all cream, and when the object is butter-making this can be drawn into a small vessel by itself and strained directly into the cream pot and thoroughly mixed with the cream. The cream from the main bulk of the milk will rise more readily and the separation being more complete for being relieved of so much of the cream in the start, the part thus taken away will not be exposed to the deteriorating influence of the milk as it gets sour or old, and the general result will be better butter and more of it. A half pint or so from each cow of the very last you can get is generally enough to save out.

Some people milk in such a hurry that they never get the strippings at all, and thus not only lose the best part of the milk, but soon spoil the cow. Whether you keep them separated or not be sure you save the strippings. Milk rapidly, but don't quit till you get the strippings. —Western Rural.

WEBSTER'S PRACTICAL A NEW DEPARTURE IN DICTIONARIES.

An Industrial Revolution.—In a large Connecticut manufacturing establishment there is in operation a new style of furnace which produces more steam-power from a consumption of 1,000 lbs of coal than can be generated from 20,000 lbs burned in the ordinary way. In other words, the new contrivance already saves nineteen-twentieths of the fuel, and it is believed that before being publicly announced it will be so improved that the saving will reach 49 fiftieths! The facts already developed are simply incredible to one who has not actually seen them verified.

A Remarkable Coincidence.—While the new Furnace was in process of construction, the editors and publishers of Webster's Unabridged were engaged upon their new work which is as great an improvement upon all previous Dictionary productions, and just as valuable in its way as is the incredible fuel economizer above alluded to. Webster's Practical is not only a new compilation by the leading Dictionary House of the world, but it embodies several new features which, for ordinary use, render it pre-eminent among dictionaries—not excepting even the Unabridged.

1st, Condensation.—By grouping all derivative and compound words under their root or leader (as in the "Book" example quoted below), such words are adequately treated in one-third of the space required by the old arrangement. By this means nearly all the desirable material of the four and five-dollar dictionaries is presented in a convenient and handy form in Webster's Practical.

2d, Association.—We comprehend as well as remember things chiefly by their associations. For this reason any one who shall carefully read the "Book" paragraph which we reproduce from Webster's Practical Dictionary, will not only comprehend it more readily, but will be able to remember two or three times as much as would be gained by reading about the same words when treated separately as in other works.

3d, Ready Reference.—Not only do we comprehend and remember more readily by the new grouping method, but we do it in less than a fourth of the time required when the words are classified in the old way. Hence, no one who values time would hesitate to pay one dollar for Webster's Practical rather than accept the best of the older dictionaries as a gift.

4th, Derivative Terminations.—Only the larger dictionaries hitherto published give the derivative terminations. The New American Dictionary, for instance, does not give any of the four variations of so common a word as forbear, while they are all given in Webster's Practical.

5th, The Illustrations in Webster's Practical are more numerous and better executed than those of any other abridged or low-priced dictionary.

6th, Prefixes and Suffixes.—Another important feature of Webster's Practical is its peculiar treatment of prefixes and suffixes, which is believed to be more desirable than a separate department of two or three hundred pages which is sometimes allotted to them.

7th, Compendium Matter.—Still another invaluable feature of Webster's Practical is its compendium matter, over one hundred pages of which is devoted to the most complete Pronouncing Vocabulary ever compiled of Biblical, Classical, Mythological, Historical and Geographical Proper names. With Webster's Practical Dictionary at hand, one need not be at a loss to correctly pronounce or spell the most difficult words.

8th, An Invaluable Book.—The importance of supplying every child with Webster's Practical for his very own, is not generally appreciated. As an educator it is worth a hundred times its price, and a little self-denial to provide one or more copies in every family will prove a better economy than an endowment of hoarded hank-stocks later on in life.

The following paragraph is reproduced from Webster's Practical.

Book, bŏŏk, n. A collection of sheets of paper, etc., bound together; a literary composition, written or printed; a subdivision of a literary work. (Mer.) A volume in which accounts are kept. — v. t. [BOOKED (bŏŏkt), BOOKING.] To enter, or register in a book. — Book'ish, a. Given to reading; more acquainted with books than with men. — Book'-bind'er, n. One who binds books. — -bind'ery, n. A place for binding, etc. — -bind'ing, n. Art or practice of, etc. — -case, n. A case with shelves for holding books. (Bind.) A book-cover. — -cov'er, n. (Bind.) A case for a book; a cover of cloth or other material prepared for casing a book. — -keep'er, n. One who keeps accounts. — -keep'ing, n. Art of recording mercantile transactions and keeping accounts. — -learned, -lĕrnd, a. Versed in books; ignorant of life. — -learn'ing, n. Learning acquired by reading,—esp. as opp. to practical knowledge. — -mak'er, n. One who writes and publishes books; a compiler; a sporting man who makes a record of bets. — -mak'ing, n. The practice of, etc.; compilation; systematized betting. — -mark, n. Something placed in a book by which to find a particular place. — -plate, n. A label indicating ownership, place in a library, etc., usually on the inside of the cover of a book. — -post, n. The post-office arrangement by which books are mailed. — -sell'er, n. One who sells books. — -shelf, n. A shelf to hold books. — -shop, -stall, -store, n. A place for selling books. — -stand, n. A stand for selling books in the streets; book-stall; a support to hold books. — -worm, n. A worm or mite that eats holes in books; one excessively addicted to study.

THE QUANTITY TEST.

(The following exhibits are from the texts of the dictionaries named).

Webster's Practical Dictionary, ($1) 600,000 Words and 1,400 Illustrations.
New American Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Popular Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Standard Dictionary, ($1) 210,000 Words and 612 Illustrations.

Quality Test.—Aside from all advantages above alluded to, there is still another and very important feature of the new work to be considered, viz.: its quality as compared with the cheap dictionaries which have had the largest sales, and which have been compiled chiefly from the old editions of Webster on which the copyrights have expired. Hence Webster's Practical contains more matter than any other dollar dictionary. Its quality, to say the least, is the very best, while its arrangement and all other new and desirable features, including first-class illustrations, paper, printing and binding are added without extra charge.

A Subscription Book.—As Webster's Practical is not for sale at book-stores, our readers will be able to procure it only from canvassing agents, unless it be ordered in connection with this journal in accordance with our special offers.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influence of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

On the abduction and murder of WILLIAM MORGAN in 1826, which has been the most widely published of any Anti-masonic document. The dedication of a noble granite monument to the memory of Morgan, and the able and eloquent addresses of the Convention make this a most valuable pamphlet.

SEE WHY.

It contains—
1. Portrait of Morgan.
2. Portrait of Thurlow Weed.
3. Fine picture of the Monument.
4. The great letter of Thurlow Weed and his affidavit—almost the last public act of his life.
5. Address by J. E. Roy, D.D.
6. The monument oration by Pres. C. A. Blanchard.
7. Addresses on "Christian Politics" by Pres. J. Blanchard, on the Character of Freemasonry by Prof. E. D. Bailey, on the "Freedmen and Secret Societies" by Rev. H. H. Hinman; and very interesting personal and historical reminiscences.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE GRANT OBSEQUIES.

Monday night the family of General Grant, in a group and alone, took their final farewell of the remains, and on next day General Hancock assumed charge of the funeral. At 10 o'clock services were held at the cottage in the presence of over a thousand persons. The sermon was by Rev. Dr. Newman and occupied about an hour and a half in delivery. The funeral train reached Saratoga at 1:50. At Albany the remains lay in state till Wednesday noon, when the departure was made for New York, arriving there at 5:20. All day Thursday the remains lay in state at the City Hall, and up to 1 o'clock Friday morning it was estimated that 180,000 to 190,000 people filed past the casket. On Saturday, with an immense procession of military and civic societies the body was placed in the temporary vault at Riverside Park.

A large crowd from Appomattox Court House on Thursday draped in mourning the house in which Generals Grant and Lee signed the terms of surrender. The drapery will remain thirty days.

WASHINGTON.

The State Department is in receipt of advices from Mr. Lee, Secretary of the American Legation at Vienna, saying that the Austrian government had positively refused to receive Mr. Keiley as United States Minister.

Commissioner Miller estimates that the total receipts from all sources of internal revenue for the fiscal year will be about $115,000,000.

A Washington dispatch says it is understood that Mr. Keiley will soon resign as Minister to Austria, and that he will not be appointed to another foreign mission.

COUNTRY.

A terrible cyclone passed down Loup Valley, Nebraska, Wednesday evening. It lasted only twenty minutes, and nearly wrecked the town of Ord. Much damage was done to buildings, and all glass exposed to the direction which the storm came was broken out. Tin roofs were torn up, weak buildings blown down, and crops demolished. The damage around Ord was $20,000.

John Jones, a farm hand employed by Charles Merwin, near Allianee, Ohio, being twice prevented from suicide by Mrs. Merwin, became exasperated Wednesday and shot her five times with a revolver, producing dangerous wounds. He then placed the pistol to his left temple, sent a bullet in his brain, and fell dead.

James Barnett, living near Hallsville, Ill., while boring for water a day or two ago, struck a vein of natural gas yielding a pressure of thirty pounds to the square inch, which is being utilized for heating and lighting purposes.

An incendiary fire at Mount Auburn, Ill., Thursday, destroyed all the business houses of that town with the exception of the postoffice.

An explosion of gasoline occurred in a provision store at Germantown, Pa., Wednesday afternoon, and three men named Rief, Rieber, and Gauzert received burns from which they died Thursday, while the case of a fourth victim, Kratz, aged 74, is hopeless.

Forty shots were fired at a disturbance at Prestonburg, Ky., Tuesday evening, during which Proctor Arnett was killed, Lee Patrick fatally wounded, and two others injured. All the parties were colored.

William Gagle, a tinner at LaSalle, Ill., committed suicide Thursday morning by driving an iron spike into his brain with a hammer.

Thursday afternoon Mrs. McElroy, walking along the track near St. Clairsville Junction, Va.. with her two little boys, was struck by a Baltimore and Ohio passenger train and instantly killed, while the boys were fatally hurt.

A cyclone passed over Philadelphia, Monday, wrecking two steamers, and destroying an immense amount of property. Several lives were lost. The storm then passed to the Jersey side. In its ravages in Camden scores of dwelling houses were unroofed, and damage to business property along the river front was enormous Crossing to Delaware it cut a swarth three hundred yards wide, near Smyrna, and miles of property were destroyed.

FOREIGN.

President Grevy issued a decree Friday ordering that the general elections in France take place Oct. 4.

A dispatch received in London from the Afghan frontier says a collision between the Afghans and Russians is not improbable. The work of fortifying Herat against a possible Russian advance is making rapid progress.

A man named Dempsey, of Hamilton, Ont., accompanied by Mrs. Sanders, his sister, and her 6-year-old son, were crossing the London and Port Stanley track at St. Thomas, Friday, when the train struck the buggy in which they were riding, demolishing it. Mrs. Sander's body was found twenty yards away, with the head severed from the body. The other two occupants were killed.

An earthquake shock in Tashkend, Asiatic Russia, ruined several cities. In Belvoodsk a church was shaken to fragments while it was crowded with worshipers, a large number of whom were killed.

The custom-house at Antofagasta, Bolivia, was destroyed by fire Sunday morning, which with other buildings, entailed a loss of about $1,000,000.

A dispatch from Vienna states that Austria has formally notified the United States Government that Mr. Keily is not acceptable as American Minister to Austria, and has expressed the hope that he will be recalled and another appointment be made.

Throughout Spain, Wednesday, 4,282 new cases of Cholera were reported and 1,570 deaths.

The panic caused by the rapid spread of cholera in the country, in Spain, is increasing. Entire villages have been deserted by their inhabitants, who have fled from the dread disease. In many cases doctors and municipal authorities have been attacked by the disease, and the sick have been abandoned and the dead left unburied. Reports from several places state that it is impossible to obtain provisions or medicines. The misery over the entire country is great.

Half a mile along the water-front of Toronto, occupied by boat-houses, lumber-yards, elevators, and manufacturing establishments was destroyed by fire on Monday night. Scores of vessels were burned, among them a fleet of ferry-steamers. Henry Wort, a private watchman, perished in the flames, and a number of sailors were scorched.

Coal and iron miners in Derbyshire, in England, were engaged in a riot many hours Thursday. In one of the battles with the police nine miners were dangerously wounded.

There were 4,382 cases of cholera in Spain Saturday and 1,639 deaths.

The bursting of an embankment at Tamkong, fourteen miles from Canton, China, flooded an immense territory and caused the loss of 10,000.

Secretary of the Navy Whitney has agreed, it is said, to accept the dispatch boat Dolphin from the assignees of John Roach. This vessel with others was ordered by a Republican administration, built according to minute plans provided by the Government, and once approved by an examining committee. But Mr. Whitney having come into power required another examination, and on some technical ground refused to accept or pay for the vessel, and an opinion from Attorney General Garland gave him a like privilege with several other contracts. This decision drove Mr. Roach into bankruptcy, though his manufacturing property is worth some $2,000,000 more than his debts. Mr. Whitney's change of mind leads to a natural inquiry for the reason, and we have it in the fact that changes will be made in the Dolphin to comply with the last examination. These changes are estimated to cost the immense sum of $325! The verdict of common sense upon this business must be that the vessel was built according to contract and the Secretary now confesses it, and that the quibble of Mr. Whitney was only a dishonorable way to destroy the last Republican ship-builder of note in the country.

Monuments for General Grant are projected in every quarter. Chicago has raised $40,000; New York talks of $1,000,000; St. Louis is raising a fund; Texas, Illinois, and other States have opened subscription books; the Grand Army of the Republic has orders to gather a fund; and a demand is being made that the Government shall appropriate a vast sum for the same purpose. Much of this enthusiasm will bear revision after a "sober second thought;" and it is the ordinary experience of such monuments, that they are not so much needed after the lapse of a year or two. The Garfield monument waits for $75,000 to be raised, and more than three-fourths of a century passed before the great national monument to Washington was completed. There is a lesson which the managers of such funds would do well to heed, so long as they expect the bulk of the money to come from practical, hard-working people, who have half a dozen ways to spend every dollar that comes in. Instead of some great pile of stone or statue of bronze, set up to be wasted by the elements, why should not philanthropy and utility be joined with the desire to memorize a great name, and a hospital or school, or some work of public utility as a great bridge, be chosen as the form of monument. Grant gained his reputation in war, let his name be remembered in connection with a well founded technical school in which our youth may learn the arts of peaceful life.

SAMUEL PLUMB.

[See 9th page.]

If the public interest in canals and ship-railways connecting the Atlantic and Pacific lags, it is promptly revived every few months by an appeal for funds. Captain Eads has asked our government to guarantee a net revenue from his ship-railway at Tehuantepec, of $2,500,000; or in other words to duplicate the Mexican guarantee of one half that amount. In France DeLesseps is urging the government by every consideration to legalize a lottery by which he can raise six hundred million francs, or $120,000,000, for his Panama ditch. The extraordinary and demoralizing means proposed for raising this loan is neither a compliment to French morals nor prophetic of success to the enterprise. It indicates that confidence in the hero of Suez is waning in proportion as the $150,000,000 already loaned him by the people is vanishing. He first wanted $125,000,000, but now that six years have passed, and careful estimates make the probable cost $530,000,000 and postpone the completion till 1892, the hazard of the enterprise becomes almost fearful. To abandon the work would be as fatal to De Lesseps as the chances of continuing. His backers in this country are probably few; and since the opinion is growing that the Nicaragua scheme, though supported by the powerful influence of General Grant, is not practicable, more attention is being given to the railway plan, which has been carefully estimated in every detail, is liberally supported by the Mexican government so that there are no international questions of ownership, and can be completed in a reasonable time at an estimated cost of $75,000,000. But with the present administration Captain Eads will find its watchwords of economy picketing every approach to the treasury.

Riel, the leader in the rebellion in the Saskatchewan region of British America, has been compared to Guiteau in his persistence that he was led of God in his war against the Canadian government, and stoutly maintained his sanity, though the testimony of physicians and others was almost positive against him. He has been condemned to death, though his efforts have accomplished much good for Canada. The New York Witness says of the effect of the rebellion: "The Tory party lived and breathed for the double purpose of protection of manufactures and carrying through the Pacific Railroad. The protection has led to, or at all events, has not hindered, a very severe prostration of business, and the railroad has strained all the power of the country to raise money for its completion with its numerous feeders. The methods resorted to for carrying on the railroad and the neglect of the claims of the natives and new settlers were the main causes of Reil's rebellion, and it is a mercy that these new settlers and railroad men were not massacred by the angry Indians and half-breeds. Much more attention to the general welfare of the country may be expected to grow out of this severe lesson. Sir John A. MacDonald, who is practically the autocrat of Canada, will probably retire gracefully to the Bench, and a new generation of statesmen, more suited for the times, take the places of him and his Cabinet.

FELLOWSHIP, ITS NATURE, IMPORTANCE, AND LIMITATIONS.

BY ELDER NATHAN CALLENDER.

1. Real fellowship is sympathy, harmony, identity with persons and principles. See 1 John 1: 3; Acts 2: 42; 1 Cor. 1: 9; 2 Cor. 6: 14; Eph 5: 11. Many other passages show this to be the sense of the Word. We cannot fellowship a principle or a person and not become one with such principle or person in part or in full. If we fellowship the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, this fact secures our sympathy, harmony, and identity with the Triune One. Nothing but such soul-union, communion with God, can possibly avail or in any wise benefit us. This away, and all ordinances and rites combined, with the sacrifice of our bodies to be burned, will not benefit us in the least measure. Let it be also noted as we pass that if we are in real fellowship with Anti-christ we cannot be in fellowship with the Lord Jesus Christ.

2. Let us next notice the importance of fellowship. Nothing is more important. Our mental and moral being is composed of our fellowships,—largely with men and principles, mainly with our attitude toward the triune God. Fellowship with evil makes us evil, fellowship with demons makes human fiends, with which our world is filled. A good reason for Paul's words: "I would not that ye should have fellowship with devils." By perpetual contact with evil, men assimilate to evil fellowships, and there is only one way to prevent this bad result. That way is, to convert the unavoidable contact with surrounding evils into eternal, vigilant conflict. So did the "Captain of our salvation." To us this is the only possible way to escape the contaminating contagion of sin. Since every volition and every choice we make involves us in evil or in good, how supremely important that our fellowship be established with the "Father and his Son!" This fellowship identifies us with all the good in the wide moral domain of the King eternal.

3. The limitations of fellowship claim careful attention.

Who has the right to dictate and direct us in our choice of fellows, so to speak? Who and what should be our companions? Who has the right to legislate for us on so vital a subject? He who sees and knows as no creature can. He to whom all souls belong, and who has man's wellbeing deeper at heart than man or angels can have. He who prayed "sanctify (separate) them through thy truth." "For their sake I sanctify myself." He would not have his chosen, out of the world, contaminated by criminally mixing with it. "Be ye separate, saith the Lord, and I will receive you." "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." Take the last text here quoted. This is God's law on a vital subject. No fellowship. Reprove them. Let this law be written in letters of fire across the skies to convert the midnight of the so-called Christian bodies into the dawn of day. Let the lightnings write it, the thunders speak it, earthquakes inscribe it on every mountain top, from Sinai to the ends of the earth, for all time.

In this crisis hour when three-fourths of the churches are ready to trail the banner of Christ in the filth of the lodge, and some others which have hitherto borne testimony against it, are "toning down" and are getting down on their knees to this prince of Anti-christs, no place below heaven itself is so sacred as the Christian altar,—this "heavenly place in Christ Jesus," "this temple of the Holy Spirit;" shall the sworn Anti-christ of the lodge, which excludes Christ by law, be invited to nestle in the bosom of the bride of Christ? How shall you condemn as a harlot her whom you receive to your bed and board? Once get the minions of the lodge into the Christian's "holy of holies," commingling with the "sacramental host of God's elect," and you concede all the devil himself would have a face to ask of any church. He sought no more when he asked the Son of God to fall down and worship him. Shall the body of Christ, the church, in this nineteenth century fall before this "Baal Peor," this Moloch of the lodge and worship? God's law says, No. Reprove him.

The whole question of lodgery hinges on fellowship in church and state. Worship and vote with and for the lodge, and all the legions of the lodge gods will rise up and call you blessed; while Satan with ecstacy of joy responds, "So mote it be." Thus he transports his war upon the saints even to heaven. Rev. 12: 7. Verily there is war in heaven, and will be till the lodge dragon shall be cast out from the "heavenly places in Christ." Till about 1870 I got along, though with frequent misgivings and a feeling of self-degradation, with lodgery, more or less, in the churches I served as pastor. About that time the "secret empire," knowing my disrelish, combined its minions to subjugate my ministry to its dominion. My only alternative was to fall down and worship the dragon, run away, or fight. Going to God on my knees I besought him to guide me. He taught me to fight. As a people, we planted our battle flag on the only tenable spot to be found—the rock of "no fellowship" for lodgery, and won the battle.

No quarter at the communion table and none at the polls is inscribed on our battle flag; and this is the line on which we purpose to fight it out if it takes our life time. Had the people of God persisted in fellowshiping slavery it would have been on us to-day. They refused to worship with it, and to vote for it. It was its death knell. Had they done this long years before it might have saved a million of our countrymen and billions of treasure. Will the people of God fellowship lodgery, till in its arrogance and self-righteousness it claims the right to precipitate another rebellion upon us, tenfold more cruel and bloody than that of the slaveholders?

That the so-called church is in a moral plight to make it necessary even to discuss the question of the expediency of fellowshiping the lodge, speaks in tones of thunder to warn us of our danger. What! The church, the bride, "the Lamb's wife," fellowship an oath-bound secret conclave, with every element of crime forbidden in the decalogue in its organic law, antagonizing the Son of God in every single point of contact? We can comprehend why the arch enemy seeks to entrench himself in the citadel of social compacts "the city of God," but we cannot see why the church should ever and anon open wide its portals to the wily fiend. Must this "mystery of iniquity," this "man of sin," this "son of perdition," nestle in the church by her consent and communion, as the papacy intruded itself into the primitive church? Will the "Masonic conspiracy," like that of Rome, pollute the temple of God through centuries yet to come? God gives laws to us on the right and duty of fellowship, as specific as any law stated in the Bible. "He careth for us," and would not that we should get our moral blood poisoned by putrid contacts. He restricts us, warns us, "touch not, taste not, handle not the unclean thing, and I will receive you." Is not our Zion languishing today, with a thousand ailments contracted by "blood poisons," resulting from unholy, forbidden fellowships? Her life blood, her vitality, is turned into corruption till she is full of "wounds, bruises, and putrifying sores." If she does not speedily turn away from the rancid mass of lodgery she will be worse off than old Job. We hope God has restricted the devil as in Job's case. But she must escape from bad fellowship if she would live.

Can the churches discriminate and so select some of those oath-bound clans for their fellowship? As well select healthy meat from a putrid carcass. Lodgery is lodgery the world over; just as whisky is whisky and carrion is carrion. They may differ in "degrees" of strength and putridity and in results on the patient. Some, many, will throw off and get away from the lodge, and so escape, as we hope the 54,292 of the G. A. R. (in one year) concluded to do. Were all the hosts of duped and victimized lodge men, who have in many ways slipped the "cable-tow," put into one army, we are inclined to the opinion that they would outnumber the adhering members to-day, and would compose a much grander army than the G. A. R. can boast. The process may be unpleasant, but, nevertheless, the more severe the better alternative. "Come out from among them."—Paul. "Separation, separation!"—Moody.

THE D. D. AND M. D.

There are many persons after whose names the above capitals are written. The word doctor is derived from a Latin verb of the second conjugation, doceo, to teach. The title, Doctor of Medicine, is conferred by medical colleges, and Doctor of Divinity, by the theological. It is silly and unchristian in both instances to cherish an undue vanity because of these titled distinctions. They are not in every case worthily bestowed. They may be in some instances an opprobrium. Some one has compared them to a quirl in a small dog's tail. This is extreme. A mule-driver once assumed the M. D., and the late Thos. Benton pronounced an individual a dirty dog who bore the D. D. The notorious Dr. Thompson, the steamer, called the acquirements of the M. D. "learned ignorance." A young disciple of his starting out professionally was over-elated. He sang out, "Hail Columbia, happy land. If I ain't a doctor I'll be———."

There are a great variety of M. D. schools. Many patients recover from their maladies under treatment quite diverse. Sometimes there may be more or less aid in the differing forms of treatment. Again the malady would run its course and terminate favorably without a doctor at all. In all cases there is in the system a force called technically, vis medicatrix naturæ, which if not overpowered, operates greatly in the patient's favor. In addition to this force often but little treatment is necessary. Patients often get too much at the hands of the M. D. His friends and sympathizers think, like protracted meeting conductors in dog days, if a little does good, a great deal will do more. A purgative diaphoretic, sudorific, blister, warm bath, etc., may, timely and judiciously used, turn the scale favorably. The M. D. is jealous of his own plan of healing. A flame may be extinguished by blowing, smothering, deluging, and other ways. So with disease.

The schools of the D. D. are also sectarian and diverse. Their handling of divine things may not be entirely similar. The sick in body and the sin-sick are seldom judges of what is best, but more commonly are subjects of bias. We must concede, in charity, that recoveries sometimes take place under differing treatment. Here is also a force, a spiritual vis, procceding from the Father and the Son, an anointing which is truth and no lie. Like the vis medicatrix naturæ, it should be well guarded. What could the doctors do without these forces in their aid?

Are the doctors then necessary? Yes. Some would say a necessary evil. Although differing, they may direct in some things which tend to salvation. The Spirit heals. Christ has opened a door of reconciliation and become intercessor. Freemasonry rejects that provision. Yet this order, and Odd-fellowship pretend to the rank and function of doctor. They pretend to teach saving truth, but dishonor him who is the Truth, the Way, the Life. They are, therefore, of their father the devil, else natural religion is saving and not revealed. If an M. D. had no saving qualification he would be execrable; If a D. D. had none he would be a pagan or a heathen. If a Mason, Odd-fellow or Mormon, has none he will be evidently, as the young steam doctor said, "damned." If this word is properly used any where, would it not apply here? QUAKER BOY.

I am well pleased with our position on the secret society question. Any organization that will ignore the name of Jesus in their lodge-prayer should make no claim to the Christian church. "He that denieth me before men, him will I deny before my Father and before his angels." I have been free from a desire to unite with any secret, oath-bound order since the abduction and murder of William Morgan in 1826, and was much confirmed in my freedom by the mysterious disappearing of Rev. Ensign P. Hill from the itinerant ranks of our annual conference. He had been a Mason of three degrees, and being convinced of the evils of Masonry, seceded, wrote a revelation of Masonry as far as he had gone in it; then took his manuscript, his horse and buggy, and left his family to go a few miles to make arrangements to have it published, and was never heard of afterwards, neither by his family nor by the Alleghenny annual conference. I heard his name called two successive years at the roll call of the conference; but no answer and no information, either from the members of the conference or his bereaved family. What is the rational conclusion?

This secret, with all others of like character, shall be fully revealed when God shall judge the secrets of men, by him whose name has been ignored in the lodge-prayer.—Thomas W. Stephens in Wesleyan Methodist.

MASONIC PROGRESS.

The committee on correspondence for the Masonic General Lodge of Rhode Island, refer "to non-affiliation," "as a great and alarming evil." If Masonry is a good institution, this is surely so, for at least four-fifths of those initiated, demit from the lodge. They say that "in former days the social element prevailed throughout the lodges and the heathen were thereby drawn to the lodge-room at every communication.

It is suggested that "each lodge hold three or four meetings each year at which the members with their families and some invited guests may be present. Let these meetings be provided with music, reading and if possible, speaking, with some slight refreshment at the expense of the lodge." "When this is done there will be created an influence for the lodge in the home circle."

So it is the influence of the "home circle" that takes Masons out of the lodge, and is the cause of this "great and alarming evil." The suggestion is certainly in the right direction if it only goes far enough. As a well-wisher to all Masons, I want to add: Let the proposed meetings be the only ones, and let the invitations be liberal in extent. We promise our Masonic friends that they shall not lack for speakers if they will invite some of the agents of the National Association. Why not have open and free discussion? H.

A CONVENTION OF CHURCHES.

[From the Wesleyan Methodist.]

A convention of the churches opposed to secret societies has been suggested, and we have received an able article written by Rev. C. R. Hunt, bearing upon the question of such a convention, and favoring the call. While all professedly Christian churches —to be true to the examples and teachings of Christ, whose followers they profess to be—should stand not only in relation of non-fellowship toward the whole lodge-system, but in pronounced Gospel antagonism in word and deed to the principle of secret darkness; it is a sad truth that many churches are ready to fellowship and sanction almost, if not quite, anything which may propose to identify itself with them, which can count on the list of names, or figure a few dollars in matters of finance. By this compromising course as practiced to-day, and as written on the stained pages of past church-history, the church of Christ has been stabbed again and again, to the very heart, in the house and at the altars of professed friendship. If Christ was here in person speaking his fearless words of truth, he would have occasion to make the ears of many of the popular churches of the day tingle with the reiteration of his burning words of rebuke: "It is written, my house shall be called a house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of theives." This possesses fearful truth as against the churches on whose altars are the blood spots of oppression still unwashed by tears of bitter heart-repentance.

There are many churches that have something like a just apprehension as to the paternity and character of organized secrecy. Fifteen or more denominations are committed against the lodge, with many individual churches in other denominations, and many churches that maintain no denominational relation. We see no reason why all these churches, seeing eye to eye on this vital issue which is coming more and more into prominence, cannot consistently and profitably meet, by their respective delegates, in one united season of prayer and counsel, as to the best means of ridding our lodge-ridden churches and our lodge-ridden land of the curse that threatens the subversion of every interest dear to us as citizens and Christians. Such a convention would serve to stimulate each other, and quicken zeal in the common war against the corrupt and corrupting secret counsels of the wicked, into whose associations as subservient to their aims and purposes so many very honest and well-intentioned people are ensnared. Should such a general council of churches be held, the Wesleyan Methodist connection should be fitly represented. While it is not to be expected that the anti-secret churches are to be harmonized in their widely divergent doctrines, or that these differences are to be discussed, there is common ground of Gospel antagonism to organized secrecy on which all can stand and lock shields in a war of extermination against these unscriptural and anti-christian orders. It is time for the arousing of new zeal and courage in this conflict. Satan's commissioned lodge emissaries are busy strengthening as far as possible the legion of orders already born of darkness, and in bringing into being more as fast as some plausible pretext for their creation can be discovered. This Satan must of course come forth, transformed as some wonderful angel of light, in order to deceive, if possible the very elect. Out on this whole secret business at once and forever. Count us, and the people we represent, as on the advanced skirmish line of this reform, until the last secret den of darkness is opened out to the full sunlight of God's high noon of truth and salvation.

THE NATION NEEDS HER SONS.

Think not the days are over
When the nation needs her sons,
Tho' the fields are fair with clover
Where rusting lie the guns,
Tho' the bluebird twitters proudest,
O'er her nest in the cannon's mouth,
Where the din of war was loudest,
In the fair and suffering South.

While the mad'ning cup is lifted
To the lips of our cherished ones,
While it dooms the brave, the gifted,
The nation needs her sons.
While Utah's crime, inhuman,
Its course unheeded runs
O'er the breaking heart of woman,
The nation needs her sons.

While the whole world gazing on her,
Can see on her burnished shield
One stain on her sacred honor,
By our noonday glare revealed;
While she can pause, or falter,
While one brave deed she shuns,
From every hearth and altar
The nation calls her sons.

Tho' she smiles in pride and beauty,
Tho' great and fair she stands,
We still must pledge our duty,
True hearts and good right hands
The toils of peace must find us
As stanch as the shock of wars;
The sunshine must not blind us
To the glory of our stars.

THE G. A. R. AND THE CATHOLIC CHURCH.

[From the Catholic Review.]

In reference to the position of the Grand Army of the Republic, a Western correspondent sends us the following extract from the Church Progress, which shows the light in which Bishop Baltes regards it. It naturally suggests the question, Did General Rosecrans know of all the books of the Grand Army and did he submit them all to the Bishop whom he consulted, or are these books shown to Bishop Baltes wholly unauthorized? Are there two sets of books, one for the public and the other for the initiates?

"A member of the Grand Army of the Republic, some time ago, sent his books to the Right Rev. Bishop, doubts having risen if Catholics might be members of said society. The Right Rev. Bishop examined the books and wrote to him as follows: 'I do not believe that a man can be a good Catholic and a member of that society at the same time; that is, if he understands that the church forbids what that society asks of him. That society makes use of a Protestant Bible, which being the adulterated word of God is forbidden to Catholics. The society has a chaplain who recites prayers and performs other religious exercises; he is a layman and probably a Protestant. The Catholic church acknowledges no one as chaplain unless he be a priest and appointed by the bishop. One may as well assist at the religious exercises of a Protestant chaplain in the army or at a Protestant church, as at those performed by this chaplain. The society has a funeral service of its own performed by its chaplain. The Catholic church condemns such, unless it be performed by a priest approved by his bishop. The society has secrets, and every member has to call God to witness that he will keep these secrets, even when the member does not know what these secrets may be. Now, to call God to witness that you have done, or intend to do, something, whatever it may be, is taking an oath. The member, therefore, has to take an oath that he will keep secrets with the nature of which he is not acquainted. The Catholic church forbids this. In a form of goverment like ours especially, such a society is out of place altogether. No American freeman can, without degrading himself, swear off his liberty to use his judgment as he may see fit and swear it off to men whom he does not know, and whom God has never placed over him to be his guide. Such are some of the points I have fished out of these books, and they are, in my opinion, sufficient to keep all away from such societies.'"

CHEVALIER RAMSAY.

THE EASY ORIGIN OF MASONIC ANTIQUITY AND HIGHER DEGREES.

The Chevalier Ramsay was born at Ayr, in Scotland, in 1680, and in early life went to France, where he became the intimate friend and associate of the celebrated Fenelon. He is said to have been a man of most extensive erudition, and to have cultivated most of the known sciences. Being of a restless and ambitious disposition, he engaged in political intrigues, and particularly devoted himself to the cause of the exiled princes of the house of Stewart, and conceived the idea of making use of the Masonic association to subserve the interests of their party. With this end in view he endeavored to obviate the objections of the French noblesse to the mechanical origin of the institution, at which their pride revolted, by asserting that it arose in the Holy Land during the crusades as an act of chivalry. His theory was that the first Freemasons were a society of Knights, whose business it was to rebuild the churches which had been destroyed by the Saracens; that the infidels, with the view of preventing the execution of this pious design, sent emissaries among them, who, disguised as Christians, became confounded with the builders and paralyzed their efforts; that the Knights having discovered the existence of these spies, became in the future more careful, and instituted signs and words for the purpose of detection; that as many of their workmen were newly-converted Christians, they adopted symbolic ceremonies with the view of instructing their proselytes more readily in the new religion. Finally, the Saracens gaining the upper hand, the Knight-masons were compelled to abandon their original occupation; but being invited by the King of England to remove to his dominions, they had accepted the offer, and in this secure retreat devoted themselves to the cultivation and encouragement of architecture, sculpture, painting and music.

Ramsay, in 1728, tried to lay the foundation of this new, and, according to his idea, improved system of Masonry, and proposed to the Grand Lodge of England to substitute for the three ancient degrees, others of his own invention, but which he asserted had been practiced from time immemorial in the Lodge of St. Andrew at Edinborough. His views being rejected in London, he carried them to Paris, where his degrees were adopted, not indeed as a substitute for, but as an addition to, ancient Craft Masonry. These degrees became popular, and in a short time gave birth to numerous others on the continent of Europe, the splendor of the decorations, and the gorgeous manner in which the ceremonials were conducted, captivating the senses of the French.—Hebrew Leader.

LODGE AND LIQUOR AT ODDS.

Washington, July 31.—A singular contest is developing in this city between the liquor dealers and the Labor League. Several months ago the agents of the Knights of Labor followed the wagons of a large brewer named Henrich and carefully noted all saloons and restaurants that were served by Henrich with beer. A list of Henrich's customers thus secured was furnished the Labor Leagues and orders were issued to boycott all dealers who sell Henrich's beer. The opposition from the Labor League arises from the fact that Mr. Henrich purchased three kitchen stoves from a firm which does not employ union men, and placed them in new houses which are in course of construction. Henrich employs himself none but union men in his brewery. The liquor dealers having suffered some of this boycotting appealed to their association, which resulted in a conference of the two organizations. The Labor League demanded from Henrich the payment of $200 cash and a bond of $1,000 as security against any future patronage of persons boycotted by the League. A similar demand for cash and indemnity was demanded from the Liquor Dealers' Association. These demands were rejected, and now the liquor dealers are said to be arranging to boycott the Knights of Labor, the plan of operation being to stop handling liquors, cigars, and other articles sold in saloons and restaurants that are manufactured by firms employing union men.—Inter Ocean.

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER XXX.

LODGE AND SALOON.

"The politicians of late years have been playing a game of chess intent wholly upon the board, but never giving a thought to the table under the board. But the table was alive, the back of a people which began to stir, and in the twinkling of an eye chessboard and men went to the devil."

This vigorous paragraph from St. Beuve on the French Provisional government of 1848 is quoted partly because it contains a warning which American politicians would do well to heed, and partly because the last clause describes very exactly the feelings of many good people when Judge Dyer was ignominiously defeated and his Democratic rival elected to the gubernatorial chair.

The old nursery rhyme of Cock Robin is founded on a deep-seated principle of human nature. If even a pan of milk is overturned it is always consoling to know exactly who or what did the mischief. In obedience to this philosophic instinct of humanity we will now resolve ourselves into a coroner's jury and inquire into the cause of Judge Dyer's untimely political death.

Masonry never forgets or forgives. On one single occasion, years before, he had written a letter condemning the lodge. Lodge leaders remembered it, and silently and secretly they combined together to prevent his election. How did they do it? The answer is easy. They united with the liquor men, and on some slight pretext "bolted" to the Democratic side in just sufficient numbers to turn the scale. But even Judge Dyer never suspected the hidden hand of Masonry. His defeat was ascribed to liquor bribery, to the defection in the German vote, to any and every cause but the true one.

The lodge leaders took care that the blame should be thrown on the shoulders of the prohibitionists, and their ideas were reflected in leading Republican papers by such paragraphs as the following: "The utter uselessness of making concessions to prohibition fanaticism has been proved once more. As usual it has been a disturbing and disintegrating factor which has not strengthened the party but only brought upon it defeat and loss. It is too costly a folly to be again repeated."

The liquor men were of course jubilant, and with astonishing unanimity the very saloonists who were such strong Republicans at the previous election, now that victory had perched on the Democratic banners, made haste to doff their new political livery and veer round to the winning side: while behind them stood the lodge Judas smiling complacently at the clever way in which it had tricked the simple temperance folks, betraying them wholesale to their ancient enemy.

But out of the dead lion came forth honey. The W. C. T. U. had no idea of giving up the battle for a change of parties. The prohibitionists, sadder and wiser, fell into line and the work went on to the mingled anger and consternation of the saloon men who had reckoned securely on having things their own way. And now to have the cup of triumph dashed from their lips, as seemed eminently probable if the bill for submitting a prohibitory amendment to the people could be made to pass the Senate by a non-partisan vote the following winter, was certainly enough to warrant them in declaring, with many unnecessary expletives, that "these W. C. T. U. women never knew when they were beat."

Martin Treworthy heard the result of the election in grim silence, and did not even say to Nelson, "I told you so."

Stephen Howland, on his part, was astonished. He had been very sanguine regarding Judge Dyer's election, but he felt that the two old parties were coming closer and closer together every year. To be sure the Republicans retained something of their former moral superiority—the momentum generated by the sacrifices and sufferings of their early leaders. Corrupt and self-seeking as was the average politician of that party, now and then they put up a pure candidate, nor had the rank and file quite lost the memory of their first baptism in blood and tears as the party of liberty and moral progress.

Altogether it was a far more promising instrument to the lodge to make use of for the betrayal of the temperance cause than its Democratic rival, of whose reform promises, though it should charm never so wisely, all true reformers would ever remain reasonably shy.

Stephen Howland, about a week before the election, was much surprised to hear the Good Templar acquaintance previously mentioned allude in a doubtful way to the result of the contest, and remark that "he was sorry the Republicans had not put up a stronger ticket."

"It is a thousand times stronger in all that constitutes real strength than the ticket put up last year," responded Stephen, warmly. "Judge Dyer has got no tricks of the demagogue about him. He is a plain, honest man, and as such he ought to command the people's vote."

"Well, Col. Morrison said to me only yesterday—you know he is Republican and enough in politics to get an inside view of the way things are going—that Judge Dyer would never be elected. And he went on to tell how it was perilling the German vote; 'and besides,' says he, 'Dyer isn't personally a popular man.'"

Col. Morrison was one of the "bolters," willing to betray his party for the sake of the lodge, and the above is a very good specimen of the way in which he and other Masonic politicians worked against Judge Dyer—less by downright falsehoods than by vague insinuations which carried all the sting of positive charges. But it must not be supposed that Masonry defeated him under her own name. She hid behind the secret liquor leagues, but lent them her halls, animated their counsels, and did for them in brief precisely what she formerly did for the Southern Ku-Klux who hid their disguises in Masonic lodge-rooms, and whose exploits in burning school houses and killing defenseless negroes were really nothing but Masonic masquerades.

It has been computed that every saloon in the country must control on an average ten votes, which gives us two million saloon voters. Add to this the dark, silent, invisible factor of the secret lodge, and is it any wonder that pure men should be defeated at the polls and demagogism thrive as in a hot-bed? Yet many good people stand aghast at the idea of joining religion and politics, as if it might be like those chemical unions in which the composing elements are harmless enough when kept separate, but as soon as they come together develop explosive properties.

But is the union of the saloon and politics, or Masonry and politics, any less dangerous? Can the pulpit afford to keep silent regarding questions on which all the dramshops and gambling hells and secret lodges have their freely-expressed opinion?

CHAPTER XXXI.

A LIQUOR MOB.

The Jacksonville Legion was not a military company, as the reader may innocently imagine, but the name under which the liquor sellers of that city had banded together to prevent the passing of temperance laws and the execution of those already on the statute book. It was really a branch of a secret saloon association that could bribe and cajole and threaten and flatter the candidates of both parties; that always had delegates at the primaries and caucuses, and plenty of funds with which to corrupt public officials and defeat and betray prohibition measures. In fact the Legion was a power with capacities for mischief that far transcended the Order of the Red Mark.

Stephen Howland still continued to worry the liquor men and be the recipient of curses that he did not hear, and which would not have much troubled him if he had. But little as he suspected it his most formidable enemies were among his former Odd-fellow brethren. His defection was an unpardonable offense, an insult to the order. And considered in this light it is not strange that a very active desire to punish him for it in some way was developed in the breasts of many of the members? And what easier way to do this than through a Masonic understanding with his saloon foes?

The Jacksonville Legion was freely sprinkled with Masons and Odd-fellows of the Van Gilder type who had never borne very friendly feelings to the young lawyer, and now rather enjoyed the opportunity of hitting him in the dark. Stephen did not even know of the existence of the Jacksonville Legion, but he was soon to learn by disagreeable experience that liquor malevolence with the spur of lodge malice behind it is capable of desperate things.

Stephen was announced to speak one night on the pending Constitutional Amendment in the First Presbyterian church in Jacksonville. This church was very unpopular with the rum party for the advanced ground which its members took on prohibition, and also as being a gathering place for the W. C. T. U. So the trustees, shortly after the announcement, received an anonymous note from the Jacksonville Legion which read as follows:

SIRS:—This is to inform you that if you let your church be used by that lying blatherskite of a temperance lawyer, Stephen Howland, to spout his injurious nonsense and defame better men than himself, we shall find ways and means to destroy the building.

BY ORDER OF THE JACKSONVILLE LEGION.

The trustees quaked in their shoes, and with some reason, for it was not long since an attempt had been made to dynamite a temperance hotel. It would be just as easy to dynamite a church, and it was finally decided to hold the meeting in a public hall.

Stephen was not without a goodly share of phyical courage, but when he found on entering the place a crowd of irate whisky men filling up all the front seats next to the platform, he felt glad that the measure on which he was going to speak was such a one as to make it not incongruous, but on the contrary highly reasonable and proper that he should open his address with prayer.

The meeting was not entirely in the hands of the mob, and it was a positive inspiration to catch sight of Martin Treworthy in the audience—grim old hero of a hundred by-gone battles; and to meet Nelson Newhall's flashing eyes, that Stephen always said to himself had in them the look of a born leader; and see the calm, earnest faces of women that would any day dare a mob for the protection of their homes. But Stephen had put far from him the pride of fleshly confidence when he turned away from "the unfruitful works of darkness" at the call of the converted rumseller, Peter Snyder, and in an hour like this he felt that the eternal Jehovah himself must be his stronghold.

His prayer was audible to but few, the mob in front keeping up a perfect Babel of groans and hisses.

WAR HORRORS AT KHARTOUM.

The military correspondent of the Daily News at Dongola, sends another story of Gordon's death, told him by a Greek merchant:—

"My name is Rosti Penago. I kept some stores in Khartoum. I have lost all. The only reason the Mahdi's power is on the wane is because the people see that he, or rather his dervishes, spoil and plunder and carry off the women of the tribes. He will have difficulty in getting the tribes to follow him again.

"Gordon only went about the town of Khartoum on Friday. Stewart used to live in the old house in the square that Hicks lived in when he first arrived. No one lived in it when I left, nor did any one live in the Palace. The stench is too great. There are dead bodies in it; none were cleared away. Gordon's Coptic clerks were killed and left there. A fearful stench of putrid corpses pervades the whole atmosphere of Khartoum. The house you dwelt in, with other officers, over the postoffice, where are the drawings on the walls—your dining saloon—that now presents a horrible sight. It is strewed with corpses. For, you remember, there was a guard there over the stores. The guard ran from the gate after closing it, up to your dining-room. They were all massacred there. That poor old man, the Italian postmaster, was slain below.

"I was not at my house. I was with some Greeks—eight in all—near the mosque, when we heard a hideous uproar, as of men shouting and yelling, and of women wailing around about them on all sides. Nearer and nearer did this long-continued roar approach, swelling as it were. and now bursting close on our ears. Men with frightful gashes on their faces and limbs came flying by, and towards us women with torn garments and dishevelled hair, shrieking, screaming. I shall not forget that horrible din to the day of my death. 'We are lost! We are lost!' we cried. 'The place is taken!' But no one would tell us exactly what was the matter. We ran up to the top of the mosque and saw that the town was given up to massacre and bloodshed. We ran to a house, barricaded the doors and windows, went upstairs, shut ourselves in a room, and determined never to surrender, but die like Greeks; for we, mindful of our ancestors, fight to the last.

"Have you not asked me where Gordon Pasha was slain? You say everybody has said he was either killed on the court-yard steps of the palace, or outside, going to the Austrian Consul's house. They all lie! If you choose to believe them you may, it matters not to me. I am a respectable Greek merchant, not an Arab. You want the truth; I tell it to you. True, I did not see Gordon slain; but everybody in Khartoum knows where the event happened. An Arab rushed up stairs and shot him with a gun as he was reading the Bible. Another Arab cut off his head and put it on a spear; and so went forth into the city, carrying it and brandishing it on high. The Copts in the Palace, in the rooms below, were slaughtered at the same time.

"The Arabs came pouring in; they slew every man they could find; no mercy was shown to any one. There was no resistance. I don't think a hundred shots were fired by Egyptains or blacks. Men ran in and shut themselves up in houses; but doors were burst open, and spearing, cutting and slashing went on bravely in the streets, in the Market Square, in the bazaars. It was a horrible scene, this bazaar, afterwards. I went through it. Gay curtains, crimson curtains, and orange-stripped, golden-edged satins, silks, and muslins, lay smeared and splashed with blood; everything was upset and strewed about and trampled on. Everywhere was the wildest disorder. You know how narrow it was and how it winds. One corner was so full of corpses and dying that we could not get by. I had my hands tied, and I fell several times in the road slippery with blood. The havoc went on till eight o'clock. Then Mahomet Achmet sent over word from Omdurman that Allah had revealed to him that the slaughter must cease. We were told this. It was shouted about the streets, and those that were still hidden were bidden to come forth. Of forty-two Greeks only eight escaped. There were ten Jews; these were killed, I think.

"Gordon's head I saw on a spear. It was taken over to Omdurman, and shown to Mahomet Achmet. It was laid before him. A grim, savage smile passed over his face. He gazed long at the countenance of his late enemy. 'God be praised!' he cried, can 'this be his?' He did not express anger at Gordon's death, as you say has been reported—he made merry at his death when it was told him. The head was then borne away, and men plucked the hair out of his head and beard, and spat in his face. His body was cut up into little pieces. This was his end!"

The church of God is to-day courting the world. Its members are trying to bring it down to the level of the ungodly. The ball, the theatre, nude and lewd art, social luxuries, with all their loose moralities, are making inroads into the sacred inclosure of the church, and as a satisfaction for all this worldliness, Christians are making a great deal of Lent, and Easter, and Good Friday, and church ornamentations. It is the old trick of Satan. The Jewish church struck on that rock, the Romish church was wrecked on the same, and the Protestant church is fast reaching the same doom.

Our great dangers, as we see them, are assimilation to the world, neglect of the poor, substitution of the form for the fact of godliness, abandonment of discipline, a hireling ministry, an impure Gospel, which summed up is a fashionable church.—M. E. Bishop, R. S. Foster.

—A revised version of the Scriptures in French is now in course of publication at Neuchatel. The work is under the direction of a committee presided over by Professor Godet the eminent commentator.

—The London Christian World says: "A goodly number of Mr. Moody's English friends will visit Northfield, the evangelist's home in America, in order to be present at the ten days' conference, to be held there during the month of August."

—Some unknown friend of the American Bible Society has recently shown his interest in its work by sending to its correspondent at St. Petersburg, an envelope bearing simply the address: "To the American Bible Society, God bless its work!" which contained seventy-five rubles, or an equivalent of $37.50.

REFORM NEWS.

MISSOURI'S MISERY.

VERNON, WIS.

While attending the United Presbyterian General Assembly at Topeka, I had a kind invitation to visit an old-time friend at Kingsville, Mo. On my arrival I learned that the Rev. Dr. Wood of Kansas City, presiding elder of the M. E. church South, etc., was billed for a lecture in the place that very night: subject, "Freemasonry," I gladly accepted a free seat in the Christian church, which was opened for aforesaid purpose. In due time our lecturer appeared, a fine-looking, oily-tongued gentleman.

To the readers of the Cynosure it is hardly necessary to review his eulogy. It was the same old story "of injured innocence and intolerant enemies; of no antagonism to Christianity, but rather an unfolding of its highest principles of universal brotherhood," etc. He did not deny, as some do, that it is a religion; but on the contrary emphasized the fact. He also made special efforts to mystify his hearers with regard to its anti-Christian character, by quoting the blasphemous mimicry of the third degree where the words, "lion of the tribe of Judah" occur, to prove that Christ is not excluded.

He also referred, with a wondrous show of wisdom to the symbolic number three, which is so prominent in Masonry, and with evident feeling of triumph, said, "Here is a plain acknowledgement of the Trinity." He was equally bland and subtle on other points, saying, e. g., that "the Jew could and does refer all this to their coming Messiah."

In the mean time I had agreed to preach in the U. P., church on the coming Sabbath. I now determined to use the evening service in refuting, to the best of my ability, this man of two religions. The next day announcement was made accordingly. When the time came I was greeted with a good audience, some of them Masons, no doubt curious to know what could be said against such a fair showing. I had the best of attention for about an hour and a half, during which I endeavored to probe the sophistry and unveil the monster, which the speaker had used every art to conceal.

Now for a few reflections:

1. It is a most sorry sight to see a minister of the Gospel turn aside from the work to which he has been set apart, to laud and proclaim another gospel which is uot another.

If Masonry is a religion, it is either Christian or anti-christian. If it is Christian, then every man, woman and child has a right to all its mysteries and blessings without the bar of secrecy. If it is anti-christian, (and there is no question as to that) then not only every Christian, but every lover of the common principles of morality, should arise, and with one heart and one mind oppose this godless, because Christless, system to the death.

2. No doubt this D. D. has often been just as elequent in defence of Christianity, as he was ou this occasion of Masonry. But how are his hoodwinked hearers to know which of these rival systems he has been commissioned to advocate, and if Masonry is equal, or superior to Christianity, as would seem from his lecture, what becomes of the "one Lord and the one faith?" Christ and Christianity admit of no rivals. When the trumpet thus gives an uncertain sound, why should it be thought strange that the churches are asleep, and that infidelity holds high carnival in the land.

3. Just here lies the secret of the imbecility of Christendom; it is divided not only outwardly but inwardly. We do not all speak the same thing. Two ministers meet at Kiugsville, and one is constrained to spend the greater part of his time there in confuting what the other has said. "Bah!" says the skeptic, "these men cannot both be led by the Spirit; it will be time enough for us to consider the question of salvation when Christians can agree." Although this reasoning is false, yet who will not say, that in this way untold evil is done, and untold power wasted. And is there no remedy for all this unutterable coufusiou in church and State?

There is only one hope, but that is blessed and all-sufficient. "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven iu flaming fire taking vengeance on all them that kuow not God and who obey not the Gospel." Only the day of the Lord will bring about the restitution of all things, and usher in the dispensation of the fulness of times. J. B. Galloway.

A GOOD MEETING IN MISSISSIPPI.

Columbus, Miss., Aug. 10, 1885.

The Convention of the Associated Churches of Christ which met at the Brownlee Chapel, July 31st was one of deep interest. The addressess were decided, pointed, and of such variety as commanded attention. It was very gratifying to hear one after another relate how he had been solicited to join secret societies but had refused and why he was opposed to them. A marked increase in the knowledge of the evils of secret orders and determination to stand up against them and trust in the overruling and protecting hand of Providence, was observable during the discussion. One of the speakers graphically illustrated the power of God by relating how he and a number of others had been protected when his house was blown from over them and the timbers hurled in every direction around them, leaving them all unhurt. He showed very forcibly the folly of trusting in secret orders for support and aid when we have such a God in whom we may trust. He alluded to the promise, "Trust in the Lord, and do good and verily thou shalt be fed," and proved that there is no necessity for trusting in secret orders for support for the short time we have to stay in this world: but to be ready for the long, long eternity is our chief concern. Another speaker asserted his belief that the Lord would blow away the secret orders as chaff before the wind.

A sketch was given by another of his knowledge of a colored preacher who wanted money and organized several secret societies in order to replenish his pocket-book. He charged one dollar for initiation and took in ten dollars in one night at one place, $50 at another, and $40 at another. During the ceremong of initiation at one place, a boy became frightcned and called on the Lord for help. The leader told him the Lord had nothing to do with it; that he run that concern himself; and afterwards that boy or another one, was killed at the time of a general fright. This preacher went on swindling the people in diffcrent States through secret orders, until he was tried for embezzling their money entrusted to his care and sent to the penitentiary.

The following preamble and resolutions were adopted by the convention:

Whereas, There is great effort made by seeret orders to rule the people of the South; and

Whereas, Many have not had the opportunity to inform themselves of their evil tendencies; and

Whereas, Secret orders are receiving from many the love, the time and the money which should be given to the church of God, therefore

Resolved, That we the Convention of the Associated Churches of Christ do heartily approve of the efforts made by the National Christian Association to extend the reform work throughout the country and in particular to send a special lecturer south.

Resolved, That we bid God-speed to all the workers in the anti-secret reform and ask their prayers for a blessing upon the work of the Associated Churches of Christ.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MEMPHIS COLORED KU-KLUX.

Washington, D. C.

Memphis, Tenn., August 5.—No. 12 Dean avenue, the residence of the Rev. R. N. Countee, colored, pastor of the Tabernable Baptist church and manager of The Living Way, was suddenly surrounded yesterday by about two hundred masked negroes, who fired volley after volley of bullets into the building. Loud calls were made for the presence of Mr. Countee, but he failed to appear. The negro porter fired his pistol at the mob and managed to escape. Countee has been a member of one of the colored secret societies, but resigned and began denouncing them. The members of these societies take an oath not to divulge the secrets on penalty of having their scalps removed and their brains exposed to the eye of the scorching sun. Countee is said to have made himself liable to this rule.—Dispatch to Washington Star.

The murderous despotism of the secret orders is well illustrated by the above. Those of the colored people are no exception, nor is there any class that has been so thoroughly demoralized and defrauded by them. Nor is it strange that a people but just emerged from the bondage of slavery and still bound by the fetters of ignorance should follow the example of so many who claim to be "the superior race." If secret societies were good for the white man they could not, it was believed, be bad for the negro, and if this superior race had devised societies with death penalties, it was surely not improper for colored men to have societies with like penalties and that such penalties should be inflicted. What wonder that ignorant people should thus reason, and be astonished to find that they had committed a crime in executing the penealties of an institution "founded by King Solomon, patronized by the Saints John, and the great and good of all ages." The intelligent men, and especially the ministers of religion, who have lent their influence to this system of wickedness, are the men who of all others are responsible for this and similar outrages against personal rights and public decency.

There are professed Christian ministers in this city who have, like this colored pastor, sworn to conceal the crimes of their brother Masons under penalty of having "their skulls smote off and their brains exposed to the scorching rays of the sun." They, too, like this brave colored brother, have discovered the folly and sin of their unholy covenants, but unlike him they lack the courage of their convictions and fear men more than their Maker whom they profess to serve. Nay more; they "hate him that rebuketh in the gate. They abhor him that speaketh uprightly." They plead their "covenant with death and their argument with hell," as their justification for silence, if not of active co-operation in wickedness; and thus "judgment is turned away backwards, and justice standeth afar off, for truth is fallen in the street and equity cannot enter. Yea, truth faileth, and he that departeth from evil worketh himself a prey." And the Lord sees it now, as he saw it then, and it displeases him.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT FROM MISSISSIPPI.

Columbus, Miss.

Editor Cynosure:—The donations from the North have been a substantial aid to our work. Our thanks are especially due just now to Sisters Cook and Cheeney and the Chicago Anti-secrecy Christian Band of Hope for recent donations. To them and to all others who have aided us, I would say we are very grateful to you. The Bibles, hymn books, and reform literature were gladly received. The wall tents were especially acceptable. The dry goods always find a place. Our hands are full to overflowing with work and the fields are white to the harvest. I ask an interest in the prayers of all God's people for us, our families, and our work. I believe that God has great blessings in store for this part of his vineyard, but pray that he may send those blessings now. We are in a field where there is great need of work, and we love God's work and the spirit is still willing. Our hope is in God. M. A. F. Tapley.

MISSION WORK IN KENTUCKY.

A LETTER FROM JOHN G. FEE TO A FRIEND.

Dear Bro:—I make to your letter a public reply, because it is a representative letter—represeuts the attitude of many, even good men, who are ready to help on certain conditions.

You say, "If the school and church at Camp Nelson is to be on such a basis that it cannot receive aid from, and be under the care of the American Missionary Association, as long as that may be needed, I should not feel free to work to secure funds for it, gladly as I will do so, if it is not so restricted. At least it should not be tied up in its charter any more than is Berea College."

In reply let me say:

1. Your kind manner led me to hope that you would be ready to help in any confessedly good work, even if in the work, we did not cast out devils in your name—I mean in the name of your association,

2. The charter of the academy at Camp Nelson is not "tied up," any more than the charter of Berea College is; it is exactly like it; the one was taken from the other. One of the by-laws of Berea College declares, "This institution shall be under an influence strictly Christian; and as such opposed to sectarianism, slave-holding, caste, and every other wrong institution or practice."

An explanatory note, passed as a resolution by the convention that adopted the constitution and by-laws of Berea College, declares that "to be anti-sectarian is to oppose every thing that causes schism in the body of Christ." Thus Berea College and Camp Nelson Academy are not only alike in their charters, but both as thorouhgly committed against sectarianism as against slave-holding or caste.

Also, each school in official acts, has declared itself not only anti-sectarian, but also "undenominational:" not only opposed to that which divides the body of Christ, but also to names that mark divisions, and serve as reminders of these divisions.

3. The church and school, both at Berea and Camp Nelson, were planted before the American Missionary Association did any educational work; and before that Association took its "uew departure"—became the organ of a denomination.

Before the war that Association was not the organ of any denomination, but was simply the agency of funds given for certain righteous ends. Since the war the Association has, avowedly, become the organ of the Congregational denomination, pushing in the South the particular polity of that denomination.

That polity may be as good or better than some other polities; but we do not care to make a party on any polity or doctrine, but simply to gather together those who are in Christ.

Also, the school at Camp Nelson has its constitution, its board of trustees, and a charter from the State Legislature. Why, then, should it be under the "care" of the American Missionary Association, or under the care of the Mission Board of any denomination. Also, if the school at Camp Nelson shall adhere to its original protest against denominationalism, and refuse to bid Godspeed to the denominational work of the American Missionary Association, or the denominational work of any other association, who has any cause to complain?

Many generous-hearted men, contribute to our work, and do not demand that as a condition of their aid we work under the "care" of the mission boards of their denominations, and you ought not so to demand. If we can, with the aid of liberal-minded men, build up schools and churches in this feeble and distracted South, which schools and churches shall be undenominational, the common home of all true Christians in the locality, who should complain or withhold necessary means?

We need help—sorely need help—but cannot take it at the price of being regarded as the child of or under the care of any denomination. Two hundred dollars, added to what is now pledged, would enable us now to complete an important building for school purposes, in Camp Nelson, Ky. The building is enclosed but not completed. We will not go in debt even two hundred dollars, unpledged. The building, then, much as we need it, must stand, for a time, by its uncompleted state a testimony against denominational folly—the folly that refuses help unless "you adopt our pattern," "our faith and order," "cast out devils in our name." John G. Fee.

LOCATING AN INDIAN MISSION.

Twin Brooks, Dakota.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—On the morning of August 7th, as I came from the P. O., Rev. L. J. Hauge proposed that we take a trip over to the Yellow Banks, a small stream in Stockholm township, called by the Indians, "Brown Earth," and look up a locality for the prospective Indian Mission School and Home which the Young People's Missionary Association contemplates founding.

Accompanied by W. E. Early, a medical student, we started out on foot, it being impossible to get a team in the harvest time, and going directly south one and a half miles we came to Judge Abbott's spring where we refreshed ourselves by drinking of the best water in eastern Dakota, and then on over the beautiful prairies, until we met Bro. Fred Case, who kindly gave us a quantity of delicious cherries which we disposed of while enjoying a rest.

On again over some rugged hills (our route lay along the eastern slope of the coteaux), and occasionally gazing off to the east where we could see across the most beautiful valley to be found anywhere in the West, until we reached the Yellow Banks creek, which runs rapidly through a beautiful strip of timber comprising ash, oak, elm, bass-wood, cotton-wood, etc., and then climbing a very steep hill, we arrived at the house of Rev. O. S. Case, where we were soon gathered around a table bounteously spread with the good things of God's earth, and the dinner hour was spent very pleasantly indeed, with wholesome conversation on missionary work among the Indians.

Dinner over, Bro. Case accompanied us about one mile to show us a farm owned by Mr. John Soule, an Indian of the Sioux nation, which we rambled over until we reached the Yellow Banks again, where we seated ourselves on a bank about seventy-five feet high, where we talked over the prospect of obtaining the land we were looking over, and also the probable good that might be expected from such a school and home as is talked of being established here. We did not see Mr. Soule, but Bro. Case assured us of getting the land, if we concluded to locate the mission here, where there are many advantages.

We went down to the creek where we found a beautiful spring whose waters are made peculiar in taste by the mixture of sulphate of iron, as Bro. Hauge decided. After reviewing the situation we were satisfied that we need look no farther. Yours, in the cause of missions, C. E. Walker,
(Pastor U. B. church.)

WHERE ARE WE DRIFTING?

A hundred years ago human slavery was considered a divine institution. Fifty years ago the civilized world said that it was doubtful. Twenty-five years ago it was considered unendurable and was banished from our land by the blood and treasure of our beloved sons. The prince and power of the air having failed in making this "land of the free and home of the brave" the home of human slavery, he has been enabled to set in motion a plan as much more destructive as the brightest mind in the land can picture: as much worse as soul-slavery is worse than human slavery. Now for the church, the country, and for our soul's sake we must consider the soul-bondage of the present day. Satan has got some of our choicest citizens to bow the knee to Baal, or in other words forswear themselves, thereby getting the poison of asps under their tongues as taught in Rom. 3: 13: doing what King Ahab wanted Naboth to do; or what a Jewish servant who preferred to remain with his former master, he must have his ears bored through, thus reminding us of the man who violates our Saviour's command, "Thou shalt not forswear thyself." This person has his conscience as certainly bored as the other his ear, by his violation of God's law.

Hence we see why some of our respectable townsmen can tell a lie and hold themselves in readiness to swear to it; as, for instance, Esq. Minard. of Kirkland, last spring declared that he would make oath that the reason why I opposed the Masons was because I undertook to join them and they blackballed me. The statement being so often made by others of that clan in other places, I had to quash it by tendering them $25 for the affidavits to prove the story. They then changed their course, as vipers generally do when drawn out of their holes, as demonstrated by their threats respecting my life if out after dark.

May God help in showing forth the man of sin until our land is rid of this rule, which is neither in justice, mercy or truth. M. L. Worcester.

PITH AND POINT.

A LIST COMING FROM KANSAS.

"The Lord is my Shepherd I shall not want." Praise his name. He gives me grace to endure all things; and that includes the power of the secret empire. The Lord gives me power to oppose it with all my might, as I think it is of the devil, who is the enemy of our souls and the opposer of all true religion. I know the Cynosure is of the Lord and I love it, and hand it to my neighbors to read. I expect to do all I can for its advancement and circulation. I think I will send you a list of subscribers soon. I will also say to all the pilgrims, here is a good place to get cheap homes. We want this country filled up with good, solid Christian men and women. I will give any information desired.—M. R. Becktel, Macksville, Stafford county, Kansas.

THEY ARE NOT THERE.

I want to say to Elder Nathan Callender, that God's children do not "chew the cud," as he seems to intimate in his last article in the Cynosure; nor do they "burn incense" to Baal, and thus poison God's free air with the fumes of tobacco; neither are they found in the secret lodges; for the light that shines makes manifest, so that it is impossible for any one to fellowship darkness and yet remain a Bible-Christian; nor can they be found in churches where evil and wickedness is practiced, winked at an covered up. Branches in the living Vine cannot do such things.—R. Canning, Galva, Ill.

ILL-FITTING LODGE YOKE.

I have been receiving your paper and with pleasure reading its columns. I am certainly in full sympathy with the object of your publication and gratetul for the privilege of having it in my family. My wife last night spoke of its value and wished each copy might be preserved and bound. Surely it would make a volume of valuable reading. I never felt at liberty to join the Masonic order, though often requested to do so, but believed that it was no place for me as a Christian, and while being initiated into the temperance organizations, and wearing their regalia I have felt condemned and ashamed. You have my full sympathy in your work and prayers that good—as I believe it will—may result from your labors.—F. G. Cortland, High Point, N. C.

THIRD QUARTER.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS.

LESSON IX, Aug. 30, 1885.—The story of Naboth. 1 Kings 21: 4-19.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the Lord. 1 Kings 21: 20.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Highhanded wrong is never permitted without a purpose of ultimate good, though we may not discern it at the time. vs. 4–14. The childish weakness of Ahab and Jezebel's strength of wickedness are here so dramatically contrasted that a reader of Shakespeare is at once reminded of Lady Macbeth urging on her weak husband to the deed of blood from which his better nature revolts. Ahab does not inquire how she is going to fulfil her promise, though he knows very well there can be but one way. She writes letters in his name and seals them with his seal, but Ahab flatters himself that because he is only a silent partner in the crime he can escape the guilt of it. So a man who leases his premises to a saloonist may imagine that as he does not directly participate in the traffic he is innocent of the blood of its victims. Yet the man who stands behind the bar and actually sells the rum may be less guilty in the sight of heaven than he. Jezebel's command is obeyed to the letter. Not one of the Israelitish nobles charged with this nefarious business has the manliness or the courage to protest. Here we see Baal worship bringing forth its natural fruits—cruelty, treachery, murder. It has sapped all public and private honor, all sense of official integrity. To all this is added hypocrisy. The foul deed is done in the name of religion and under the guise of a solemn fast. False worships often simulate the true, but it is always for the purpose of compassing their own vile ends. The crime of Ahab and Jezebel overthrew their dynasty in the succeeding generation. Wickedness works its own ruin. The vices and wickedness of kings hasten the day of republican freedom. It was the crimes of the Romish hierarchy that inspired Luther and Savanarola. The murder of Morgan has worked infinite good by disclosing the real nature of Freemasonry. The outrages of the liquor party strengthen the hands of temperance advocates, and every outburst of evil shortens the reign of iniquity.

2. The wrongdoer must meet the Elijah of his own accusing conscience. vs. 15–20. Capitalists who give starvation wages, speculators who make "corners" in the necessaries of life, rumsellers who take the drunkard's money and give him poison and death, lodge leaders who take three dollars and give back one—these are all Ahabs who want Naboth's vineyard, and get it. The world does not see the Nemesis waiting at their gates. Elijah does not mention Jezebel. The whole guilt of the transaction he lays on Ahab's shoulders. This is just. He was king and might have prevented the deed if he would. A Jezebel may incite and stir up the evil passions of an Ahab, but she is powerless to create an Ahab. "Thou hast sold thyself." A sinner's bondage is voluntary. When sold to the devil we are always self-sold.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

To what state does Baal worship bring men? Rom. 1: 29–31. Why are we commanded not to fret because of evil doers? Ps. 68: 5.; Rom. 12: 19; Rev. 19: 11. Does the Bible everywhere represent the sinner as selling himself to do evil? Isa. 50: 1; Rev. 7: 14.

After the events of the last lesson, Elijah seems to have retired from public notice in Israel for several years. Perhaps the king and queen thought they were rid of him forever. But their expectation was vain. Ahab, king of Israel, having successfully resisted two invasions of his land by the king of Syria, employed the interval of peace which followed in attending to affairs at home. Among other projects, he conceived the idea of enlarging the grounds of his royal palace at Jezreel, by purchasing a vineyard which adjoined them on the east, and turning it into a garden. This incident, unimportant in itself, is narrated because it was the immediate cause of the fall of the house of Ahab, and the great political and religious revolution which followed.—Todd.

Naboth refused to sell the vineyard because it was the "inheritance of his fathers." He refused (1) because he had as good a right to what he possessed as any king. (2) On religious grounds, because the sale of a paternal inheritance was forbidden in the law (Lev. 25: 23–28; Num. 36: 7 seq.) i. e., he was forbidden to sell it permanently out of the family. He was, therefore, not merely at liberty as a personal right to refuse the king's proposal, but bound by the commandment of God.—Keil.

"And he laid him down upon his bed." Such an open manifestation of ill-temper is thoroughly characteristic of an Oriental king.—Cook. It accords with Homers' representation even of the Grcek heroes. They cry like children when they are in trouble; they rend their garments, and roll themselves in the dust in a way that we would deem utterly extravagant.—Taylor Lewis.

"Proclaim a fast." As was customary in the event of national calamities (Joel 1: 14), after great sins (1 Sam. 7: 6; Joel 2: 12), or for the turning away of apprehended misfortune (2 Chron. 20: 3). It was not merely to furnish occasion for the procedure against Naboth (Thenius) but rather "to publish the fact that a grievous fault was resting upon the city, which must be expiated."—Keil.

"Set Naboth on high."—Bring him before the people for trial. Put him in a conspicuous place, as a criminal is placed before the court.

'And set two men." They were to find two men who were willing to perjure themselves. According to Deut. 17: 6 and 19: 15, every crime punishable by death must be testified to by at least two witnesses, who also must at the stoning make the beginning.—Lange.

"Sons of Belial." Belial is not to be regarded as a proper name in the Old Testament. Its meaning is worthlessness, recklessness. "Sons of Belial" means simply worthless, lawless fellows. In the New Testament, Belial stands for Satan.—Smith's Bible Dict.

"Thou didst blaspheme God." Jezebel did not believe in God, but Naboth did, and was an acknowledged servant of God (see under verse 4), and the people were nominally living under the law of Jehovah. Jezebel made use of this fact, and would seem unusually favorable to the God of Israel in executing the law against those who spoke evil of the true God.

"That he may die." It appears from 2 Kings 9: 26, that Naboth's sons were put to death at the same time. This was forbidden by the law (Deut. 24: 16); but the practice of all the surrounding nations, however, was the very opposite of this, and Jezebel availed herself of the fact, in order to remove Naboth's heirs out of the way. According to still prevailing Oriental usage, the property of a criminal reverts to the crown, certain portions excepted, which are the perquisites of the executioner; and this is easier done when the law of inheritance has no chance to come into play.—Van Lennep.

"Which he refused to give thee for money." There is a proud, malicious triumph in these words. "He refused, simple fool, to sell it. Now thou canst have it for nothing. I have discovered a better plan than buying it."—Pulpit Com.

"In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood." The repentance of Ahab having secured him immunity from this sentence, his subsequent folly and sin (chap. 22: 27) nevertheless brought down upon him a judgment of God strikingly similar, as we might expect it would be, to that originally denounced against him, which was now reserved for his son. In other words, the prophecy was fulfilled to the letter in the person of his son, but it had a secondary fulfilment in its spirit on himself.—Pulpit Com. The same retribution also fell on Jezebel (2 Kings 9: 30–35), for her crime was greater even than Ahab's. At her door lies the real sin of the murder. The hands that accomplished it were not so guilty as the heart that suggested it and the mind that planned it. Ahab broke the tenth, Jezebel the sixth, eighth, ninth and tenth commandments. Covetousness, false witness, murder, confiscation, she stands convicted of them all.—Pulpit Com.

A WARM COMMENDATION

from a Southern minister, Rev. Wm. Riedel, publisher of the Investigator, Stewartsville, Missouri:

We were exceeding glad to see the Christian Cynosure again. We well remember the time when the office of the brave little Cynosure, under Messrs. E. A. Cook & Co., as publishers, was destroyed by the great fire in Chicago, on Sunday night and Monday, the 9th of October, 1871. At that time the entire office material of the Cynosure and almost the entire stock of valuable books was gone, and nothing was left but God and his truth, and the confidence of the publishers, first of all in the Almighty, and then in thousands of earnest men and women, who had stood by the Cynosure in its struggling infancy, and who no doubt stand by it still in the good and great work which it is doing up to this day and which it will continue to do as long as it will have to be done.

To-day the Christian Cynosure again comes to us as a large and greatly improved sixteen-page weekly. It has now nearly completed its seventeenth year. We will take this opportunity to call the attention of all our readers to it, the members of the Masonic fraternity not excepted. The Christian Cynosure is the national representative of the movement to "withstand, expose and remove" the secret lodges. As such it is able to present a most attractive list of contributors, embracing some of the ablest writers on Christian reform topics in over twenty denominations. The Cynosure has been known for over sixteen years as one of the most radical and uncompromising defenders of Christianity against the error of false religious systems, especially those now organized and powerful in the secret lodges of America.

The Cynosure is a welcome family paper in thousands of homes, having a choice family department, temperance, religious and secular news, farm notes, editorial notes on current events, literary reviews etc.

The editors are ably assisted by the lecturers and agents of the National Christian Association and its auxiliaries. They are doing a good work. Their paper ought to be well patronized. Besides the thoroughly evangelical tone and spirit of the Cynosure commend it to the respect and sympathy of every true friend and lover of our common Zion. The subscription price for the paper is $2 per year; if paid strictly in advance, only $1.50. Send for it by addressing the Christian Cynosure, No. 221 West Madison street, Chicago, Ill.

The American Party.

First Nomination for President at Oberlin, Ohio, May 23, 1872.
Platform Adopted at Chicago, June 28, 1872.
Name Adopted at Syracuse, N. Y., June 3, 1874.

Presidental candidates:

1872—Charles Francis Adams and Joseph L. Barlow.
1876—James B. Walker and Donald Kirkpatrick.
1880—J. W. Phelps and Samuel C. Pomeroy.
1884—J. Blanchard and J. W. Conant nominated; the former withdrawing, Samuel C. Pomeroy was nominated. Both nominees withdrawing, the support of the party was generally given to John P. St. John and William Daniel, candidates of the Prohibition party.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

Adopted at Chicago, June 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile hands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.

4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.

5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

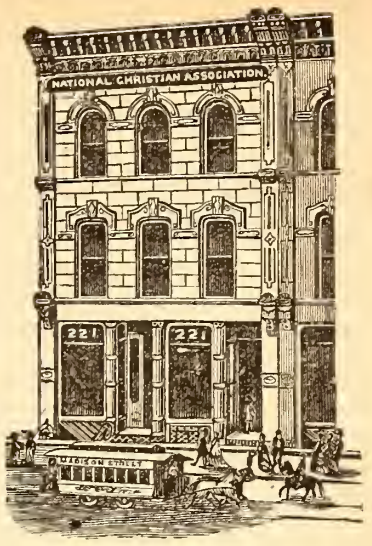
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.

7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.

8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.

9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.

10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.



11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.

14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.

15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

The Christian Cynosure.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, AUGUST 20, 1885.

A GENERAL EVANGELICAL CONVENTION.

We hope no reader failed to read and reflect on Rev. Halleck Floyd's letter in the last Cynosure, nor omit the excellent editorial from the Wesleyan on another page.

The National Board of Directors recommended a General Convention of churches, and at Hartsville, Ind., an able committee: Rev. Halleck Floyd, Dr. L. Davis, and Rev. Z. McNew, to consult with like committees on the subject.

Will our readers take this subject under consideration at once? Autumn, with its long evenings, will soon be here, and the proposed convention should be held as early as possible. Where and what shall it be? The Cynosure is open for answers. A convention at Chicago in 1851, "to divorce American missions from American slavery," accomplished its work so well that in three years scarce a slaveholding church in the whole South received aid from the American Home Missionary Society, and the national Republican party was organized five years later, and soon put all other political parties into a dead minority. Two-thirds of the entire American people are in heart opposed to secret socicties. Once enlightened on the subject the masses will never go back, the whole weight of argument being against the organized deism and despotism of the secret orders.

KU-KLUX RAID IN MEMPHIS.

One week after the colored Odd-fellows of Memphis, Tennessee, had summoned Rev. R. N. Countee, pastor of the Tabernacle Baptist church and managing editor of the Living Way, to trial for denouncing their immoralities, they attempted his assassination. Last week we printed the charges and Mr. Countee's reply. They were dated Tuesday, July 28th; on the ncxt Tuesday night the assault was made, which is described in the following dispatch, slightly abridged, to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat:

Memphis, Aug. 4.—At three o'clock this morning a body of masked and disguised men went to the residence of R. N. Countee, the colored pastor of the Tabernacle Baptist church on Dean Avenue, and surrounded the house. The crowd were negroes, and they demanded that he should "Come out o' dat house, you miserable sinner; you'se wanted by your betters." Countee heard the command but did not obey. Instead, he opened fire with a six-shooter. The shooting from within was returned by the party on the outside, who numbered about thirty and were armed with shotguns and pistols. During the firing Countee rushed from the front entrance of his house, broke through the few assailants there and ran down the street. He was fired upon but escaped unhurt. The masked mob then left, and when the police reached the place there was nothing to indicate any disturbance but the perforated dwelling of the minister. The cause of all this was the action of Countee who was formerly a member of the Grand United Order of Odd-fellows. He recently spoke against that and all other secret societies, and last Sunday announced his intention to reveal the secrets of the order. He was abetted by W. A. Brinkley and B. A. Imes, two other colored ministers, Baptist and Congregational. The threats of the lodge led to a postponement, as the pastors feared a bloody riot had the meeting proceeded. The colored population is all worked up against the three ministers, and there is no doubt but what they will be compelled to leave Memphis.

A distinguished and learned gentleman who has not spoken publicly against the lodge, said lately: "The grand difficulty is to get the minds of the American people turned towards it." One almost wishes that "the Lord would permit the Masons to do some dreadful things," as he did the slave holders. Thirty masked men, armed with shotguns and revolvers, attacking and riddling a minister's house because he leaves and speaks against secret orders, may pass for "a dreadful thing" in the absence of worse. But there will be worse. "The system includes the spirit of murder and every crime this side," said Dr. Norris of Birmingham, Iowa; and thanks be to God, colored people are now reckoned and vote as men.

THE DEVIL'S MASTERPIECE.

CORRUPTIO OPTIMI PESSIMA.

"Thus all things prove the adage just,
A good thing spoiled corrupts to worst."

We have received for notice a wonderful book, a volume of 832 pages, entitled "Fifty Years in the Church of Rome," by Rev. Charles Chiniquy, St. Anne, Kankakee county, Illinois. The author is the well known ex-Catholic priest, lecturer, leader of a colony of French Canadian Catholics, settled years ago and now prospering in Kankakee county.

Mr. Chiniquy writes with uncommon force, and gives the names of persons, and the dates and circumstances of his facts; so that his narrative can be overthrown if untrue. He claims to prove that popery is a conspiracy against American principles and institutions, and that Romish priests aided and abetted the slavery rebellion and were the real assassins of President Lincoln, and sustains his theory by a formidable array of facts and quotations which cannot fail to make a profound impression where his book is read, which it is likely to be extensively.

He states that Mr. Lincoln was his lawyer, and cleared him in Urbana, Ill., in 1856, from a malicious prosecution set on by Romish priests because he had forsaken and opposed the Romish church.

Of course such facts can be disproved or confirmed by court records, and his narrative is full of such, giving it the air of a horrible drama proved true by names and dates, in which President Lincoln bears a prominent part and is claimed as a chief authority, and Booth, Surrat, Wirtz, etc., figure conspicuously.

But the book is written more in the style of romance than reality, especially the chapter on the confessional: and, singularly enough, it is dedicated to Freemasons, Romish priests, and others, and Mr. Chiniquy warmly defends secret lodges as his champions against the pope, which we can only account for by the mental confusion caused by his twenty-five years administration of a system, once a holy church, but corrupted into the "prolific" mother of abominations.

We have conversed and corresponded much with Romish priests, and pondered earnestly on the papacy. We shall endeavor to give Mr. Chiniquy's book a thorough review, and the whole subject of the relations of lodgery and popery a sifting and historic investigation.

TWO SIDES TO THE CHINESE QUESTION.

It is not revealed from God that the United States must "receive all that come," like the sea and the gallows; but it is revealed that oaths must be only by his name. To swear a Chinaman by a Christian oath when he does not believe in the God he swears by, is to make the oath a farce and justice impossible.

The San Francisco Daily Report gives in full the statistics of California Chinese. It is a report of the Supervisor's special committee, an exceedingly able decument. In the twelve blocks in San Francisco called "Chinatown," there are 15,180 bunks in which 30,360 Chinese sleep. Scrofula and leprosy result from promiscuous cohabitation in these close quarters. In Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, there are 400 lepers in a population of 20,000; and an island, six hours away is kept by the government as an exclusive abode of lepers, whose noses, fingers and toes are slowly rotting off. The leprosy was not known in the Sandwich Islands, before Captain Cook went there in 1779.

The people of San Francisco, familiar with these facts concerning their island neighbors, shrink from contact with Chinatown. None but Chinese will rent next to Chinese, and hence Chinatown is spreading over the city, and the taking of San Francisco by the disgusting causes now in operation, would seem to be only a question of time. The Chinese are already a full sixth or seventh of the people of the State; and, as vice has no nationality, drunkenness by liquor and opium, and whoredom bring the white and yellow population into contact, and the city into contagion with the desolating scourge of God: and the supply is unlimited if immigration is free. Besides all this, the Chinese have, like the Masons and Mormons, a government by secret societies, which contravene the decrees of courts, and defy all government but their own. Mr. James H. Purdy. a prominent citizen of Ohio, and editor of the Xenia Free Press during the slavery struggle, wrote the editor of the Cynosure a while before he died, from his hotel in San Francisco: "Within a few weeks two witnesses in courts in this city lately refused to testify because they were Masons and their Masonic obligations forbid them to swear against members of the craft. One of them, an Irishman, said, with a shrug, 'Yer honor knows how the thing is yerself.' One of them was imprisoned for contempt of court, but neither of them testified."

How long will it take, if Mormons, Masons and Chinesc are allowed to maintain their respective secret oaths and governments, to subvert entirely all American institutions. The first American or majority constitution ever written, was drawn up and signed on board the Mayflower, off Cape Cod, December, 1620, beginning "In the name of God, and for the advancement of the Christian faith." Every deed, bill of rights, and even indictment for crime, contained a recognition of the God of the Bible, and every family rested on and sprung from Christ's law of marriage; which Masons, Mormons and Chinese ignore or set aside: the Mormon by polygamy, the Mason by his obligation to respect the chastity of the female relatives of Masons; and the Chinaman by organic and general prostitution.

Rev. Otis Gibson, who had lived in China ten years, testified before the Legislative Committee, 1877: "The women as a general thing are slaves, bought or stolen in China and brought here." And Mr. Gibson gave the article of prostitution under which the girl is bought!

The Supervisor's Committee says, "In one house alone on Sullivan's Alley, your committee found the inmates to be nineteen prostitutes and sixteen children." And in all Chinatown their report sums up: "Women living in families, 57;" "Professional prostitutes, 567."

If this report is reliable, and it seems to be, there are two valid objections to the unrestricted admission of such a population: slavery and heathenism; both of which subvert the very grounds of our national existence.

Then prosecuting attorneys, chiefs of police, and judges of police courts of respectability and standing testified to the Supervisor's Committee that the Chinese have "secret tribunals" formed by the several Chinese companies or guilds." They say, "The records of these tribunals have been discovered, and are found to be antagonistic to our legal system." They testified that two interpreters in the courts were killed by the agents of these secret tribunals. Ah Quong went out of court and was brought back in half an hour, "shot in the back and terribly mutilated with a hatchet. This was in broad daylight, about 11 o'clock in the morning, on Third and I streets, one of the most public places in Sacramento." (Testimony of Chas. T. Jones, District Attorney of Sacramento county.)

REMARKS.

1. To admit a million of Chinese to control by their ballots our Pacific States, with the hope of converting them, would be like admitting savages to enter and control the mission-houses and govern the missionaries.

2. To send Masons to suppress Mormon-polygamy, without suppressing the Mason-lodges, will end in failure.

3. The only effectual remedy for these monstrous evils is to adopt and carry out the American platform.

—The Lecturer's Institute has a well planned programme this week and closes next Tuesday with a convention in which Rev. Dr. J. E. Roy, of this city, Pres. C. A. Blanchard, Mrs. Laura A. Haviland, and possibly ex-President Smith, of Northwestern College, and the president of Elmhurst Seminary, will be the speakers, and which will be well attended from all parts of the county.

—The first notice of the Kansas State Convention gave a wrong date. It will be read correctly on the 13th page in the Notice column. The Kansas friends are moving with energy. They have already sent Bro. Loggan to the training school, and his work will be enough more effective to warrant the expense.

—President Warrington of the Iowa Association adds to the notice that may be read elsewhere that the convention will assemble at 10 o'clock on the morning of Tuesday, August 25th. To reach West Branch trains leave Burlington at 5:20 A. M. and 2 P. M. The Chicago express passes West Branch at 7 P. M. and a train from the north at 7:30 P. M. It gives us great pleasure to see the name of Lawrie Tatum on the programme, a friend well known and widely esteemed for his philanthropic labors among the Indians. It is expected in addition to the list of names in the programme on page 13, that brethren Robert Loggan of Kansas and C. F. Hawley of Wheaton will be present and speak at this meeting.

—The story of Rev. R. N. Countee's attack in Memphis has been reported in many Northern papers as in Bro. Hinman's Washington letter elsewhere. His own paper, the Living Way, shows the effect upon Bro. Countee's mind in its cautious account of the night visit. But he will maintain his ground supported by other brethren in the city. It is significant, and shows the hand of the lodge, that the reports throw the blame of all the trouble upon Bro. Countee and not upon the actual assailants; and his unpopularity and the probability that he will have to leave his church is but the wish of all the lodges re-echoed. We hope, however, that there remain enough sober minds in his congregation to hold their ground until better counsels prevail.

SAMUEL PLUMB.

BY PRES. C. A. BLANCHARD.

The story of a good man's life is a possession for all ages, for every clime. The weakness of philosophic substitutes for the Christian religion is that they have no illustrations in human character which commend them to the judgment of thoughtful men. The strength of Christianity is the divine in human life which, perfectly exemplified in our Saviour, is also approximated in the persons of his disciples. The common sense of honest men who strnggle often unavailingly against sinfulness within and temptations without, teaches them that there is no hope for man unless God comes down to him; and conversely, that if the Creator be really and truly present he will lift men out of the bogs and miasms of mere humanitarianism to walk the delectable mountains and breathe the airs of heaven.

Another fact that we do well to recall, is that the power of Christ to transform human character suffers no diminution as days go by. We are accustomed to exalt the past and there is no objection to so doing if we do not as a result dwarf unjustly the present. Our cotemporaries are apt to seem to us pigmies, while to those who look back upon them through the long vista of years some of them will appear as they really are, Titans warring, not against heaven, but for it. There are to-day preachers as powerful as Paul; converts as honest in their use of property as Zaccheus; disciples as gentle, as eagle-eyed as John; women as loving as Mary, as helpful as Dorcas, as courageous as Deborah, as pious as the mother of Samuel. Instead of apologizing to ourselves for our halting service, imperfect consecration and multiplied failures with the thought that the golden age of Christianity immediately succeeded the night of heathenism, we ought to pray that our eyes may be opened to see the heroic soldiers of the cross who trample down the world, the flesh, and the devil, here, and now.

These reflections and many others crowd upon me as I attempt to portray the sterling integrity, the lofty patriotism, the tender affection, and the joyous Christianity of

SAMUEL PLUMB.

He was born in Western New York, now a garden spot filled with beautiful homes, large barns, grain fields, orchards, lakes, groves, and thriving cities and towns. Then it was a vast wooded plain, where the early settlers' cabins were surrounded by silent forests, and the rivers heard no sound

"Save their own dashing."

The red men's trails still threaded the hills and valleys. There was not a mile of railroad or telegraph wire in the world. No steamship ploughed the ocean. Men gathered their grain with arm and sickle, ploughed their fields with wooden mold-board plows, made journeys on horseback and depended on neighbors for news.

His father was a man of generous emotions, but poor business faculty. His mother pious, energetic, capable, the thousandth woman whom Solomon songht bnt could not find. The father's trade was shoemaking, and to this occupation Mr. Plumb, while yet a mere boy, was trained and when only fifteen years of age his business mind, inherited from his mother, saw that all his toil at home was simply earning money to put it into "a bag with holes." An amicable arrangement being made with his father, he began life for himself, and on a contract to make sixty pairs of boots for one dollar a pair, he labored so hard as to complete them in thirty-six days, his right side being partially paralyzed as the result of the task.

He turned the money into leather which he made up on his own account. The boots and shoes he traded for dried apples, and the dried apples he peddled from a wagon which he bought. Borne on the crest of the wave of western emigration he went to Ohio while it also was almost unbroken forest. Here he clerked in a store, drove stage, began business for himself, failed in the crash of 1837, and afterward slowly struggled to his feet, accumulated property, paid off his creditors and went on as other honest men did.

A little time before the war he established a bank in Oberlin. Here after the war began he kept the accounts of over two hundred soldiers, whose families he cared for, until the struggle for liberty was ended. During the fifteen years of his banking in Oberlin, he did not lose a dollar by bad loans, avoiding loss because he made investments with care on sound business principles. His rule was never to loan money to a man who ought not to borrow. A single case will illustrate his plan and its working.

A gentleman came into his bank to borrow three thousand dollars, offering as security a mortgage on a lot and a fine brick house.

"What do you want to do with the money?" said Mr. Plumb.

"I want to refurnish my house," was the reply.

"Why," said Mr. Plumb, "Yon ought not to do that. Yonr house is too large for you and your wife anyway. Sell it, bny a smaller place and loan the balance."

The gentleman was quite indignant, said he came after a loan not advice, wanted to know if the security was not sufficient, etc.

"Yes," said Mr. Plumb, "the security is ample but you can't afford to borrow the money and I can't afford to lend it to you because of that fact."

Going away angry the gentleman thought it over, went and did as advised, came and deposited three thousand dollars, and thanked his friend for his counsel.

The career of Mr. Plumb is typical, and clearly illustrates the folly of those who desire to make people rich by law without labor or economy. One of these complainers said to him on the street one day: "What would you say if your child was barefoot and you had not money to buy shoes?"

"I would say it was good for him," said he. I remember well the time when there were eight children in my father's house without shoes, and the struggle we had to get them made us men."

No man can be poorer than he was, yet he earned a livelihood, assisted his relatives, from father and mother to nephews and nieces, gave away nearly or quite a hundred thousand dollars and left an ample fortune for the needs of those who survive him.

His religious history was quite as interesting as the story of his business life. In the days of his boyhood prayer-meetings were held all through the Western Reserve. In those days to mention slavery in a pulpit or church prayer-meeting, was to be reproached as a disturber of the peace. Mr. Plumb's father was a Mason and a Universalist, but a lover of freedom. I have many times heard Mr. Plumb tell how his father received the news of Morgan's murder. A Masonic deacon came into the shop and, disregarding the presence of the little lad who sat over his cobbling, said to the father: "Brother Plnmb, have you heard from Batavia?"

"Yes, I have."

"What do you think of it?"

"I don't like it."

"Well, it is hard; but what else could our men do?"

"I don't like it."

"Well, brother Plumb, if he was revealing and they killed him, divine justice will bear them out in it."

"I don't like it," again replied he, and from that day he abandoned the lodge; shortly after he left the Universalist church.

But even before the murder of Morgan he attended anti-slavery prayer-meetings and in one of these gatherings Samuel Plumb was converted. As was natural he was a life-long enemy to all systems of oppression, and by voice, vote and purse antagonized American slavery until its overthrow. His was the last station before reaching Lake Erie on the underground railway, and he told me that he never knew a ship's captain to refuse a fugitive. Even the most ungodly men would convey them across the lake to the land of liberty. This, while Princeton theologians were assisting in riveting the chains of the slave; were justifying a system which whipped women and sold babies!

Nor did he, as many do, lose the fire of his enthusiasm with the end of that contest. He threw himself as boldly and unreservedly into the war on the lodge and the saloon as he did into that on slavery. His interest in WHEATON COLLEGE arose from the fact that he saw it contending against heavy odds for what he believed to be truth. When the name of President J. Blanchard was dropped from the list of vice presidents of one of our benevolent societies, he wrote to the secretaries to know why this was done, and though deeply interested in that work told them that he would never put another dollar into their hands until that name went back. He said to those soliciting funds for various enterprises: "I think it is my business to help those who struggle for the unpopular truths. There are plenty to help those who preach what nobody objects to."

Along with this utterly immoveable adhesion to the cause of God was a mild aud genial temper, such as is rarely found in man. He was a capital story-teller and knew how to select the story which illustrated his point: he drew the arrow that was fit for the mark. In his home, in the prayer-meeting and on the street, he was the same unpretending, genuine man. He had also that flaming indignation against meanness which is a quality of the finest minds. In a letter written after a most lying and malicions assault on a society in which he was interested he began a letter to the writer thus: "We have met the enemy and they are the d——l's." This to some will seem almost profane, but with him it was a simple statement of the fact in the case and the only one which was at all adequate. But at the same time that he would feel and speak thus respecting wrongs which blinded men did, there was not one of them to whom he would not offer his hand, for whom he would not do any kindly service within his power. I knew him to say to a business man with whom he had at times intimate relations: "Mr. ——, I consider you by all means the worst man in this town. You make young men drunk while you keep your feet. You teach them to gamble while you only play cards; you have ruined a number, and unless you stop you will ruin more."

"Well," said the one addressed, "that is pretty plain talk."

"I mean to make it plain," said he. "You can't afford to meet the record you are making, and I want you to change."

Earth was more desolate and heaven more full of joy and hope when that brave, loving spirit took its flight. What labors he now undertakes, what joys he shares we cannot fully know, but our hearts reach out blindly, longingly for these soul companions, and we are sure that it is well with them and that after a little time we shall with them break bread in the kingdom of heaven and enter on a communion of service and reward that shall never be broken.

Our Illinois militia have just come in from a camping-out. To inspire their souls, weary with the monotonous drill and every-day round of the camp, a sham battle was ordered; and becoming quite too much like a real one, it is a satisfaction that officers and men have had enough of this war mimicry with its bad blood, powder-blasted faces and injured limbs. Next year there will be no powder wasted in such folly. The only earthly use for militia is to suppliment a local police force. A sham battle means war, and who wants a war?

A peddler of Ingersoll's lectures was remanded before the Chicago authorities last week for an attempt to sell a republication of the Pall Mall Gazette's exposures of London's infamy. He was quite disappointed that he could not comfort the vicious and depraved of our city with his pamphlet. On the other hand the Inter-Ocean in a calm, dispassionate appeal to the philanthropic urges a revision of our State laws, making more sure the protection of young girls from the assaults of the villians who haunt their steps. A few days since two men and a married woman were held for trial for abducting a young girl whom they forced to submit to their infamous desires. Last year a society was organized in Chicago for the purpose of bringing such villains to just punishment, but went no fnrther than organization. As with every other reform public indifference is the greatest obstacle, and not until men begin to fear an Emma Bond case at their own doors will they arouse to suppress an evil which shonld have been throttled in its cradle.

In England the agitation goes on and is assuming more of a political character: the radicals urging the proposed revised statute; the Tories indifferent or n opposition. It is said the Pall Mall Gazette withheld the worst part of this chapter of horrors, but submitted it privately to government officials, with the effect of strengthening their courage in favor of the Criminal Amendment bill. A great demonstration is preparing for Saturday, the 22nd, and the following bill has been circulated by the hundred thousand:

"The Hyde Park demonstration for the protection of girls; six reasons why it is wanted: First. To show that the women of London are not indifferent to the horrors perpetrated in their midst, against which every other town in the land has already protested in indignation and with shame. Second. To evoke that 'vigorons, constant, loud and sternly fierce public opinion' without which, as Lord Shaftesbury says, the most stringent law is impotent. Third. To protest against the conspiracy of silence, by which virtue itself is made an unwilling accomplice of vice. Fourth. To demand a vigorous execution of the Criminal law Amendment Act, both on the part of the authorities and the public, without which it is certain to be a dead letter. Fifth. To insist on equal justice between the sexes, and to protest against the doctrine that what is lawful for man is criminal for woman. Sixth. To make use of the present moral crisis in the history of our nation to enlist the hearty support of all good citizens in a campaign against the criminal vice of London and the evils, moral and social, in which it has its roots."

THE HOME.

"HOW CAN THEY BEAR IT UP IN HEAVEN?"

How can they bear it up in heaven,
They who so loved and love us yet,
If they can see us still, and know
The heavy hours that come and go,
The fears that sting, the cares that fret,
The hopes belied, the helps ungiven?

Can they sit watching us all day,
Measure our tears, and count our sighs,
And mark each throb and stab of pain,
The ungranted wish, the longing vain,
And still smile on with happy eyes,
Content on golden harps to play?

Ah, no! we will not so them wrong!
When mothers hear their babies cry
For broken toy or trivial woe,
They smile, for all their love—they know
Laughter shall follow presently,
And sighing turn to merry song.

They are not cruel that they smile;
Their eyes, grown old, can farther see,
Weighing the large thing and the less
With wise, experienced tenderness—
The moment's grief with joy to be
In such a little, little while.

Just so the angels, starry-eyed,
With vision clear and made all-wise,
Look past the storm-rack and the rain
And shifting mists of mortal pain
To where the steadfast sunshine lies,
And everlasting summertide.

They see, beyond the pang, the strife,
(To us how long, to them how brief!)
The compensation and the balm,
The victor's wreath, the conqueror's palm—
They see the healing laid to grief,
They see unfold the perfect life.

For all our blind, impatient pain,
Our desolate and sore estate,
They see the door that open is
Of heaven's abundant treasuries,
The comforts and the cures that wait
The bow of promise in the rain.

And even as they watch, they smile,
With eyes of love, as mothers may,
Nor grieve too much, although we cry,
Because joy comes presently,
And sunshine, and the fair new day,
When we have wept a little while.

SANCTIFICATION.

Jacob and Theodore Schoonerhoven were brothers, and strikingly alike in some things; among which were quick and strong perceptions which gave them a talent for making money; for honest labor makes property, and shrewd perception takes it.

Jacob and Theodore were strikingly unlike in what philosophers call conscientiousness. The face of each projected over the eyes like the cornice of a house. But whether they were alike in the higher organs of the brain, where the conscience is supposed to dwell, I cannot tell. Theodore, who was two years the elder, often said to his brother, "Come on, Jackey, what if mother did forbid it, she will never know it; it is a little thing, and mother is notional." Thus Jacob, by the greater energy of his brother, was often drawn into mischief for which he lay sleepless and weeping at night until his pillow was drenched with tears; and he often slipped from his bed in the earliest morning light to confess faults to his mother, of which she had never heard.

They were educated in the sternest Calvinism. Theodore, who from his peculiar constitution, expected every good thing and every advantage for himself, was rather pleased with the doctrine of election, having a vague, but comforting assurance that he was elected if anybody was. Jacob, however, who was constitutionally generous and unselfish, felt that if anybody was reprobated it was most likely to be himself.

When the brothers were sixteen and eighteen, a fatal epidemic prevailed and many were dying. A general awakening occurred, and religious meetings were held night and day. Theodore was frantic with fear, when his confidence in election was shaken by a doctrinal sermon. He screamed aloud in the congregation, and rent the air with cries for mercy, distressed not so much by reflecting on the particular sins, and on the bearing of such sins on the law and honor of God, and the welfare of men, as by the general idea that he was a sinner and exposed to hell. The struggle was not long. He was soon rejoicing in an assurance of pardon. Whether he was influenced by constitutional peculiarity, or not, it seemed comparatively easy for Theodore to be satisfied that he was pardoned and accepted. Jacob wore a serious countenance, sometimes wept, yet said but little, and attracted little notice. He was, however, pained beyond description by a view of his sins, seen in the light of the divine character and law, as seen in their bearing on human welfare, and most of all, as seen in the light of the divine goodness. When he received the "oil of joy for mourning, he put on "the garment of praise" with great meekness, and quietly adored God, the beauty of whose attributes, character, will, laws, and government, he beheld with new eyes; he heard the voice of God with new ears, and his melting heart received every divine impression. Every one said, "What a remarkable display of divine power in the conversion of Theodore Schoonerhoven. Jacob is rather thoughtful and may become pious, but Theodore is a perfect Gideon; what a gift in prayer and exhortation, and how he shouts!"

Theodore was foremost everywhere, urged on, flattered, praised. Everybody knew him. Jacob labored by precept and example to save men, making no display. Few knew him.

* * * * * * *

Jacob Schoonerhoven was asked to give his views of "Sanctification." The interrogator walked him into the altar, and each seated himself in a chair. It was the interval between services, and they were alone.

"It is forty years," said Mr. S., "since my brother Theodore and myself experienced religion. Soon after our conversion he professed sanctification, and urged me seek for it. I considered the subject. Theodore after being sanctified was more forward, more confident, but no more disinterested. He was greedy of gain, shrewd in speculation; taking advantage of his keen perception to amass wealth; having his constitutional selfishness still strong, still binding his judgment, and causing himself to think he ought to be favored with all good fortune; men ought to work for him cheap; he ought to receive high wages for public service or mechanical labor; what he sells ought to bring a high price; what he buys ought to be got for little. My brother has never scrupled to buy property at low price, which he knew was about to rise in value, and to sell at a high price that which was about to fall. He has not scrupled to buy cheap as possible young animals of great promise, from men who knew not their value, and to shift off young animals of no promise, to men who knew not their worthlessness. All this he said was according to law, upheld by public sentiment, and agreeable to his conscience. I considered the subject of sanctification in the light of loving God with all my heart, and loving my neighbor as myself—not so much a work of the emotions as of the judgment—a work not of one moment, but of a lifetime; agreement, union, harmony with God, self lost in humanity; self lost in God; living for the honor of God and for human welfare, at all times, seven days in the week, three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, in all places, at home or abroad, in the sanctuary, at the mill, or at the market; in all business, laboring, buying, or selling.

I went into the woods and prayed for sanctification, when the Lord said, 'Jacob, dost thou love my will, my law, and my government, with all thy heart?' I said, 'I do Lord;' and the Lord said, 'Dost thou love thy neighbor as thyself?' I answered, 'I do, Lord.' The Lord said, 'Very well, and now Jacob, prove thy word in thy life.'

I went to my house in a happy frame, singing hymns. A week after this I took down a work on military science, and was reading, having a great ambition for martial fame. The Lord said, 'Jacob, remember thy word.' I saw my ambition was self. I dropped the book and never took it up again.

I had made an arrangement to join a lodge of Masons, and was on my way, riding fast, when the Lord said, 'Jacob, remember thy word.' I saw that my desire to be a Mason was self. I turned and rode home.

I had coveted two colts which I knew would become horses of great value. They were rough and lean, and the owner not knowing their value would sell them low. I was on my way to buy them. The Lord said, 'Jacob, remember thy word.' I saw I was not loving my neighbor as myself. I went on and said, 'Peter, keep your colts, they will make the most valuable horses among all I know.' Peter said, 'I did not think them valuable, but I believe you, for you and your brother know more about horses than any men I ever saw. I would give a thousand dollars for your knowledge. But now, Mr. Schoonerhoven, the fact is, I must sell them to save my house and land which are mortgaged.' 'I will lend you the money,' I said, 'to save your house; keep your colts.' He did keep them, and finally sold them for five hundred dollars.

A man came to me to buy some city lots. I was about to take the price which he offered, when the Lord said, 'Jacob, remember thy word.' I said, 'Mr. Broderick, I cannot in conscience sell you those lots; that part of the city must fail in a few years.' It did fail, and I turned those lots into a farm.

Thus my sanctification went on. These lessons were never forgotten; self was banished from my buying and selling; the quick discernment of the value of property, and the foresight of coming changes, which the Creator had given me, I no more used for my own increase and wealth. It was evident to me that no man could gain wealth by speculation, and love his neighbor as himself. I have instructed hundreds of the honest, industrious poor, and kept them from the gins of speculators. My eye was single, my light increased, and my knowledge of right and wrong, justice and humanity; my perception became keen to understand what was consistent with my loving my neighbor as myself, and to understand what it was to do to others as I would be done by.

One morning I was awakened by the voice of the Lord: 'Jacob, arise, and be sanctified. Remember thy word.' I arose, and coming from my lodging room, I met a committee of three, informing me for the part which I took in an anti-slavery meeting, I must recant or come to trial.

I remembered my word, stood my trial and was excluded. To be separated from the church of my early choice tore my heart. The Lord said, 'Jacob, lovest thou me more than these?' I answered 'Yea, Lord, I love thee more than all.' The cause of temperance, long before, cost me a similar trial.

I had from early life set apart all of my income, above the plain support of my family, for charity, and with much prayer sought for the most needy. I had passed a day under the clear impression that a sore trial was coming. At evening I stepped into my barn and cried, 'Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth.' The Lord said, 'Jacob, art thou ready to be sanctified in the loss of all?' I said, 'Yea, Lord, take all thou gavest, and if thou takest all away, blessed be thy name.'

I answered a rap by stepping to the door. Three fugitive slaves, a mother and two daughters were there. The mother mournfully said, 'Will you send us back?' And the Lord said, 'Jacob, wilt thou obey my laws or the laws of man?' I answered, 'I will obey thy laws, Lord.' 'Come in,' I said. I landed them in Canada. I went to jail and lost all—house, land, herd, and flock. I have gathered a little by hard work in old age. This little cottage is mine, with a few acres of land. My God is reconciled. My peace is like a river, and my treasure in heaven."

"I believe, Brother Schoonerhoven, that you do not profess sanctification. I never heard you speak of it." "I never speak of it," said Jacob; "the word has become a term of reproach. Selfish, willful, proud men make high professions of sanctification. My brother, Theodore, is often referred to as a model, sanctified man. He has amassed a fortune of a hundred thousand dollars by speculation. He has always sought popular favor and civil office; has ever remained pro-slavery; opposed to the Maine law, and has gone with the most profane and debauched political party. The judge, by whose decision I was stripped of all my possessions, professed sanctification. I deem it my duty to make no noisy profession. We should, however, be sanctified every day, in all our volition, motives, purposes, and designs; in our affections, in our temper and spirit, and in all our business transactions. All other sanctification is mere emotion, excitement and enthusiasm, and is consistent with selfishness, cruel oppression, and grinding the faces of the poor.—The Signs of the Times.

"I'VE NO PLACE."

"I've no place to pray," said a little girl, in a pitiful voice, one day, as her teacher was talking to her about prayer. She lived in a lodging house, in three little rooms, with her father and mother, and six brothers and sisters. There was little chance for her to get away alone.

But her teacher told her she could sometimes slip away into one of the little bed rooms and shut the door. There she could be alone with God, and the rest of the family wouldn't miss her for a few minutes. Minnie promised to try it.

Almost everbody can find a lone corner for prayer if they want to. I once hear of a man who worked in a large machine shop, who, after eating his lunch at noon, used to go inside an old boiler to pray. One of his companions found it out, and asked if he might come, to. Then others came, and after awhile they had quite a little prayer meeting in the old boiler, and souls were saved there.

I knew a man who lived in a small house, and always went out in the barn to pray. I also knew a young girl who could not get a chance for secret prayer till all the day's work of a large family was done, and then she had to go down into the cellar to be alone. But what sweet seasons of prayer she had down there in the dark.

We read in Acts 10: 9, that Peter, when in Joppa, "went up into the house-top to pray about the sixth hour."

God is everywhere. If we cannot be alone, we can pray to him in our hearts. He can hear even a thought-prayer."—Exchange.

MONKEYS AT BREAKFAST.

An Englishman who lived in India during his early life tells an amusing story of some pranks played by monkeys. They were almost as tame and playful as kittens about his home and there were a great number of them. He says:

I was married in India, and engaged for our home a house fourteen miles or so from any other habitation of white men. On the morning of our arrival my wife went to change her traveling dress, while the servants laid breakfast on the veranda, overlooking the river. At the clatter of the plates there began to come down from the big tree that overshadowed the house, and up the trees that grew in the ravine behind it, from the house roof itself, from everywhere, a multitude of solemn monkeys. They came up singly and in couples and in families, and took their places without noise or fuss on the veranda, and sat there like an audience waiting for an entertainment to commence. And when everything was ready, the breakfast all laid, the monkeys all seated, I went in to call my wife.

"Breakfast is ready, and they are all waiting," said I.

"Who are waiting," she asked in dismay. "I thought we were going to be alone, and I was just coming out in my dressing gown."

"Never mind," I said. "The people about here are not very fashionably dressed themselves. They wear pretty much the same things all the year round."

And so my wife came out. Imagine then her astonishment!

In the middle of the veranda stood our breakfast table; and all the rest of the space, as well as the railings and the steps, were covered with an immense company of monkeys, as grave as possible and as motionless and silent as if they were stuffed. Only their eyes kept blinking, and their little round ears kept twitching. Laughing heartily, at which the monkeys looked all the graver, my wife sat down.

"Will they eat anything?" asked she.

"Try them," I said.

She then picked up a biscuit and threw it among the company.

Three hundred monkeys jumped up in the air as one, and just for one instant there was a riot that defied description. The next instant every monkey was sitting in its place as solemn and serious as if it had never moved. Only their eyes winked and their ears twitched.

My wife threw them another biscuit and again the riot, and then another and another. But, at length we had given away all that we had to give, and got up to go. The monkeys at once rose, every monkey on the veranda, and advancing gravely to the steps walked down them in a solemn procession, old and young together, and dispersed for the day's occupation.—*S. BE THOROUGH.

The Hon. Josiah Quincy was at one time conversing with Daniel Webster upon the importance of doing even the smallest thing thoroughly and well, when the great man related an incident concerning a petty insurance case which was brought to him while a young lawyer in Portsmouth. The fee promised was only $20. Yet, to do his clients full justice Webster found he must journey to Boston and consult the law library. This involved an expense of above the amount of his fee, but after hesitating a little, he decided to go to Boston and consult the authorities, let the cost be what it might. He gained the case.

Years after this Webster was passing through the city of New York. An important insurance case was to be tried that day, and one of the counsel had been suddenly prostrated by illness. Money was no object, and Webster was asked to name his terms and conduct the case.

"It is preposterous," said he, "to expect me to prepare a legal argument at a few hours' notice."

But when they insisted that he should look at the papers he consented. It was his old twenty-dollar case over again, and having a remarkable memory, he had all the authorities in his mind, and won the suit. The court knew he had no time for preparation, and were astonished at the skill with which he handled the case.

"So you see," said Webster, as he concluded, "I was handsomely paid, both in fame and money, for that journey to Boston;" and the moral is that good work is rewarded in the end.—Selected.

TEMPERANCE.

NINE-TENTHS OFF IN KANSAS.

From the Rev. H. W. George, pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Topeka, and chairman of the permanent committee on temperance in the synod of Kansas, comes this report: "That there is less drunkenness in Kansas than in the surrounding States is universally conceded by travelers. If the statistics of the Temperance Union are correct, not one-tenth as much liquor is sold and drank to-day as there was before the adoption of the prohibitory amendment. * * * The county attorney of Saline county was ousted by a jury of the supreme court for neglect of duty. He appealed to the supreme court of the United States, and it affirmed the decision of the State court, and also the constitutionality of the law. Our city has always been the stronghold of 'whisky men.' To-day we have a temperance (prohibition) mayor and a temperance governor. * * * In every sense of the term, public sentiment has increased, and just in proportion to the advance of public opinion has been the work accomplished. The Presbyterians are true blue, old school Calvinist on the temperance question. The Presbyterians of Kansas are natural born prohibitionists. If not, they are soon converted after coming here."—Union Signal.

PROHIBITION IN KANSAS.

Dr. J. E. Westervelt, of Fort Scott, Kan., and a prominent Prohibitionist, is spending the summer at Lake Bluff, being domiciled at the Hotel Irving. Speaking of prohibition in his State, he said: "Prohibition in Kansas is a pronounced success. Of course the law is not everywhere strictly enforced. In Leavenworth, for instance, there is no enforcement of the law, while in Topeka it is observed in the most careless manner possible. Yet in nine out of ten of the towns of the State it is the order of the hour, and the general tendency is toward the universal enforcement of it. The saloons are on the defensive, but if a vote were taken in the State to-day on prohibition I have no doubt that the vote for it would be very much larger than ever before. I think that about one-tenth of the Democrats and about three-fourths of the Republicans of the State are prohibitionists. It is but just to say that the majority of the Kansas prohibitionists are opposed to the formation of a third party in national politics. St. John is still very strong in the State, but he has lost some of his popularity. Nearly all the drug stores evade the law, though they do not sell liquor without a prescription. The physicians give everybody an order who asks for it."

NO COMPROMISE WITH BEER.

In the official Bulletin of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, signed by Philip A. Nolan, General Secretary, the following language occurs:

"We must open our eyes to the magnitude of the work before us, and to the terrible power which the liquor interest have gained in America. The recent Convention in New York City of the United Brewers' Association represented a production of 17,000,000 barrels of beer, and an invested capital of over $100,000,000. No wonder that it commanded a warm address of welcome from the Mayor of New York! It is powerful enough to influence legislation in most of the United States, to control nearly every large city in America, and to prevent representatives in Legislatures from even placing wholesale restrictions around the liquor traffic. The cool assurance of the beer men in their convention that 'beer is a preventive of drunkenness' in the face of the frightful extent of drunkenness now existing after years of beer-drinking, shows the necessity of greater vigilance and exertion on the part of total abstainers, especially in combating and exposing the fallacy that the general use of beer instead of spirituous liquors promotes temperance. This fallacy has deluded thousands of our people, and sent them, ruined in soul and body, into drunkards' graves."

HOW BREWERIES HELP A CITY.

The Milwaukee Sentinel shows how the manufacture of beer has benefited that city as follows:

At least six new school buildings are immediately necessary, but because there are so many saloons the taxpayers must support police and courts and jails and charitable institutions with their money. There are hundreds of children of school age in the city who are denied school privileges because we cannot afford to put up more school buildings.

Referring to the 13,000 saloons it says they render it necessary to sustain a large police force to preserve order in the city. They compel the city and the county to support courts and all the machinery of the law to take care of offenders whose offenses grow out of liquor. They make us support a house of correction for the seclusion of drunkards and criminals who have been developed by the saloons, at an enormous cost. They lay upon the city and county the burden of supporting almshouses, for the care of persons reduced to pauperism by drunkenness; hospitals for the medical treatment of chronic invalids whose disease can be traced to whiskey; insane asylums toward the filling of which intemperance contributes a large share. The taxpayers bear the greater part of these burdens rendered necessary by the saloons.

SALOONKEEPERS ON THE WARPATH.

A case against a liquor house which holds a permit was decided July 26th, by Justice Milligan at Afton, Iowa. The liquor was ordered spilled, and 100 kegs of beer were destroyed to-day. Five saloon men enraged at the defeat went on the warpath, and attacked the prominent prosecuting witness, Dr. Graves, abused another, and called at Prosecuting Attorney Spurrie's to mob him. He was absent, and they called on Henry Bauer, a florist and promiuent prosecuting witness, with a rope. But he was also absent. They left a threateniug word with his wife. Two saloon men were arrested and fined this morning. There is great excitement over the matter, aud further trouble is feared.

By unanimous vote in the lower House, Massachusetts passed the bill for scientific temperance instruction. Ten States have this year passed similar bills that the children in the schools may know that alcohol is a poison. But it is said that the Massachusetts Legislature neglected to fix a penalty, in case the law is not complied with. It is hoped, however, that generally the provisions of the law will be carried out.

Labor has improved 100 per cent in the counties in Georgia where prohibition has been adopted. The business men are fast becoming Prohibitionists, as a matter of business, and now wonder why they could not see before that the money spent in saloons belongs to those doing legitimate business, and giving value received in return for cash. Men are now saving money, and looking forward to the day when they shall own houses and lands for themselves.

LITERATURE.

Did Jesus Rise? By James H. Brookes. Pp. 157. Price, paper, 30 cents; cloth, 60 cents. Charles B. Cox, publisher, St. Louis, Mo.

Like all the excellent works of Dr. Brookes, this is designed to open the Scriptures upon some great principle of Christian history, or faith, or life. The doctrine of the resurrection is fundamental (1 Cor. 15: 13, 14) ,and is, moreover, the ground of most precious Christian hope, through which we may with Paul shout, "O grave, where is thy victory? O death, where is thy sting?" If Jesus did not rise from the grave, the Christian's faith rests upon a fable, and the Christian's hope is a delusion. But on the other hand, if he did really rise, no further argument can be demanded to establish his claim, as the Son of God, upon our confidence and obedience; no other evidence is needed to prove that he is the only Saviour of men. To the consideration of this question, this book is devoted, with the one desire that it may be helpful to souls struggling amid doubts and difficulties, and may be the means of saving some to the praise of our risen and coming Lord. Desponding and doubting Christiaus will do well to read this volume. It will help open their eyes to behold "wondrous things" in the plan of redemption, which to see is to banish fear.

Egypt and Babylon, from Sacred and Profane Sources. By George Rawlinson, author of "The Seven Great Monarchies of the Ancient Eastern World," etc. Large 12mo., pp. 228. Price 60 cents. John B. Alden, publisher, New York.

There can be but one opinion among thoughtful readers of Biblical and political history regarding the practical value of this work of the learned Canon Rawlinson.

This is in some respects one of the most useful of his works, for it cannot fail, as it becomes known, to be a most valuable assistant to every Bible student. The plan of the work is to take up in order every historical notice in the Old Testament, first of Babylon, then of Egypt. Upon every important passage a flood of light is thrown from the records of the earliest historians and geographers, but more especially from the researches of modern explorers in the ruins of Nineveh and the mounds upon the Euphrates plain, which alone betray the vast size and glory of Babylon; or, in the case of Egypt, the records that are frequently discovered in the tombs. From Babylon and Egypt the Masonic lodge traces its traditions and derives its religion. This book will, therefore, indirectly assist the student of Masonic history also.

The August Century is the Midsummer Holiday number and is profusely illustrated, opening with an account of life at "Camp Grindstone," a summer meeting place of the American Canoe Association in the Thousand Islands. "Typical Dogs" and "The Glory of the Year" are other finely illustrated papers. A portrait of William Lloyd Garrison, engraved by T. Johnson from a life-size photograph in the possession of the Garrison family, is the frontispiece of the number; there is also an interesting group portrait of Garrison, Wendell Phillips, and George Thompson. His birthplace and other places of interest are shown in the pictures which accompany the text. His son, Wendell Phillips Garrison, describes the origin of the great anti-slavery advocate, and his son, Francis Jackson Garrison, recounts his boyhood. These papers are introduced by Thomas Wentworth Higginson, who characterizes the agitation which preceded the Civil War, and gives his views of Garrison's personal qualities. Mr. Higginson repeats the popular mistake of describing Garrison dragged through the streets of Boston with a rope. Samuel D. Greene, author of the "Broken Seal," was at Garrison's side during the mob and helped get him away, and is authority for saying that the crowd had a rope but never got it so close to the great Abolitionist as popularly reported. The War Series, besides Mrs. Burton Harrison s recollections of "A Virginia Girl in the First Year of the War," which has a story interest also in its picture of Southern ways, and its amusing anecdotes of civilian life in camp, contains papers by General Fitz John Porter on Malvern Hill—"The Last of the Seven Days' Battles," and another chapter from the "Recollections of a Private;" both being illustrated.

St. Nicholas is always in holiday attire, but the August number is better than usual. The detached illustrations of a drinking lion, puss and her kittens, and children on the beach, are beautiful both in subject and execution; while the papers on Pisa and Rome, the illustrated description of a Texas "norther," E. P. Roe's story, the papers on Beethoven, on "Choosing an Occupation," recollection of the United States Senate, and the Eskimo boys supply an amount of instructive and entertaining reading which it would be hard to find in other publications of like character.

The Churches.

—Bishop Millon Wright attended last week a conferance at Lincolnville, Ind., and on Monday expected to start to the Pacific coast to enter upon the work of his district. His first conference will be the Walla Walla, which meets on the 3d of September.

—Rev. Geo. P. Hays, of Denver, Col., is to spend ten days in Iowa, speaking in the interests of home missions, beginning September 15th. It is expected he will reach six of the principal cities, besides addressing five of the eight presbyteries. He makes his tour by special request, in the interests of the Presbyterian board.

—The college at Mendota, Ill., of the German Lutheran Iowa Synod, has been definitely removed to Waverly, Iowa. In connection with the college will also be a Parochial School Teachers' Seminary. The theological seminary, however, will remain at Mendota.

—It is now six weeks since the revival meetings commenced at Chicago Avenue church, and they are still in progress with a constantly increasing interest. Without excitement or undue demonstration of religious fervor, the meetings have been largely attended, even in the hottest weather. Major Whittle is giving his time and energies to the work.

—Miss Louise S. Baker has been regularly ordained to the ministry of the Congregational church of Nantucket. She is the second woman to be ordained by that denomination, and the first for many years; the only woman preceding her and, until this year, the only woman ordained by any orthodox denomination being the Rev. Antoinette Brown Blackwell, who was ordained something over thirty years ago.

—According to the report of the Connecticut Bible Society there are 16,975 Protestant families in the State not represented in any church or Sunday-school.

—The average Sunday plate collection in the Rev. Newman Hall's church, London, is $175; and in the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's congregation, in the great tabernacle, $345.

—The International Missionary Conference at Niagara Falls, Ontario, beginning July 29 and continuing until Aug. 7, was largely attended by missionaries from all parts of the globe.

—Rev. E. B. Graham, author of "In the Coils," was elected to preside at the late State Prohibition Conference of Nebraska held at Lincoln. The convention was large, harmonious and enthusiastic. Measures were taken to reach the large foreign population of the State and instruct them in the evils of intemperance.

—Now that France has ceased its aggressive war on China, during which the successful Christian work of the Canada Presbyterian mission on the island of Formosa was broken up, the missionaries have returned to their field.

—To Sweden has fallen the honor of printing the first book in the language of the Congo. Its title is Nsamu Wambote a Yoane, and it is a translation of the Gospel of John. It is the work of the Swedish Missionary Vestlind, who has labored for many years in Equatorial Africa, under the Swedish Missionary Society.

—The First Chinese church of San Francisco celebrated the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper on Sabbath evening, the 19th of July. Five were baptized and received into full communion. One of them was a young man who casually heard the Gospel for the first time about six years ago in the streets of Hong Kong. He says he immediately threw away the idols he had worshiped, and the seed of truth seems to have been growing in his heart ever since. The other four were from San Jose, where they had been members of the school which is taught by Mrs. Carey. They had been instructed in the Gospel in Chinese by one of the native assistants of the mission. One of them is a man fifty-two years of age; but his trust in Christ seems to be like that of a little child.

—Arrangements are progressing for the establishment of a new Presbyterian College for colored people in Atlanta, which include the purchase of a site of five acres on the Boulevard, one of the fine avenues of the city.

—Ten converts were immersed in the Harlem River above High Bridge on Sunday by Bishop McNamara, of the Independent Roman Catholic church. The ceremony was under police protection, and was not interfered with by the rowdies who infest that locality.

—It is estimated that within the past twenty-five years over 100,000 copies of the Bible have been circulated in Greece, besides many thousands among Greek residents in Turkey. The government permits the free dissemination of the Scriptures, and affords protection to colporteurs against the opposition of the clerics in the Greek church. The four Gospels are used as a reading book in the high classes of the primary schools throughout Greece.

—Dr. Gideon Draper writes the Christian Advocate that the Lutheran jubilee year has created a fresh religious enthusiasm in Germany. The common people hunger for the bread of life; religious literature commands attention. The "inner mission" has received a new impulse. Evangelists are being raised up for the provinces and the cities. Laymen are educated for this work, not without jealousy on the part of the State church. Bonn, on the Rhine, is a center for this training and effort. A "Johanneum" has been purchased, a house for evangelists and a place of preparation for future activity. The well-known Prof. Christlieb is at its head.

THE UNITED BRETHREN CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

[Correspondence of the Inter Ocean.]

Elwin, Ill., Aug. 14.—A constitutional convention of the ministers and laymen of the United Brethren in Christ was called and convened in the college chapel in Hartsville, Ind., on the 4th to the 6th of August, 1885, to consider the unconstitutional measures adopted by the late general conference of said church, held in Fostoria, Ohio, in May, 1885, in creating an unlawful commission to revise the constitution and confession of faith of the church, and in enacting an unconstitutional law on secret societies. Also to take preparatory steps to oppose and defeat all illegal enactments.

The convention was permanently organized by the election of the Rev. William Dillon, of Auglaize Conference, president, and the Rev. H. J. Becker, of California Conference, secretary. Eighty delegates were enrolled, representing the church from Pennsylvania to California. About twenty-eight to thirty conferences were represented either by delegates or letters addressed to the convention, all of which expressed in the most definite terms the one purpose, viz.: "Non-submission to unconstitutional legislation." Nearly 5,000 indorsements of the protest against the illegal proceedings of the general conference were reported to the convention, more than twice the number of any petition previously presented to this church on any subject. Considering the limited time given to the circulation of the protest, and also the limited notice given of the convention, the attendance, and the magnitude of the protest far exceeded the expectation of the most sanguine "radicals," and indicates the enthusiasm of the membership in behalf of the life-long principles of the church. It was a vain delusion when the "liberals" supposed that the law element would quietly submit to their ruthless attacks upon the fundamental principles of the church. Non-submission was the watchword of the convention from first to last.

A prominent feature in all the proceedings was the avoidance of any steps whatever that might in any way be construed as recognizing the commission or its work. The board of missions under the control of "liberals" had broken faith with the people, in that the said board in May, 1882, made an assessment to the annual conferences to secure $26,000 to liquidate the missionary debt, under a solemn pledge that the money thus secured should be applied directly to that purpose. But to the astonishment and mortification of the church, a large proportion, if not all the money thus secured, was applied to the general missionary work. And now the missionary debt is $31,000 instead of $26,000 as in 1882. The convention definitely decided, and also advised the law element of the church to withhold their means from the general interests of the church. It is claimed, however, that the misapplication of the above named fund was simply a loan from the debt fund to the general fund, and that it will be replaced in due time. But it must be remembered that the assessments for the debt fund were entirely distinct from the assessments and contributions to the general fund, hence if the general fund be inadequate to the demand, whence can the board hope for a surplus from which to refund the debt loan? From this and other transactions of questionable character on the part of "liberal" officials, the convention resolved upon the plan of withholding support from the general interests of the church, especially through the authorized officials. The convention decided to hold another convention at such time and place as may be designated by the Executive Committee, to consist of delegates elected by the annual conferences.

Another potent means for the defense of the constitution and laws of the church is the establishment of a paper to be devoted to that end, and also to general church news and religious literature. The paper is entitled the Christian Conservator. It is destined to be a first-class family paper. The Rev. William Dillon was elected editor and publisher, and the Rev. Halleck Floyd corresponding editor. Publishing headquarters are at Dayton, Ohio. A publishing committee of five was elected, also an executive committee of nine, and a committee of inquiry and co-operation consisting of one member from each annual conference. Thus the constitutional forces of the church stand thoroughly organized. A committee of three was elected to secure, if possible, the highest legal counsel respecting the situation and the best method of maintaining the constitution and distinctive principles of the church against all unconstitutional measures pointing to change. The convention by resolution unanimously declared the law of 1877 on secret societies to be the law now in force.

OBITUARY.

DANIEL CARPENTER was born in Dryden Thompkins county, New York, January 18, 1811; died July 23, 1785, aged 74 years, 6 months and five days.

We have the fact left us that he lived a life devoted to the cause of his Master and died in the glorious hope of eternal life in the kingdom of God when the great Life-Giver shall make up his jewels. We who have learned to love the Savior find it a source of great comfort to know that father was faithful to the end; that he could say, "I have kept the faith; henceforth there is a crown of righteousness laid up for me in that day."

KANSAS STATE MEETING.

The annual State Christian Association for Kansas will convene, D. V., at Willis, Brown county, Kansas, twenty-five miles from Atchison on the Missouri Pacific, in the Wesleyan Methodist church, September 1, 1885. In view of the great work we are engaged in as reformers in defense of truth and against error—the anti-Christ—let every true Christian and lover of truth be present to help and encourage this much needed reform in Kansas.

We expect Rev. J. P. Stoddard, Secretary of the N. C. A.; Pres, C. A. Blanchard, of Wheaton; Rev. J. S. T. Milligan; Rev. B. F. Worrell, and other able speakers to adddress the convention.

Ample provisions will be made for all who attend. We cordially invite the cooperation of all in this effort to bring before the people "wiles" which threaten the peace and well-being of our civil and religious institutions, and to secure under the blessing of God the glorious remedy provided through our Lord Jesus Christ in the Gospel.

The convention will commence at 2 P. M. Tuesday, September 1. Let there be a grand rally! Address letters to Rev. G. H. Heminway, Willis, Kan.

J. A. RICHARDS, Pres.
W. W. MCMILLAN, Sec'y.

COUNTY CONVENTION.

The DuPage County Christian Association opposed to secret societies will meet in the Court House at Wheaton on Tuesday, August 25, at 9 A. M. in convention. The morning session will be devoted to business and brief addresses. At 10:30 Rev. Geo. T. Dissette will give his experience as a renouncing Mason of seven degrees. Laura S. Haviland will speak at 3 P. M. on her experience in emancipating slaves via the "Under Ground R. R.," her life among the soldiers during the war and her personal acquaintance with the Freedmen in Kansas. At 7:30 P. M. Rev. Jos. E. Roy, D. D., Western Secretary of the American Missionary Association, will speak on Secret Societies and the A. M. A. work in the South. Pres. C. A. Blanchard will make the closing address.

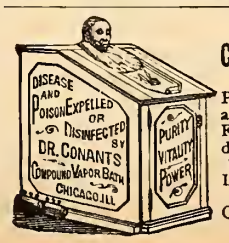
HAVE BEEN SOLD SINCE ISSUED.

We stopped advertising a year ago because our orders were so heavy; we have now increased our facilities for mailing, and all orders will be promptly attended to.

Gaskell's Compendium of Penmanship is not altogether in book form. No one can sit down by himself and learn from a book alone. It requires practice from movable copies. The Compendium consists of four parts—Copy-slips, a small Book of Instructions, Ornamental Sheet, and Envelope or Case, into which these are placed for mailing. Teachers and others are offered liberal inducements to take the agency for it. Thousands of young people have acquired a good handwriting from it, but there are hundreds of thousands who have not as yet seen it, and who would gladly buy it if they thought they, too, could make good writers so easily.

Sent, Postpaid, to any address for $1.



Write for a copy of the PENMAN'S GAZETTE, the finest penman's paper in the world; engraved penmanship from all of the master penmen of the century; portraits and sketches; answers to correspondents, etc. Specimen copy free to those who have not yet seen the paper. The GAZETTE circulates in every city, town, village, and cross-roads in the Union, and is, therefore, a paying advertising medium for all good articles used by writers and students. Address

HOME HINTS.

PLAIN BABY CLOTHES.

Custom is indeed relentless, says Mrs. L. A. France in Good Housekeeping. No less power could enforce a manner of living so little conducive in manner to health, comfort and convenience as that often seen. Women with many cares, young children, slender purses, at best but one servant, often none, yet wishing to be bright, cheerful, and companionable secretly sigh for the time to rest, think, and read in order not to become household drudges. They must save time—it cannot be bought. I wonder to how many weary mothers it has occurred to gain time and means by dressing baby plainly. Baby, with her smiling face, hardly needs the aid of tucks and ruffles to make her attractive. The principal requisite is to keep her warm and clean. Then let there be plenty of soft flannels and little dresses. But why should the former be embroidered and the latter a mass of tucks and lace? It takes six times as long to put six tucks into a little dress as it does to make the plain wide hem and the weary heap of sewing (for the easy-running machine deludes the mother) is made endless. Baby will smile just as sweetly in a plain white dress—cut a dainty Mother Hubbard, if you like—and finished with a bit of lace at neck and sleeves. Every mother knows that the cost of handsome little dresses is no small drain on the family purse, and baby upsets the ink-bottle on her embroideries as calmly as on a plain dress.

Bridget, too, has her trials with the little dresses. In summer the ironing is long and hot, and in winter the drying is vexatious, oftentimes making washing meet washing. Make the dresses perfectly plain and you will realize that a willing kitchen maid is better than ruffles and temper therewith. And why should baby's two-a-day dresses be starched? They look better when fresh, perhaps, but with a young child they will keep spotless hardly fifteen minutes longer, which is a small gain contrasted with the time taken in ironing.

This may seem to be more a comfort for the servant than for the mother, but this is only the outside aspect. With work lighter Bridget's temper is sweeter, the order to watch the baby for a little is less liable to meet with sullen acquiescence, and the child's hour with her is all the merrier. After many hours of patient care and labor how welcome this little rest and change to the mother! Welcome, doubtless, to baby, too, who has felt grieved in her baby fashion with the impatience which will come, but which expresses fatigue rather than the lessening of the mother-love.

A rest in a two-fold way to the mother, an equally clean, perhaps happier baby, a pleasanter servant, and a calmer home. Are not these objects worth the sacrifice? If the mother is willing to bear the extra burden of sewing ungrudgingly for the sake of having her pet "look like other children," she should remember that it is not so well for the child. Nothing can compensate to the little one for the loss of that calm and equable government, which can only come with sound body and unworn nerves.

TIGHT LACING.

The circumference of the waist in a woman of medium height and dimensions measures, on an average, when not cramped and distorted, about thirty inches; but in those who have adopted tight-lacing it may measure no more than twenty inches, and some times even much less. Now what becomes, in those latter cases, of the several organs contained within the chest and abdomen? They are, of course, compressed and pushed and squeezed out of their natural shapes, and caused to protrude in places where they have no business, because never meant to occupy such places. There are few natural diseases, indeed, which so thoroughly displace and jam and wedge together so great a number of the internal organs, and so generally disseminate among them incapacity for the discharge of their multifarious duties, as does this positively sinful practice of tight-lacing. Shortness of breath, congestion, and even inflammation of the lungs, congestion of the livers, kidneys, etc.; palpitation and subsequent diseases of the heart; faintings, bronchitis, indigestion, jaundice, obstruction of the bowels, rupture, prolapsus, etc., are only a few of the many evils arising from the customs which are so emphatically condemning—a list, one would think, quite formidable enough to cause the most thoughtless and the most fashion-be-ridden subject to immediately renounce all allegiance to a practice so fraught with mischief; and one, moreover, which has not a single redeeming point, even in the occasionally foolish eyes of the sterner sex, in its favor.—Good Words.

WEBSTER'S PRACTICAL A NEW DEPARTURE IN DICTIONARIES.

An Industrial Revolution.—In a large Connecticut manufacturing establishment there is in operation a new style of furnace which produces more steam-power from a consumption of 1,000 lbs of coal than can be generated from 20,000 lbs burned in the ordinary way. In other words, the new contrivance already saves nineteen-twentieths of the fuel, and it is believed that before being publicly announced it will be so improved that the saving will reach 49 fiftieths! The facts already developed are simply incredible to one who has not actually seen them verified.

A Remarkable Coincidence.—While the new Furnace was in process of construction, the editors and publishers of Webster's Unabridged were engaged upon their new work which is as great an improvement upon all previous Dictionary productions, and just as valuable in its way as is the incredible fuel economizer above alluded to. Webster's Practical is not only a new compilation by the leading Dictionary House of the world, but it embodies several new features which, for ordinary use, render it pre-eminent among dictionaries—not excepting even the Unabridged.

1st, Condensation—By grouping all derivative and compound words under their root or leader (as in the "Book" example quoted below), such words are adequately treated in one-third of the space required by the old arrangement. By this means nearly all the desirable material of the four and five-dollar dictionaries is presented in a convenient and handy form in Webster's Practical.

2d, Association.—We comprehend as well as remember things chiefly by their associations. For this reason any one who shall carefully read the "Book" paragraph which we reproduce from Webster's Practical Dictionary, will not only comprehend it more readily, but will be able to remember two or three times as much as would be gained by reading about the same words when treated separately as in other works.

3d, Ready Reference.—Not only do we comprehend and remember more readily by the new grouping method, but we do it in less than a fourth of the time required when the words are classified in the old way. Hence, no one who values time would hesitate to pay one dollar for Webster's Practical rather than accept the best of the older dictionaries as a gift.

4th, Derivative Terminations.—Only the larger dictionaries hitherto published give the derivative terminations. The New American Dictionary, for instance, does not give any of the four variations of so common a word as forbear, while they are all given in Webster's Practical.

5th, The Illustrations in Webster's Practical are more numerous and better executed than those of any other abridged or low-priced dictionary.

6th, Prefixes and Suffixes.—Another important feature of Webster's Practical is its peculiar treatment of prefixes and suffixes, which is believed to be more desirable than a separate department of two or three hundred pages which is sometimes allotted to them.

7th, Compendium Matter.—Still another invaluable feature of Webster's Practical is its compendium matter, over one hundred pages of which is devoted to the most complete Pronouncing Vocabulary ever compiled of Biblical, Classical, Mythological, Historical and Geographical Proper names. With Webster's Practical Dictionary at hand, one need not be at a loss to correctly pronounce or spell the most difficult words.

8th, An Invaluable Book.—The importance of supplying every child with Webster's Practical for his very own, is not generally appreciated. As an educator it is worth a hundred times its price, and a little self-denial to provide one or more copies in every family will prove a better economy than an endowment of hoarded bank-stocks later on in life.

The following paragraph is reproduced from Webster's Practical.

Book, bŏŏk, n. A collection of sheets of paper, etc., bound together; a literary composition, written or printed; a subdivision of a literary work. (Mer.) A volume in which accounts are kept. — v. t. [BOOKED (bŏŏkt), BOOKING.] To enter, or register in a book. — Book'ish, a. Given to reading; more acquainted with books than with men. — Book'-bind'er, n. One who binds books. — -bind'ery, n. A place for binding, etc. — -bind'ing, n. Art or practice of, etc. — -case, n. A case with shelves for holding books. (Bind.) A book-cover. — -cov'er, n. (Bind.) A case for a book; a cover of cloth or other material prepared for casing a book. — -keep'er, n. One who keeps accounts. — -keep'ing, n. Art of recording mercantile transactions and keeping accounts. — -learned, -lĕrnd, a. Versed in books; ignorant of life. — -learn'ing, n. Learning acquired by reading, — esp. as opp. to practical knowledge. — -mak'er, n. One who writes and publishes books; a compiler; a sporting man who makes a record of bets. — -mak'ing, n. The practice of, etc.; compilation; systematized betting. — -mark, n. Something placed in a book by which to find a particular place. — -plate, n. A label indicating ownership, place in a library, etc., usually on the inside of the cover of a book. — -post, n. The post-office arrangement by which books are mailed. — -sell'er, n. One who sells books. — -shelf, n. A shelf to hold books. — -shop, -stall, -store, n. A place for selling books. — -stand, n. A stand for selling books in the streets; book-stall; a support to hold books. — -worm, n. A worm or mite that eats holes in books; one excessively addicted to study.

THE QUANTITY TEST.

(The following exhibits are from the texts of the dictionaries named).

Webster's Practical Dictionary, ($1) 600,000 Words and 1,400 Illustrations.
New American Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Popular Dictionary, ($1) 240,000, Words and 116 Illustrations.
National Standard Dictionary, ($1) 210,000 Words and 612 Illustrations.

Quality Test.—Aside from all advantages above alluded to, there is still another and very important feature of the new work to be considered, viz.: its quality as compared with the cheap dictionaries which have had the largest sales, and which have been compiled chiefly from the old editions of Webster on which the copyrights have expired. Hence Webster's Practical contains more matter than any other dollar dictionary. Its quality, to say the least, is the very best, while its arrangement and all other new and desirable features, including first-class illustrations, paper, printing and binding are added without extra charge.

A Subscription Book.—As Webster's Practical is not for sale at book-stores, our readers will be able to procure it only from canvassing agents, unless it be ordered in connection with this journal in accordance with our special offers.

☞We offer the Christian Cynosure for one year and the Dictionary postpaid, both for only $2.00.

A NEW

Anti-masonic Scrap-book.

A neat pamphlet, comprising forty-three tracts against secret orders, published by the NATIONAL CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION. It contains some of the MOST POWERFUL ARGUMENTS put in brief form, written by men of distinguished ability, showing the evil nature and dangerous tendency of secret societies. Those who circulate tracts need the book to make their selections wisely.

Send for a copy to Anti-masonic headquarters, the NATIONAL CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION, 221 W. MADISON ST., CHICAGO. Price, 25 cents.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

BATAVIA CONVENTION PAMPHLET.

A Staggering Blow!

Such was to Freemasonry the great NATIONAL CONVENTION held in BATAVIA, N. Y., September 1882. It gave the world

Thurlow Weed's Great Letter

On the abduction and murder of WILLIAM MORGAN in 1826, which has been the most widely published of any Anti-masonic document. The dedication of a noble granite monument to the memory of Morgan, and the able and eloquent addresses of the Convention make this a most valuable pamphlet.

SEE WHY.

It contains—
1. Portrait of Morgan.
2. Portrait of Thurlow Weed.
3. Fine picture of the Monument.
4. The great letter of Thurlow Weed and his affidavit—almost the last public act of his life.
5. Address by J. E. Roy, D.D.
6. The monument oration by Pres. C. A. Blanchard.
7. Addresses on "Christian Politics" by Pres. J. Blanchard, on the Character of Freemasonry by Prof. E. D. Bailey, on the "Freedmen and Secret Societies" by Rev. H. H. Hinman; and very interesting personal and historical reminiscences.

Ronayne, Past Master of Keystone Lodge, No. 639, Chicago, gives the correct or "standard" work and ritual of Masonry; the proper position of each officer in the lodge room, order of opening and closing the lodge, dress of candidate, ceremony of initiation, the proper manner of giving the signs, grips, etc., are fully illustrated and explained. First three degrees. Paper cover, 35 cents.

The Master's Carpet, or Masonry and Baal Worship Identical, explains the true source and meaning of every ceremony and symbol of the lodge, and proves that Modern Masonry is identical with the "Ancient Mysteries" of Paganism. Bound in fine cloth, 420 pp.....75 cts.

Freemasonry at a Glance illustrates every sign, grip and ceremony of the first three degrees. Paper cover, 32 pages. Single copy, six cents.

Freemasonry Illustrated. A complete exposition of the seven degrees of the Blue Lodge and Chapter. Profusely illustrated. A historical sketch of the institution and a critical analysis of the character of each degree, by Prest. J. Blanchard, of Wheaton College. Monitorial quotations and nearly four hundred notes from standard Masonic authorities confirm the truthfulness of this exposition and show the character of Masonic teaching and doctrine. The accuracy of this exposition legally attested by J. O. Doesburg, Past Master Unity □ No. 191, Holland, Mich., and others. This is the latest, most accurate and complete exposition of Blue Lodge and Chapter Masonry. Over one hundred illustrations—several of them full page—give a pictorial representation of the lodge-room, chapter and principal ceremonies of the degrees, with the dress of candidates, signs, grips, etc. Complete work of 640 pages, in cloth, $1.00 per dozen, $9.00. Paper covers, 75 cents; per dozen, $7.50. First three degrees (376 pages), in cloth, 75 cents; per dozen, $7.50. A full illustrated ritual of the six degrees of the Council and Commandery, comprising the degrees of Royal Master, Select Master, Super-Excellent Master, Knight of the Red Cross, Knight Templar and Knight of Malta. A book of 341 pages. In cloth, $1.00; $8.50 per dozen. Paper covers, 50cts; $4.00 per dozen.

Grand Lodge Masonry. Its relation to civil government and the Christian religion. By Prest. J. Blanchard, at the Monmouth Convention. The un-Christian, anti-republican and despotic character of Freemasonry is proved from the highest Masonic authorities. 5 cents each; per dozen. 50 cents.

Judge Whitney's Defense before the GRAND LODGE OF ILLINOIS. Judge Daniel H. Whitney was Master of the lodge when S. L. Keith, a member of his lodge, murdered Ellen Slade. Judge Whitney, by attempting to bring Keith to justice, brought on himself the vengeance of the lodge, but he boldly replied to the charges against him, and afterwards renounced Masonry. 15 cents each; per dozen. $1.25.

Oaths and Penalties of Freemasonry, as proved in court in the New Berlin Trial. Also the letter of Hon. Richard Rush to the anti-Masonic committee of York County, Pa., May 4th, 1831. The New Berlin trials began in the attempt of Freemasons to prevent public initiations by seceding Masons. These trials were held at New Berlin, Chenango Co., N. Y., April 13 and 14th, 1831, and General Augustus C. Welsh, sheriff of the county, and other adhering Freemasons, swore to the truthful revelation of the oaths and penalties. 10 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

Stearns' Inquiry into the Nature and TENDENCY OF FREEMASONRY. With an Appendix treating on the truth of Morgan's Exposition and containing remarks on various points in the character of Masonry, and a Dialogue on the necessity of exposing the lodge. 338 pages: cloth, 60 cents each per dozen, $5.00. Paper covers, 40 cents each; per dozen, $4.00.

Masonic Oaths Null and Void; or, Freemasonry Self-Convicted. This is a book for the times. The design of the author is to refute the arguments of those who claim that the oaths of Freemasonry are binding upon those who take them. His arguments are conclusive, and the forcible manner in which they are put, being drawn from Scripture, makes them convincing. The minister or lecturer will find in this work a rich fund of arguments. 207 pp., postpaid.....40 cts.

Bernard's Appendix to Light on Masonry. Showing the character of the institution by its terrible oaths and penalties. Paper covers: 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Freemasonry Self-Condemned. By Rev. J. W. Bain. A careful and logical statement of reasons why secret orders should not be fellowshiped by the Christian Church, and by the United Presbyterian church in particular. Paper covers; price, 20 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Masonry a Work of Darkness, adverse to Christianity, and inimical to republican government. By Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong (Presbyterian), a seceding Mason of 21 degrees. This is a very telling work and no honest man who reads it will think of joining the lodge. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

The Mystic Tie, or Freemasonry a LEAGUE WITH THE DEVIL. This is an account of the church trial of Peter Cook and wife, of Elkhart, Indiana, for refusing to support a reverend Freemason; and their very able defense presented by Mrs. Lucia C. Cook, in which she clearly shows that Freemasonry is antagonistic to the Christian religion. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

Sermon on Masonry, by Rev. James Williams, Presiding Elder of Dakota District Northwestern Iowa Conference, M. E. Church—a seceding Master Mason. Published at the special request of nine clergymen of different denominations, and others. 10 cents each; per dozen, 75 cents.

Are Masonic Oaths Binding on the Initiate. By Rev. A. L. Post. Proof of the sinfulness of such oaths and the consequent duty of all who have taken them to openly repudiate them. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Freemasonry Contrary to the Christian Religion. A clear, cutting argument against the lodge, from a Christian standpoint. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Thirteen Reasons why a Christian should not be a Freemason. By Rev. Robert Armstrong. The author states his reasons clearly and carefully, and any one of the thirteen reasons, if properly considered, will keep a Christian out of the lodge. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Oaths and Penalties of the 33 Degrees OF FREEMASONRY. To get these thirty-three degrees or Masonic bondage, the candidate takes half-a-million horrible oaths. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

ON ODDFELLOWSHIP.

Sermon on Odd-fellowship and Other Secret Societies, by Rev. J. Sarver, pastor Evangelical Lutheran church, Leechburg, Pa. This is a very clear argument against secretism of all forms and the duty to disfellowship Odd-fellows, Freemasons, Knights of Pythias and Grangers is clearly shown by their confessed character as found in their own publications. 10 cents each; per dozen. 75 cents.

Odd-fellowship Judged by Its Own Utterances; Its Doctrine and Practice Examined in the Light of God's Word. By Rev. J. H. Brockman. NEWS OF THE WEEK.

COUNTRY.

A dispatch from Saratoga says Col. Fred Grant has accepted the positiou of engineer of a railroad company which is backed by the Baltimore & Ohio and Wisconsin Central for the purpose of making a new entrance into Chieago.

The population of Massaehusetts, based on returns received for the census of 1885, is 1,940,000, a gain of 160,000 since 1880.

The family of Daniel Abagh, Jr., near New Philadelphia, Ohio, were poisoned Wednesday by eating toad-stools. One boy died and four other persons are in a critical condition.

Wednesday morning strikers forcibly shut down the salt block of Carrier, Heath & Co., at Essexville, a mile from Bay City. Sheriff Brennan went to the scene with a posse and a fight ensued, the mob using stones and clubs and the officers revolvers. The Sheriff was shot in the forehead by an unknown man, the ball grazing the brain. Nine of the mob were arrested, two of whom were wounded.

Bridgeport, Pa, a mining village, is afflicted with a dysentary epidemic, thirty cases occurring Tuesday, with five deaths, The town physician is down with the disease. Owing to the slackness of work at the surrounding coke works, and the large number out of employment starvation is another danger which is threatened.

An explosion of gas occurred at the Mocanaqua, Pa., coal mines Tuesday morning, by which a number of miners lost their lives. The engine which supplied the mine with fresh air broke, and the men who went to the assistance of the imprisoned ones made their escape with difficulty, many being overcome with the gas, among whom was the superintendent.

Thursday night a waterspout struck Lone Tree creek, a small tributary entering into White river, nearly north from Chadron, flooding the valley, drowning four men, two children, and a number of horses, besides washing away several hundred yards in length of newly finished railroad grade. The track of the flood was found strewn with dead horses, harness and grading tools, while here and there was found the body of some poor unfortunate grade.

C. P. Judd, appointed by the President to be Special Agent of the Northwestern Labor Bureau for Nevada and the Territories, was placed in jail at Denver, Col., Wednesday, on a charge of horse stealing. Judd admitted his guilt and says he has served terms in the penitentiaries of Kansas and Colorado for a similar offense.

A child, Lillie Schaffer, was stolen in broad daylight, in this city, some eight weeks since. No trace of her has been found. A wealthy citizen, Edward Partridge, has offered a reward of $500, and the Evening Mail, a newspaper, $100 for her recovery. The authorities are charged with gross indifference in the matter.

Miss Adrianna P. Brinckle was relcased Friday from the Pennsylvania Lunatic Asylum at Harrisburg, where she had been confined for twenty-seven years on the charge of "extravagance and eccentricity." She is now sixty years of age.

John Roach's schedule, filed in New York Friday, shows liabilities of $2,222,877.81, while the nominal assests are $5,108,098.87, and the actual assests $4,481,478.23.

A marauding band of twenty Piegan Indians, with seventy-five stolen horses in their possession, were overtaken between Razor and Half-breed creeks, Montana, Thursday, by a party of cattlemen, and during the battle that ensued all of the Indians were killed and the horses recovered.

As Hine and Stewart Pond, brothers, were leading a Holstein bull to their farm near St. Paul, the bull became unmanageable and attacked the men. Both were killed almost instantly. Both were unmarried. The two were sons of the late Elder Pond, ex-Indian Commissioner, one of the oldest aud best-known men in Minnesota.

The Chieago common eouncil reeently passed an ordinance fixing beer brewers' lieeses at the uniform rate of $500 a year, also ordiuances requiring druggists to pay $1 for an anuual license or permit, and to require them to register all sales of alcoholie liquors.

Chieago has again been selected as the place for holding the Illinois State fair, September 14 to 19. All the railway lines give reduced fare.

Early Sunday morning au attempt was made to assassinate the family of Hugh Kinney, residing at Shawnee, Ohio. A handgrenade or bomb was thrown into the sleeping chamber, wreeking the house and seriously wounding Mr. and Mrs. Kinney.

A cyclone in Norwood, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., Aug. 12, destroyed several houses and buildings and the Ogdensburg and Lake Champlain Railroad bridge. It is reported that eight persons were killed and several fatally injured by the cyclone. All the church steeples were blown down and one church was demolished. Hailstones as large as a man's fist completely demolished the growing crops.

An attempt was made to destroy the county property at Columbus, Kans., Wednesday night, by an explosion of dynamite. A quantity of the explosive was dropped through an air-hole in the vault containing the records and discharged. Seven large volumes were ruined and some other books damaged.

PUBLISHER'S DEPARTMENT.

Below will be found a statement of amounts donated since June 1 to the Cynosure Fund. Rev. Mr. Woodsmall has written inquiring if there is any way of supplying the hundred Baptist ministers of Arkansas with the Cynosure. He has lately traveled through the State and finds secret societies a great evil in the churches.

The following letter just received from a Congregational pastor in Georgia shows the good work done by the gift of the Cynosure to him last year:

"RUTLAND, Ga., Aug. 8, 1885.

"DEAR SIR: I am sorry that my subscription to the Christian Cynosure will soon expire. Owing to financial circumstances I cannot pay for the paper. I must acknowledge that the reading of it has done me much good, and I welcomed its weekly visits with much pleasure. The good it has done me can't be told. It caused me to abandon secret organizations. I agree with you as to the harm said organizations have done and are doing. Yours, (Rev.) N. B. JAMES.

Means for carrying on the good work of last year are coming in and will be reported from week to week in the Cynosure.

GASKELL'S WRITING COMPENDIUM.

Good writing is essential to every business man, not infrequently deciding a man's position in life, and in these days there can be but few who have not had the opportunity of learning. Still, there are writers and writers, as there are teachers and teachers. Among the foremost of the latter stands G. A. Gaskell, the publisher of an elegant brochure entitled the PENMAN'S GAZETTE, which contains speeimens of almost every eonceivable style of writing, with a host of specimens and testimonials from those who have adopted Mr. Gaskell's method, and been guided by his Compendium. The result is more than satisfactory, for it is surprising how cramped and ugly hands should have been changed to masterly, flowing signatures, and that, too, without the aid of a master in person. Mr. Gaskell's Compendium contains a most varied collection, suitable for all kinds of people, male and female, in every class of life, and even those who write well would find in it much that is worthy of imitation. One of the Chicago street car companies has begun a much needed reform in the determination to break up the practice of promiscuous smoking in the night cars. A well-known saloon-keeper was forcibly ejected from a car lately for refusing to comply with the company's rule. Who more likely to violate so sensible an order? If a street car line can succeed in this matter much more can our powerful railway lines. Let them begin the good work of purifying travel by banishing the smoking car.

The temperance wave is becoming tidal. It is sweeping round the globe. A great international Congress, to oppose intemperance, will be held at Antwerp, Holland, September 11th and 12th. The mayor of the city will preside and the nations of Europe will probably be represented. It does not appear that America has been invited. We are coming to the prohibitory mark too fast, perhaps for our old county friends. The subjects to be discussed are: 1. The application and results of laws on drunkenness; 2. The effect produced on the ravages of alcohol by a policy of taxation; 3. The influence of temperance societies on the consumption of alcohol, on criminality, and on mortality; 4. The results of the coffee-house movement in England, and lastly, the results produced by homes for inebriates.

New Hampshire has now a law which would be a blessing if everywhere adopted and enforced. It is for the prohibition of impure and corrupting literature (not drinks), and provides for the fining or imprisonment or both of any person who shall knowingly print, publish, show, or in any way dispose to any other person any book, newspaper, or other printed matter devoted to the publication or illustration of stories of bloodshed, lust, or crime, or principally made up of police reports and criminal news; or circulate, display, or post anything advertising such publications; or give any information where any such literature can be found. The employing or permitting children of minor age to engage in this business is also to be punished. Such a law will interfere with many publishing houses and news companies, but it is a blessed prohibition.

The Pittsburg Commercial-Gazette of the 30th ult., a few days before the Memphis colored Ku-Klux raid, says with great force and truth: "Colored secret societies in the South are determined that their secrets shall not be divulged even if they have to Morganize the preacher. There is great folly in making death the penalty of divulging the secrets of any association. If it be enforced the executioner would be guilty of murder, as no man can alienate his life under any civilized form of government. There is no more right to take a man's life for violating such an obligation than if he should foolishly pledge his life for the payment of a debt and fail to pay it." Every rational mind sympathizes with Shakespeare in making the character of a Shylock hideous. And had Shakespeare written on Masonic oaths their horrible nature would have been instantly revealed as by Ithuriel's spear.

A Washington correspondent has learned that the Government Bureau of Printing and Engraving, formerly in the charge of Hon. Edward McPherson, long clerk of the House, has fallen into the hands of a Jesuitical ring. This establishment, where all the greenbacks and revenue stamps are executed, has for some time been filling up with Romanists, through the artful manipulations of Catholics in power. Protestants have been removed to make room for the subjects of the priest, and this institution is likely to become so Catholicized as to shut out any other influence. The District Fire Department is said to be in the same case. This information will startle and arouse many readers, and it is well it should; but suppose the same information was sent of the lodge management, how that not only single establishments but whole departments and the government itself were in danger of falling into the hands of an alien order!

An open ground south of the Chicago Exposition building has been used every Sabbath while weather permitted for communistic speeches. Upon the crowd of sympathizers and loungers has been poured out week after week the most obnoxious theories of the International. One of the speakers the other day said the crowd ought to seize and divide the grain in the Chicago elevators and the clothing in wholesale stores so that every tramp might eat his fill and go about for a day or two well dressed. Universal ownership was the doctrine. "This watch," he continued, drawing out an elegant gold time-piece, "belongs as much to any one of you as to me." "Hand it over, then," called out a voice. "No, sir," was replied, "that watch cost me hard-earned money. You hod carriers don't get anything like it." Such is all the consolation the dupes of these anarchists will ever get from them or their theories. At another of these meetings a plucky, level-headed Irishman said there was no cause for all the trouble between capital and labor, and that a man could live on a dollar a day if he did not spend his money for beer and whiskey. He was jeered and knocked down several times and finally had to be rescued from these champions of equality and free speech by the police.

The inconsiderate and almost universal eulogy of General Grant as a Christian man is thus rebuked justly and forcibly in an editorial note in the last Independent:

Dr. Newman, in his funeral address on General Grant, delivered at Mt. McGregor, says that, after the General had recovered from his seemingly fatal collapse in April last, he asked him the following question: "What was the supreme thought in your mind when eternity seemed so near?" The answer, as stated by Dr. Newman, was in these words: "The comfort of the consciousness that I had tried to live a good and honorable life." How much General Grant meant by this answer, supposing it to be reported precisely as given, we do not know, and shall not assume that he intended to set up for himself a scheme of self-righteousness, and make that the basis of his comfort and hope for the future world. Such an assumption would not correspond with the antecedents of his religious education, or with several other expressions which are reported as having fallen from his lips. The honest effort "to live a good and honorable life" may well be a source of comfort at any time, and especially so in the hour and article of death; and we see no impropriety in referring to it as such. But it would be a great mistake to make such an effort, or such a life, even though the best that any man lived, the basis on which sinners are to rest for their peace with God and their hope of salvation. Sinners are saved, if at all, through grace, and by the suffering and death of Christ, and upon the condition of their repentance toward God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. This is the Gospel plan of salvation as Christ himself taught it and the apostles preached it. There is no other plan known to the Bible. Great men and small men, viewed simply as men, as subjects of the moral government of God, and as sinners, stand at a common level in respect to their wants and the method of their relief; and they must alike build their hopes on Christ and his work, accepting him by faith, or they will build in vain. "A good and honorable life" is no substitute for Christ, and does not dispense with the necessity of looking to him for salvation. The illustrious soldier, whom the whole country delights to honor, and has just buried in sorrow, met his God, not as General Grant, but as a man and a sinner, and like any other man, needing the salvation of Christ as his only ground of hope. Let not our great men, whether great in war or peace, forget their wants as men and sinners.

LIMITATIONS OF CONGREGATIONAL FELLOWSHIP.

BY REV. HENRY AVERY.

[The pastor of an old and influential congregational church replies to an editorial in the Advance reading out of denominational fellowship churches which forbid the lodge.—ED.]

The position seems to be assumed that no Christian must be refused and that no test which is not found in Scripture should be applied. Let us see. There are many, who in the judgment of charity are Christians, who use intoxicating liquors as a beverage, and advocate the right to do so. Very few of our churches would admit such an advocate of evil, especially in these times of open warfare in several of the States, yet we have no specific command; we use ordinary precaution.

Thirty years ago many churches and ministers were in sympathy with the great sin of slavery. These church members and ministers were earnest Christians, but they were in serious error, and advocated pernicious principles, therefore many anti-slavery churches adopted a rule against admitting such to membership. Some put an anti-slavery plank into their confession of faith, yet they had only general principles of Scripture and common-sense for this course, and now they are regarded as pioneers in the great reform.

There may be many earnest Christians among the Universalists, and some among the Roman Catholics, but these would not be received into our evangelical churches. In all these cases we take the principles of Scripture and use the sense God has given us in their application.

In like manner some Congregational churches believe that organized secrecy is "wrong in principle and corrupting in practice," and they do not admit the members of such orders. Their right to take this position cannot be denied and why should they be threatened with disfellowship for this, more than for their position respecting the other evils mentioned above?

It is idle to argue that we know nothing of these secret societies and therefore have no right to oppose them. Their evil influence and blighting effects are seen and felt. They all have the essential characteristics of a "ring," which of itself is enough to condemn them, especially in the eyes of Congregationalists. Freemasonry is the prolific mother of most of the other secret orders, and this is the one we propose to examine that we may know whether we ought to oppose it. Besides the practical results of the order there are two ways by which we may judge it: First, by what its leading authors tell us; and, second, by what seceding Masons tell us.

1. Mackey says (Lexicon, Art. Religion): "The religion of Masonry is pure theism." Also, (p. 369,) "Masonry is a religious institution." Again, (Juris. p. 33,) "I say advisedly a book of the law, because it is not absolutely required that everywhere the Old and New Testament shall be used. In Mohammedan countries the Koran might be substituted." Sickels says, (Mon. p. 97,) "We now behold man complete in morality and intelligence, with the stay of religion added to ensure him of the protection of the Deity, and guard him against ever going astray. These three degrees thus form a perfect and harmonious whole, nor can we conceive that anything can be suggested more, which the soul of man requires."

2. Benard and Finney, seceding Masons and faithful, conscientious men of God, have endorsed Morgan's revelation of the first three degrees, and have pointed out the glaring inconsistencies between Freemasonry and Christianity. Freemasonry has its creed, ritual, Scripture readings, prayers, hymns, burial service and mode of regeneration. Surely it is a religion; but it is a false religion, since it proposes to save men by obligations to a ritual and a foolish drama and not through Christ. Hear Chase: (Digest p. 208.) "Masonry has nothing whatever to do with the Bible. It is not founded on the Bible. If it was it would not be Masonry, it would be something else." It has again and again been decided that it is "unmasonic" to use the name of Christ in prayer in the lodge, and the Scripture readings are carefully garbled lest any Jew or infidel should be offended.

We thus see that Freemasonry is a false religion, and so it must be dangerous to the church. We will now show that it is dangerous to the State.

1. It sets up a government with pretended jurisdiction over the lives of men, binding its members to obedience by the death penalty.

2. It encourages crime. What must be thought of an obligation like this: "That I will keep the secrets of a worthy brother Master Mason as inviolable as my own, when communicated to me and received by me as such, murder and treason excepted, and them only at my own option." Who have such wonderful secrets to keep? Who but criminals? But, as if to place the matter beyond controversy, murder and treason are here excepted, but when the candidate has progressed till he is entering the portals of the Royal Arch Degree, it is "murder and treason not excepted;" or, as it is sometimes worded, "without exception." What must be the verdict of an honest mind on this: "Furthermore do I promise and swear, that I will aid and assist a companion Royal Arch Mason, when engaged in any difficulty, and espouse his cause so far as to extricate him from the same if in my power, whether he be right or wrong"? Here we reach the "true inwardness" of the institution—crime concealed and the criminal aided to escape. Is it not inimical to the state.

But are these obligations ever obeyed? Ask scores of witnesses who lived in New York fifty years ago. Hundreds have testified that justice could not be administered. There was proof enough that Morgan was abducted, but courts, sheriffs, juries, newspapers all were under bondage to the overawing order. Inquire how these obligations worked some twenty-four years ago, in the case of S. L. Keith, of Belvidere, Ill. Seduction, procuring abortion resulting in the death of his victim,—these crimes were well-known, proof was abundant, but no indictment was found. Why? Several Masons were on the Grand Jury. Judge D. H. Whitney was a brother Mason, but proposed to observe his judicial oath. He earnestly endeavored to bring the criminal to justice, and spoke with just severity against certain Masons who would not assist him, but did assist the criminal. For these Masonic offenses (endeavoring to bring a criminal to trial, and characterizing the conduct of those who defrauded justice) he was called to account by the Grand Lodge of Illinois. He finally renounced Masonry, giving twenty-two reasons, some of which were "that no Mason has a right to expose a brother Mason's crime, and that a Masonic lodge has the power of life and death over its members."

But these are only samples of what has repeatedly transpired on a smaller scale in different parts of our land. Justice turned aside, criminals screened, crime concealed, law over-ridden! Is not this order inimical to the state?

Admit what has been said and every honest mind can see that the adhering Mason is unfitted for acting as judge, juror, sheriff, or witness, in any case where the issue is between a Mason and a freeman.

Still further, Freemasonry is a foe to the family relation. It attempts to establish a closer relation than marriage. A criminal's secrets are to be scrupulously kept from the wife. Many hours each week are to be spent with a mixed throng among whom sometimes are found acknowledged libertines and adulterers, and the husband is under obligation to "meet on the level and part on the square" with these. Are these the obligations that cement two hearts at home till they shall beat as one?

Then Masonry is an order that has crept into the churches, especially into the metropolitan churches, and to some extent controls and restricts them. When we examine it we find it an enemy to the church, the state and the family, the three organizations of God. Can it be a question whether the churches should actively oppose it?

In former years church associations spoke freely against this enemy. I have a copy of the repeated action of the Illinois State Association. I helped to pass a strong resolution in the Ohio Conference. The Association of Iowa has also been heard. But since the war, Intemperance, Freemasonry and Speculation have been three demons loosed for a little time.

It is willingly conceded that some of the secret orders have not all these objectionable features, yet they are founded on the wrong principle, and are stepping-stones to Masonry. Even the church needs the scrutiny of public observance, or it will become corrupt. Secrecy is the great element of power and corruption in the Church of Rome. The history of the order of Jesuits is a standing argument against secrecy.

But why not let it alone until it dies? Because by that policy the church will die first. In this world the tares grow by being let alone, the good seed is choked. Inaction is the bane of the church. The slave power asked only to be let alone. Intemperance, licentiousness and corruption in office ask the same. Somewhere I have read the following words. May they be heeded by the Advance: "Cry aloud, spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, and show my people their transgressions and the house of Jacob their sins."

College Springs, Iowa.

THE STRENGTH OF THE MODERN GOLIATH.

BY REV. H. H. HINMAN.

Is Masonry stronger than the government? It would seem so and that the claim put forth for it in 1825 is equally true to-day. We, too, may say, "It is powerful. It comprises men of wealth, rank, office, and talent, in power and out of power, and that in almost every place where power is of any importance." Changes of administration, however desirable, do not affect it. In certain respects the laws may be better enforced, but when the interests of the fraternity are concerned there is reason to think they are paramount. Some of the gross scandals of this city and District, which were rampant during the last two or three years, have been scared into obscurity by the change of administration. In others the change of rulers makes no change in the tolerance of evil. Of the enormous frauds of Captain Howgate the people of this city and of the country generally are familiar. There has probably never been a time since his first arrest when he might not have been duly tried and punished had there been any disposition to enforce the law. It was well known that he was in the District or near at hand, and he gave himself no trouble about the matter. It was thought that a change of administration might make his stay here unpleasant, and it is said he moved to East Tennessee, His fears, if he had any, were groundless. The higher law of Masonic fellowship protects him equally under Republican and Democratic administration. So, too, with the houses of prostitution in this city. There is thrown over them a veil of secrecy and official protection that nothing but the peculiar institution could secure. Investigation goes on where it can be used for party capital, but punishment is not inflicted.

The following gives a little inside view into some of the many forms of peculation and vice that are prevalent here:

Judge Chenoweth says the committee from the Treasury have got well along with their investigation of the coast survey office, and will probably have their report made out in three or four days.

It is alleged that an officer of the bureau who was dispatched some time ago with some $4,000 to do some work on the Atlantic coast, instead of having the work done, disappeared for some months and spent the money in a drunken spree. It is alleged that he sent in a false report and false pay-rolls, and that he was thereafter charged with forgery, embezzlement, drunkenness and theft; that the discovery of the embezzlement made restitution necessary, and to facilitate restitution the embezzler had his salary increased, and that he is still in the service of the bureau, enjoying a larger salary on account of his drunken spree.

It is alleged that Mr Sagemulier, one of the officials recently removed as chief of the instrument division, had the ordering of the instruments used in the service practically under his control, and that Fauth & Co., a firm of instrument makers of which he was a member, made very large profits out of government orders.

It is alleged that gold chronometers purchased years ago for scientific use in the survey field, at a cost of from $100 to $300 a piece, have fallen into disuse of late in the bureau and have been appropriated to the private and personal service of some of the officials.

Calling attention to such practices may be better than silence, but what the people need is a government that shall impartially enforce the law. Such cyclones of slander as have recently come upon London and before which some of the so-called great have fallen, may be deplorable in their immediate results, but it is hoped they have a purer atmosphere in their wake. It is to be hoped that the breath of heaven may sweep through this city. Nor is the hope altogether vain. The good work at the Central Mission goes on. Souls are being converted: average Christians, who under ordinary circumstances turn away their ear from hearing anything in reference to the anti-secrecy reform, become calmer and more candid when their hearts are softened by Christian love. When men see their need of a higher, holier life they correspondingly loose faith in human substitutes, and in selfish brotherhoods. We count a decided gain to the anti-secrecy sentiment as a result of the mission work in this city.

CHRISTIAN WARFARE.

Soldier, go—but not to claim
Mouldering spoils of earth-born treasure;
Not to build a vaunting name,
Not to dwell in tents of pleasure;
Dream not that the way is smoothe,
Hope not that the thorns are roses,
Turn no wistful eye of youth,
Where the sunny beam reposes;
Thou hast sterner work to do.
Hosts to cut thy passage through;
Close behind thee gulfs are burning,—
Forward! there is no returning.

Soldier, rest—but not for thee
Spreads the world her downy pillow;
On the rock thy couch must be,
While around thee chafes the billow;
Thine must be a watchful sleep,
Wearier than another's waking;
Such a charge as thou dost keep,
Brooks no moment of forsaking.
Sleep as on the battle-field,
Girded—grasping sword and shield;
Foes thou canst not name or number,
Steel upon thy broken slumber.

Soldier, rise—the war is done:
Lo! the hosts of hell are flying;
'Twas thy Lord the battle won;
Jesus vanquished them by dying.
Pass the stream—before thee lies
All the conquered land of glory;
Hark! what songs of rapture rise!
These proclaim the victor's story.
Soldier, lay the weapons down,
Quit the sword and take the crown;
Triumph! all thy foes are banished,
Death is slain and earth has vanished.

THE STORM OF 1826.

The celebrated speech of Rob. Morris before the Grand Lodge of Iowa, in which he declared the decadence of Masonry under the Morgan discussion, is printed in the report of the proceedings of that body in 1858. We quote the title and an interesting passage below:

"AN ORATION

delivered before the Most Worshipful Grand □ of Iowa, June 3, 1858.

By Right Worshipful Brother Rob. Morris, Deputy Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Kentucky."

"It is a sad episode in human history—the period commencing in 1826—which witnessed the contest between Masonry and Anti-masonry. . . . It is God's truth that the Masonic generation of 1826, violated every principle of honor and rectitude; changed the truth of their sacred profession into a lie; committed treason against the purest of causes, deserted the ranks in which a Washington and a Franklin had died; in which a Clinton and a Livingston were yet striving; joined hands with such traitors as ——— and —— and ——, and for the sake of temporary quiet, or the base rewards of partisanship, repudiated the most solemn vows humanity ever assumed! It was a moral epidemic! Fifteen hundred lodges went down in the strife! The ranks of the craftsmen were reduced in numbers from rising fifty thousand to less than five thousand. The songs of the temple builders ceased. Grass grew in the quarries. No longer was the stone-cutter required to draw the mystic characters of Masonry upon the headstones. . . . . The sword of the Masonic crusader, two-edged and cross-hilted, was returned to its sheath. Mount Moriah became a desert to Masonic enterprise. A pseudo-Masonic affiliation sprung up, wearing borrowed plumes and noisy with false professions, which led captive many silly men under the pretense of an expurgated Freemasonry. Upon these walls erected with 'untempered mortar,' now a hideous waste of ruins, through which the jackal and hyena of Anti-masonry prowled and laughed, the eye of woman looked aghast."

CHINESE MASONRY.

THE SECRET TRIBUNALS OF CHINESE LODGERY.

[From the report of the Special Committee of the Supervisors, printed by the San Francisco Daily Report.]

This brings before your committee the subject of "unpunished crime" in Chinatown, upon which it is proper that such facts as have come to our knowledge should be laid before you.

Not only does the cunning and utter unscrupulousness of Chinamen enable them to evade our laws, but the evidence is conclusive that they have well organized tribunals of their own which punish offenders against themselves when it is their interest to punish, but which never punish those who violate the laws of the city or the State.

It has been said of them, with great force and truth, that they "are not only not amenable to law, but they are governed by secret tribunals unrecognized and unauthorized by law. The records of these tribunals have been discovered, and are found to be antagonistic to our legal system."

IMPERIUM IN IMPERIO.

"These tribunals are formed by the several Chinese companies or guilds, and are recognized as legitimate authorities by the Chinese population. They levy taxes, command masses of men, intimidate interpreters and witnesses, enforce perjury, regulate trade, punish the refractory, remove witnesses beyond the reach of our courts, control liberty of action, and prevent the return of Chinese to their home in China without their consent. In short, they exercise a despotic sway over one seventh of the population of the State of California.

"They invoke the process of law only to punish the independent action of their subjects, and it is claimed that they exercise the death penalty upon those who refuse obedience to their decrees.

"We are disposed to acquit these companies and secret tribunals of the charge of deliberate intent to supersede the authority of the State. The system is inherent and part of the fibre of the Chinese mind, and exists because the Chinese are thoroughly and permanently alien to us in language and interests. It is nevertheless a fact that these companies or tribunals do nullify and supersede the State and national authorities. And the fact remains that they constitute a foreign government within the boundaries of the Republic."

SOME STRIKING ILLUSTRATIONS.

Such were the conclusions arrived at by the Legislative Committee in 1876. And they fairly justified their conclusions by the proofs which they elicited in the course of their investigations. We cannot better illustrate this than to quote from them at length. They say:

"That we have not overstated the facts, we beg to refer briefly to some of the testimony of reputable witnesses, given under the sanction of an oath, before this committee.

"James R. Rogers, a San Francisco officer, of intelligence and experience, testifies as follows (see volume of testimony herewith transmitted, p. 61):

A. "I do not know of my own knowledge that such a tribunal exists (secret Chinese tribunal). I only know that when a Chinaman swears differently from what they want him to his life is in danger. They sometimes use our courts to enforce their orders, just as policy may direct. They have no regard for our laws, and obey them, so far as they do, only through fear.

A DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S EXPERIENCE.

D. J. Murphy, District Attorney of the City and County of San Francisco, and one of the ablest and most experienced criminal lawyers in the State, testifies as follows (evidence, pp. 82 and 83):

Q. "In your official capacity have you been brought into contact with Chinese?"

A. "Yes, sir; I have looked on my docket for two years, and I find that of 700 cases that I examined before the Grand Jury 120 were Chinese, principally burglaries, grand larcenies and murders—chiefly burglary. They are very adroit and expert thieves. I have not had time to examine for the last two and a half years, but the proportion has largely increased during that time."

Q. "Do you find any difficulty in the administration of justice where they are concerned?"

A. "Yes, sir. In capital cases, particularly, we are met with perjury. I have no doubt but that they act under the direction of superiors, and swear as ordered. In many cases witnesses are spirited away, or alibis are proven. They can produce so many witnesses as to create a doubt in the minds of jurymen, and thus escape justice. In cases where I have four or five witnesses for the prosecution they will bring in ten or fifteen on the part of the defense. They seem to think that numbers must succeed, and it very frequently so happens. It frequently occurs that before the Grand Jury, or on preliminary examination, witnesses swear so as to convict, but on the trial they turn square around and swear the other way. I have heard it said that they have secret tribunals where they settle all these things, but I know nothing of that. It is my impression that something of the kind exists, and I think they sometimes use our courts to enforce their decrees. I have had to appeal to Executive clemency for pardon for Chinamen sent to the State Prison by false swearing, under circumstances which led me to believe them to have been the victims of some organization of that kind."

INNOCENT MEN CONVICTED.

Q. "Innocent men can be convicted?"

A. "Yes; and I have no doubt that innocent men are convicted through the medium of perjury and 'jobs' fixed up on them. I have had doubts, during the last three months, in cases of magnitude, involving long terms of imprisonment."

Q. "Among reputable lawyers of this city, who have had experience with Chinese testimony in the courts, what value has that testimony, standing by itself?"

A. "By itself, and without being corroborated by intrinsic facts or white testimony, it is very unreliable."

Mr. Ellis, Chief of Police of the City of San Francisco, and who has been attached to the police force of that city for twenty years, testifies as follows (evidence, p. 112): "That it is generally believed that the Chinese have a court where differences are settled; and that, if, in secret, it determines to convict or acquit a Chinaman (on trial before our courts) that judgment is carried out. In a great many cases I believe they have convicted innocent men upon perjured evidence."

WHOLESALE PERJURY.

Mr. Charles T. Jones, who for several years past has been the able and efficient District Attorney of Sacramento county (the county in which is located our State Capitol), testifies as follows (evidence, pp. 124 and 125):

A. "During my term of office I have had considerable to do with Chinese criminals, and always have great difficulty in convicting them of any crime. I remember well the case of Ah Quong, spoken of a few minutes ago by Ah Dan. At the time I was defending three parties charged with kidnapping, and I had Ah Quong as interpreter, knowing him to be honest and capable. The circumstances of the case were these: A Chinaman wanted to marry a woman then in a house of prostitution. She desired to marry him, and he went with two of his friends to the house. She went with them. They drove out of town to get married, when the Chinaman who owned her heard of it and started some officers after her. She was arrested and surrendered to these Chinamen, with instructions to bring her into court next day. I had this man to interpret for me, being well satisfied that she would swear that she was not being kidnapped. The next day the owners brought into court a woman whom the defendants informed me was not the one at all, but another. The attorneys for the other side insisted that it was, believing the statements of their Chinamen to that effect. The case was postponed for two or three days, when it was shown that the woman offered was not the one taken away.

AN INTERPRETER MURDERED.

"This interpreter told me that they would kill him as sure as these defendents were not convicted. We went out of the court room, and he told me he was afraid to go on I street. I told him not to go then, but I did not think they would trouble him. Half an hour afterwards he was brought back, shot in the back, and a hatchet having been used on him, mutilating him terribly. This was in broad daylight, about 11 o'clock in the morning, on Third and I streets, one of the most public places in the city of Sacramento. There were hundreds of Chinese around there at the time, but it was difficult, in the prosecution of the case, to get any Chinese testimony at all. It happened that there were a few white men passing at the time, and we were enabled to identify two men, and they were convicted and sent to the State Prison for life, after three trials. They attempted to prove an alibi, and after swearing a large lot of Chinamen they said they had twenty more. The Chinese use the courts to gain possession of women. Sometimes it happens that where a man is married to a woman they get out a warrant for his arrest, and before he can get bail they have stolen the woman and carried her off to some distant place. I have had Chinamen come to me to find out how many witnesses I had in cases. If they found out they would get sufficient testimony to override me. Before I was District Attorney I have had Chinese come to me to defend them, and ask me how many witnesses I wanted, and what was necessary to prove in order to acquit."

Q. "Do you often find that upon preliminary examinations and before the Grand Jury there is enough testimony to warrant conviction, but on the trial these same witnesses swear to an exactly opposite state of facts?"

A. "Very frequently."

Q. "To what do you attribute that?"

REWARDS FOR ASSASSINATION.

A. "I attribute that to the fact that they had tried the case in Chinese courts, where it had been finally settled. I have records in my office of a Chinese tribunal of that kind, where they tried offenders according to their own rules, meted out what punishment they thought proper, etc. These records were captured in a room on I street, between Fourth and Fifth. I had them translated by an interpreter from San Francisco, and used them on the trial of the robbery cases. The records recite that the members enter into a solemn compact not to enter into a copartnership with a foreigner; that a certain man did so, and the company offers so many round dollars to the man who will kill him. They promise to furnish a man to assist the murderer, and they promise, if he is arrested, they will employ able counsel to defend him. If convicted, he should receive, I think, three dollars for every day he would be confined, and, in case he died, certain money would be sent to his relatives. These records appeared in evidence and were admitted; also a poster that was taken from a house, offering a reward for the killing of this man. This poster was placed on a house in a public street. Being written in Chinese, of course they alone knew its contents and informed us of them."

Mat. Karcher, for many years past Chief of Police for the city of Sacramento, testifies as follows (evidence, pp. 128 and 129):

Q. "Do you know anything about their putting up offers of rewards upon walls and street corners, written in Chinese, for the murder or assassination of given Chinamen?"

ANOTHER CASE IN POINT.

A. "Yes. Of course I could not read Chinese, but I secured some of these posters and had an interpreter from San Francisco come up here and interpret them. They were rewards for the murder of some Chinaman who did something contrary to their laws. They have their own tribunals, where they try Chinamen, and their own laws to govern them. In this way the administration of justice is often defeated entirely, or, at least, to a very great extent. I know this, because I was present at a meeting of one of their tribunals about seven years ago. There were some thirty or forty Chinamen there, one appearing to act as judge. Finally the fellow on trial was convicted, and had to pay so much money as a fine for the commision of the offense with which he was charged. Generally their punishments are in the nature of fines, but sometimes they sentence the defendant to death. In cases in the police court we have often found it difficult to make interpreters act. They would tell us that they would be killed if they spoke the truth; that their tribunals would sentence them to death and pay assassins to dispatch them. About two years and a half or three years ago Ah Quong was killed. During the trial, at which he was interpreter, there was a great many Chinamen. I stationed officers at the doors, and then caused each one to be searched as he came out of the room, the interpreter having told me that he feared they would murder him. Upon those Chinamen I found all sorts of weapons—hatchets, pistols, bowie-knives, Chinese swords, and many others. There were forty-five weapons in all, I think, concealed about their persons in all kinds of ways. The interpreter testified in that case, and half an hour after leaving the court room he was brought back, shot and cut with hatchets. He was terribly mutilated and lived only a few moments after being brought to the station-house. The murderers were arrested but attempted to prove an alibi, and had a host of Chinese witnesses present for that purpose. Although there were some hundreds of Chinese present at the time of the murder, the prosecution was forced to rely upon the evidence of a few white men who chanced to see the deed committed. We were opposed at every turn by the Chinamen and the Chinese companies. As a general thing it was utterly impossible to enforce the laws with any certainty against those people, while they will themselves use our laws to perseeute innoeent men who have gained their enmity. They seem to have no idea eoncerning the moral obligation of an oath, and carc not for our form of swearing.

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E. E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER XXXI. (concluded.)

St. George had met the dragon!

If Stephen's heart had been a trifle lifted up with his popularity—and it was natural that it should be, for he was young, and flattering voices had not beeu wanting to prophesy for him a brilliant political future when the new party of Prohibition should take the helm—it was strangely humble when he faced once more the riotous crowd. That reverent bowing of the head, that brief, simple petition had been altogether unpremeditated. It was a sudden impulse, the feeling of his own weakness coupled with such an inrushing sense of the divine power to uphold that he did it without a thought of anything singular in the action.

It was the first time he had ever fronted such an assemblage. But he had that crowning gift of the orator, a fine, sonorous voiee, and was not easily put down.

At one point in his speech a few rotten eggs were hurled, bespattering a brand new suit. This was disagreeable as it was a nice one, and his funds would not at present warrant him in getting another.

"I am glad to meet some of our saloon friends in argument," he responded as eoolly as if it had been a bouquet of roses, at whieh there was laughter and applause mingled with other demonstrations not so flattering. "I object to the style of the argument, but I will put up with it if it is the best they can muster. I am not here to-night in the interests of any man or any faction."

Jeering cries interrupted him, but he went on with perfeet good nature.

"You distrust what I say—that I am not a demagogue swayed by selfish or at best class interests. A man has no right to pronounce an opinion in public on any great question who has not first examined it carefully on both sides, and eonsidered it intelligently and its relations to all classes in the community. If women should have the right to preserve the peace and virtue of their homes intaet; if business men and artisans have the right to pursue their several callings unburdened by enormous and unnecessary taxation, liquor sellers have also their rights which I now propose to spend a few moments in considering."

There was silence now. Even his foes were a little curious to see how Stephen would handle this novel subject. He went on.

"The saloonist thinks that if he pays fifty or a hundred or five hundred dollars to the State or the city for a license to scll liquor, he has a right clear and incontestable to sell it. Certainly so far as it goes he has the best of the argument. The distiller, if he pays ninety per cent tax to the government, thinks he has a right to carry on his business without let or hindranee, and so far as human law can give it to him has he not that right? This is not a subject which we consider sufficiently. Of those who denounce the liquor seller, nine out of ten have never thought of putting themselves in his place, or reflected that he has rights like other men—the right that the government under which he lives should deal fairly by him, and, if his be as legitimate a business as shoeing horses or selling tea and sugar, should impose no more restrictions on him than it does on the blacksmith or the merchant. Now there is no middle line between an honest and a dishonest business, between one that injures and one that benefits society; and the Government in taxing liquorselling so utterly out of proportion to other trades is either guilty of the most high-handed oppression or the basest partnership in crime.

"Yet to-day our nation halts between two opinions. Shame on such cowardly vacillation! Either the business is a legitimate one and should not be taxed at all, or else it is the contrary and should be prohibited forever. Better that our law-givers openly proclaim the rule of the Drink Moloeh than to worship him in secret. Better they should fling wide open the doors of the saloon and force the question to an issue. In the name of justice, of common sense, of patriotism; in the name of ruined homes, of delicate women suffering nameless atrocities, of children crying themselves to sleep with cold and hunger, of the thousands who fill our asylums and poor-houses—sacrificed between the two millstones of national and individual greed, give the liquor seller his rights!"

Stephen stood erect and defiant. He felt as if he would not have minded a pistol at his head. He had reached that height of spiritual exaltation where walk the souls of martyrs palm-crowned. He would have gladly thrown his own life a sacrifice into the chasm of this awful wrong.

In the beginning of the disturbance some of the most determined among the temperance men fearing personal violence to the young speaker, had forced their way through the mob to the platform and made a kind of body guard around him, while one or two of the more timid had quietly slipped out and applied to the Mayor for police to quell the disturbance. The mob were composed mainly of barroom loafers, convenient tools for the saloon and the lodge; but they quailed before these evidences of a determination to preserve order, and Stephen finished his address in comparative quiet.

As may be imagined, he did not find the evening's exciting scenes a good preparation for sleep. He still oecupied the same office, though it did not now look so bare and cell-like as when we first showed it to the reader. He had indulged himself in a student's lamp of neat and chaste design, a set of new law books, and an easy chair which happened to take his fancy at an auction sale because it was so like one whieh at home always occupied a certain corner of the family sitting-room, and had been his favorite refuge in many a childish trouble. Instead of direetly seeking his couch he threw himself into its capaeious arms, thinking that he would sit there a few moments and enjoy the darkness, and silence, and solitude. A soothed, comforted, restful feeling began to creep over him. The scowling, derisive faees ceased to float before his eyes, the tremor of his nerves grew still, and Stephen at last fell into a sound slumber, from whieh he was suddenly roused with a feeling that he had been repeating an old adventure of his boyhood, when one night in driving the cows home from pasture he was caught out in a thunder storm.

But as he reeovered from his bewilderment he grew conscious that it was a real sound which had awakened him—the firing of a volley of shot into his office window.

He hastily turned up his light. The pane was shattered, and in the ceiling directly over his sleeping place were lodged two bullets. Stephen felt a shivering sense of awe. Never before had he come so near to touching the hand of a proteeting Providence, for plainly the objeet of the misereants who had fired the bullets was assassination.

The outrage caused, as was natural, intense excitement, but as it had been planned in seeret conclave by members of the Jacksonville Legion, bound by oath in true Masonic style to keep eaeh other's counsels, the perpetrators were never discovered.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

It has been supposed that Heurich, the great brewer, was about the only man in extensive business who could successfully defy the labor unions. For a year or more the order to boyeott all saloons that sold his beer has been issued and in some measure enforced. About 150 dramshops in this city suffered some loss, while others made corresponding gains. Repeated meetings of the Liquor Dealers' Association have been held and efforts made to raise the boycott. At last the eonflict has ended by the submission of the great brewer to the combined opposition of the lodge and the saloon. The Star thus reports the settlement:

> At a conference of members of the Saloon Keepers' Association yesterday afternoon, with representatives of labor organizations, the cable correspondence between the saloon keepers and Mr. Heurich, the brewer, was discussed, and it was agreed to raise the boycott on Mr. Heurich and saloon keepers who sell his beer, with the understanding that when Mr. Heurich returns to Washington he shall affix his signature to the agreement to employ in future only union men and purchase building material from union houses only.
> At the meeting of the Federation of Labor last night it was decided to raise the boycott. Similar action has also been taken by the executive committee of the Knights of Labor, and includes the raising of the boycott against the steamer, George Law.

In such a conflict between the powers of darkness every friend of humanity must be a complacent spectator. If the trades unions shall break up the saloons and beggar the breweries all will rejoice. If on the other hand the despotic power of the lodges shall be broken, and all men be free to work when, where, and for what wages they choose, all workmen at least ought to lift up glad hands of joy. At least this good will come to the people. They will be compelled to see that the real issue is whether the saloon and the lodge shall rule, or whether their corrupting and despotic power shall be broken. Temperance vs. whisky and freedom of labor vs. the lodge are the issues of the hour, and when they shall be fairly considered and met the result will not be doubtful.

It is a matter of gratulation that the work of the Central Union Mission goes on with unabated interest and most excellent results. Profound attention is given at our street meetings, and some men of deplorable lives are being led to repentance. The interest deepens and is spreading, and the number of conversions increases.

Last Sabbath it was my privilege to visit and, with others, address the soldiers at the Arsenal. There was most respectful attention, and some rejoiced that they have found Christian sympathy and are permitted to hear the Gospel of Christ. Though the churches are now having vacation and many of the ministers are away, yet the general effect on the cause of Christianity and Christian reform is manifest. Christians are brought into unity, become less worldly, more candid, and learn to appreciate their brotherhood in Christ as incomparably more precious than all the selfish brotherhoods that Satan has invented. H. H. Hinman.

A PEOPLE'S CHURCH.

Thank God, a standard has been lifted up for the people! The great American nation has a standard. It is the old star-spangled banner. The chureh, as well as the state, needs a standard. Not standards, but one standard for the one church of Christ. The American people have but one standard. There are many States, but all have the same standard. So with the loeal churches of Christ. We eannot all live in one place, hence the neeessity of local churches as well as of States. If the States can be one, surely God's church ean be more perfeetly one, for our God is above all States, nations and worlds. There are many places in the United States where God's standard has been lifted up for the people. I will now refer to but one. This one is at Humboldt, Nebraska.

It seems, from what I saw and heard while at Humboldt, of late, that the Lord moved Elder Joel S. Kelsey to lift up this Bible standard for the people of that town and place. Many felt that it was God's order to hold and keep it up. To build a house of worship and maintain the same in the Bible order, with the popular current against them, would require money as well as grace. I understand just then a lady friend, one of means, came to the front and said, "Go ahead. Build the house and I will pay the bills." The house was built, and true to her word most of the bills she paid. Just then, it appears, her mind was called off from this grand work, not by buying "five yoke of oxen," or a tract of land, but by marrying a husband. The house of worship is complete, having eost about $8,000. From what I learned she was not only to build the house, but see that the standard was kept lifted up.

She having left, the payment of unpaid bills, with the burden of sustaining a pure Gospel preached in this house of worship, falls upon a few. The question to be settled by all the lovers of truth in this and all lands where light and truth prevail, is, shall those few, true and faithful brethren, be left as standard bearers to faint? Isa. 10: 18. A few hundred dollars will help them out of debt, then a few hundred more will help till they will be able to support a pastor who will keep before the people the truth. This house is called the People's church. All God's people have a home there. It is a house for the Lord's people of that locality. It is a grand one. For their eneouragement of late, I have parted with $25 and almost four weeks' time, and I want to do about as much more for the next few weeks. The trustees will have a book where the name and postoffice, with the amounts of the free-will offerings of each will be kept. The several amounts will be acknowledged direetly and publicly, as will be for the glory of God and the good of men.

Maryville, Mo. Rufus Smith.

We, the undersigned trustees of the house of worship referred to above by Elder Smith of Maryville, Mo., can truly certify to the correctness of the statement so kindly made by him in our behalf in this our time of need. While thanking him for his "labor of love" among us during the temporary absence of our good and able pastor, for needed rest and recuperation, we would say to all, far and near, whose hearts are in sympathy with us and our work, that all money, much or little, contributed to aid us in it, will be gratefully received, faithfully applied, and properly accounted for. While we shall remember all such helpers with lasting gratitude, to God alone be all the glory.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LATEST FROM THE MEMPHIS DISTURBANCE.

MEMPHIS, Tenn., Aug. 19, 1885.

Editor Christian Cynosure,

DEAR SIR AND BRO.—When I wrote you some time ago, I had no apprehension of the sad, sad trial that was awaiting me, and now that it is over, I do not regret it. I was saved by the rulings of a blessed Providence, who kept the mob from surrounding my house until I was safely out of it. Angry threats are yet being made against me, but I am trusting in God. The faithful of my church are trying to get me out of the suburbs into the city. My house is guarded nightly. I am sorry that your letter in the excitement of the first two or three days got misplaced. I have preached for my people at the church the Sabbath following the mob and last Sabbath, twice each day. Many have renounced secretism and come out. We have now nearly 200 of my 475 members, and believe we will now get them all; and those who do not come out of their societies will leave the church and go elsewhere. Yours for Christ and his cause, R. N. COUNTEE.

"SECTS AND SCHISMS."

DEAR BRO. BLANCHARD:—In your article under the above caption, as seen in the Cynosure of the 13th inst., you seem to have entirely forgotten my position as distinctly stated in my last reply to you. I then stated, what I now reaffirm, that I seek not mere come-outism, mere isolation, but the true communion of saints, the union in any given locality of all those who are one in Christ.

I do not "ask all the Christians in the United States to withdraw from their respective communion tables, without giving them any other." You know our manner of work here in Kentucky. You have visited us and preached to our people. We have regular churches and a monthly communion table. We entreat all who have separated themselves from the one body, by what you properly call the shiboleths of party, to not make these shiboleths the issue, the basis of a party, but cease these schisms and stand simply on Christ, and as members of the one body. This is not making a new sect; but repenting of sect, and standing as a part, not party in the body, but part of the one body of Christ. Forty years ago you urged me to come out from all slave-holding associations. I thought then that I must deal with slave-holding as you are now dealing with sectarianism—stay with it to try to cure it. You say, "The cure for the division of Protestantism is not organization or come-outism, but salvation from sin and error. So I reasoned for a time whilst my practice was neutralizing my words.

You said to me, "Come out." God said, "Come out of her, my people, that you be not partaker of her sins." The Synod of Kentucky, after I had spent two years in protest and labor with them said, "You have done all you can unless it be by consistently withdrawing yourself and joining where you belong—with those who regard slave-holding as a sin."

I obeyed God and said to brethren around me, "Let us cease to bid Godspeed to iniquity. Let us come together ON CHRIST, and preach him 'who is not the minister of sin.'" Two who had been Baptists, two who had been Disciples, one who had been a Methodist, and four who had been Presbyterians ceased the practice of schism, and came together and had at once a "communion." God blessed that communion, and you then said, "Amen."

I have the idea that there was something like this recently at Wheaton—a church on Christ, free from sect and Christless lodgery. I will be careful in quoting precedent and authorities, save from the Word; for I have heard that some at Wheaton are asking that we have a king, an ecclesiastical authority; "that we be like the nations round about us." I hope not.

"ONE ORGANIZATION."

You seem to have fallen into the mistake of thousands—that we desire to break up all the little sects, and merge into one big sect—another hierarchy like Rome, "under one name and under one organization." Not so. We seek to follow the "pattern in the mount"—apostolic order, "church," "church of God," "churches of Christ." I would not insist even upon independency as a condition of co-operation. If one congregation regarded that as the divine order, let it be so. If another thought a bench of elders was the divine order, let it be so. If others thought the divine order demanded an overseer over several churches, let it be so. Only maintain the unity of the one body and contribute to the common cause. Do not make parties, or polities, or opinions, outside of acknowledged oneness in Christ.

I would not suppress testimony, or teaching on baptism, or Calvinism, or Arminianism. Let each one speak in love and live up to his own convictions; but maintain the "unity of the spirit, in the bond of peace."

One reason why I desire this unity of God's true children is that there may be freedom and strength to oppose lodgery and every other Christless institution; and lodgery will chuckle in its sleeve the day it shall see Jonathan Blanchard, a Samson of strength, lie down on the "same carpet" with the bulwark of lodgery—sectarianism. Justice should be given to the man. There is from his lips "withering condemnation of sectarianism:" still, "stay in it to cure it." Once the plea of those associated with slave-holders, and now of many associated with the lodge. Oh, when shall the church come up from the wilderness, "Fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?"

VACATION RAMBLES.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—What we saw of Central Park, New York, is not so well kept as when we visited it, as yet unfinished, twenty years ago. The menagerie is much more extensive than that at Lincoln Park, Chicago, but the animals are not so comfortably domiciled. The chief attraction for the crowds of visitors was that clown of the animal kingdom, the chimpanzee, who by his "grand and lofty tumbling," and his swing and tightrope performances kept the company in a roar. His hands and feet are frightfully human, both in appearance and use.

The intense heat prevented our visiting more than the obelisk and the Metropolitan Museum. Unless protected by some preservative of the outside surface, the destruction of the former is said to be certain in a not very long period, as the stone does not stand our climate. The museum would well repay not the visit of a day, but the study of weeks. On entering the west end of the grand hall we found ourselves in the midst of the heroes and genii of all ages, preserved in marble. Of these sculptures we admired most Powers' "Greek Slave;" some works by W. H. Reinhart, especially a child face, and Antigone pouring a libation at the tomb of her brother Polynikes, and Latona and her children Apollo and Diana; and of W. W. Story's works, his Semiramis and Cleopatra. The perfection of the sculptor's art in his "Media Meditating the Murder of her Children," was such that the fell expression upon the face of the fair murderess, caused a cool shiver in the beholder.

Passing from the companionship of these marble effigies of the real and ideal dead we came to almost numberless cases filled with the products of the skilled labors of fingers that had, in some cases, ceased to work for more than three thousand years. Egyptian mummies wrapped in clothes yet well preserved, of which there are hundreds of specimens of various textures in frames hung together like the leaves of a great book, with finely wrought and well-preserved sarcophage, and numerous specimens of pottery, and other products of Egyptian art are here preserved.

Of Grecian art the specimens are not numerous and most of what there are are from ancient tombs and are not well preserved.

Of Roman art the specimens are more numerous and better preserved. Of very great interest is the very large collection of Roman glassware known as the Cesnola collection. Many of the articles are strikingly like those of the present. Perhaps the object of greater interest here is a very large Roman dotium that was dug up in the island of Cyprus. It must hold several hogsheads, has a large mouth and is oval at the bottom and must have been partly sunk in the ground to cause it to stand upright. It is probably made of some kind of earthen ware and is as perfect as when it contained the wine supply of some Roman. The collection of ancient coins and household ornaments is very fine.

The collection of textile fabrics, tapestries and vessels for drinking and other purposes, embroidered robes and articles of dress of medieval and comparatively modern times, is large. There is a vast collection of pottery and weapons of stone, iron and bone and other articles that belong to the various American nations.

The art gallery includes a very large number of paintings of various kinds, of the merits of which we do not feel competent to speak. A general impression which our hasty glance left with us, is that many of them are not worthy of the space they occupy. There were, however, some fine heads chiefly of England's notables, both of the living and of the recent dead. Some other pieces drew our attention and we would fain have studied their beauties, but could not for lack of time.

After a day of as much enjoyment as the heat would permit, taking the street cars at the nearest point we turned our faces toward South Ferry and the home of our cousin, Lucius Johnson, on Staten Island. Scarcely had we traveled half the way to the steamer when our car suddenly stopped and on looking for the cause we saw a continuous line of street cars and a dense crowd of men and teams before us and were told that our way was hedged up by the procession bringing General Grant's body to its temporary resting place in the City Hall. Crossing over to the elevated railroad we continued our journey. We could distinctly see that for over twenty blocks the street we had left was jammed with one mass of human beings.

Through the kindness of our relative and host we were next day treated to a visit, in company with himself, wife and two children and two other guests from Newark, N. Y., to Cony Island, by steamer to Bay Ridge and thence by rail.

Twenty years since our first visit has changed this place from a natural sea beach with its long stretch of glistening sand, where old ocean held high carnival, or rocked himself to rest, disturbed only by the temporary occupants of a single small hotel or the still more ephemeral passengers of a miniature railroad, to a mottled and fantastic city on the sands, with its immense hotels and eating-houses and its contrivances of every kind to relieve visitors of their spare cash. The most striking object is the monster elephant, whose huge body lifted far above the earth on colossal legs, gives space to four stories of hotel and eating-house rooms. It cost $75,000 and like many other large concerns here, is said in these hard times not to be a paying venture.

Two fine piers, five hundred feet long, at a cost of half a million each, enable steamers from various points to land passengers here. They are supported by hollow wrought iron pillars riveted together air tight at the four corners. With great difficulty until they discovered how to do it, these were forced down into the sand. Those under the first one were not put far enough down to prevent the structure settling. It was finally discovered that by sucking out the water and sand from the inside by steam they could be put down so as to be secure.

As Horace said of the grove of the Muses and the cave and fountain of Egeria, that the divinities of the grove and fountain were not so present after as before the art of the sculptor and the lapidary had invaded those scenes of natural beauty, so say we of Cony Island. God's mighty voice as it is heard in the sound of many waters, is now partially stifled in all, and in many entirely deadened, by the clink of glasses or rattle of dishes, or the machine music of the merry go-round, or the roll of the rink, or the roar of the switch-back railway, or by the cries of the gambler and showman, or by the words of the huckster, or by the songs of the siren, or by the whispers of the tempter. O. F. LUMRY.

LECTURES AT BAXTER, IOWA.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Please allow me to report through the columns of your paper some work done in this vicinity. The Wesleyan Methodist church invited Rev. E. I. Grinnell to lecture against secrecy. In compliance he delivered a course of three lectures upon this subject, after which he gave us one against infidelity. They were delivered during the week beginning August 9th. The attendance was fair and order good through the series.

The lectures generally made a good impression on those who heard. The secret orders were fairly represented. The last night he exposed the workings of these systems. Naturally there is considerable discussion on these subjects since in this vicinity and the usual defense of sin is being made by the cable-towed servants of despotism.

C. C. REEDER.

WILL IT COME?

What? The cholera. A good many people are anxious to be informed about the probability of its coming. Now maybe some may not know, but it is a fact, that cholera is of a retiring disposition, and waits for an invitation before making a visit. You may not be posted in cholera etiquette, so as to know how to invite it in good style. But you, my friend, with that well that needs cleaning so badly,—you're doing very well. That is a good invitation, and cholera will be sure to accept if it comes anywhere near, and it is at all convenient. And you, with that bad-smelling sink and drain,—cholera won't pass you by, if it comes into the country; you couldn't please it better than to get up a strong smell like that. And that sink-hole near the house, where the frogs live? Oh, yes, cholera goes where frog concerts are to be heard, whenever it is possible to make connections. And if you have a damp and dirty cellar, that will be taken as a good invitation, and cholera will call on you if it calls on any one in the neighborhood, and will board with you awhile. A dirty sty or stable will also be considered in the light of a smile of welcome, and cholera will readily come in and stay a few days. If no other way of invitation is convenient, you might throw the slops near the back door or be careful not to disturb that rotting refuse heap, or forget to clean out that out-house vault. Cholera will accept anything of that sort as a positive and urgent invitation to come as soon as possible and stay as long as convenient. And there's another thing about it; if you give such an invitation and cholera can't accept on account of not having business within a thousand miles or so of you, it will be almost sure to send diphtheria, or typhoid fever, or some other member of the family in its place that may be able to fill the place of cholera itself in good shape. If you don't give cholera some such invitation you needn't expect it, but if you do invite it in some way it will be pretty sure to call on you or send a good representative. J. F. B.

TRAIN TALKS.

CORINTH, N. Y., Aug. 6, 1885.

The following conversation took place a while since on the D. & H. C. R. R. train between Schenectady and Quaker Street, between an old man, a Methodist Episcopal preacher from Pennsylvania, and myself.

"Are you a Mason?"

"I am."

"Where were you made a Mason?"

"In Pennsylvania; have not attended very regular lately; little dull, I must brighten up."

"What do you think of the institution?"

"I think it a good one."

"As far as I have been I have not found the name of Jesus. Why is that?"

"It is because it originated in Solomon's time, and it never changes and is very ancient."

"Why did they put in the name of John, if that is so?" No answer.

"Do you think the oath that we have to take is binding on a man?"

"No."

"Would you be willing to submit to the penalty?"

"No."

"Do you think it would be right to execute the penalty?"

"No."

"Then you swear to do something you would not be willing to submit to yourself and is not binding on anyone else—is that it?" No answer.

And so the devil goes on deceiving the people, and men go on being deceived and swearing away their liberty.

I met a man while traveling on the same road lately. I asked him if he traveled with Hiram, and he said, "Dat vas all right." I asked him if he was made a Mason in Germany, and he said, "No, in Schenectady." He said he had taken thirty-two degrees, and intended on going to Europe in the fall to finish. He said I was not a Mason, and he would not talk with me unless I gave him a sign that I was a Mason. I asked him if he would cut a man's throat across, and he said, "I don't want you to talk to me any more, you d—n villiam;" and took his valise and made for the other end of the car; and he was a Jew. Beloved friends, let us push the battle to the gates of hell in the name of our precious Jesus. F. J. DUNHAM.

NATIONAL CONSCIENCE.

Verily, you have great need to "Awaken the public conscience," as H. H. Hinman says, or to "enthrone Christ in the national conscience," as M. A. Gault expresses it. But how? Ah, "there's the rub!"

Neither Solomon nor the Tennessee Y. M. C. A., nor the Scribes and Pharisees of any age or nation would admit themselves wrong. But what was—what is the wrong? Simply in departing from the Divine Spirit and divine ordinances. The world, the flesh and the devil were too strong for Solomon and the penalty followed. So to-day such as the Y. M. C. Associations of Tennessee, and the great national churches, from those of the United Kingdom to the Russian Empire, with all the corruptions of the Greek church and of Rome and her daughters, have supplanted, and in many places obliterated the true worship and spirit and ordinances of the Lord Jesus Christ.

It has been forgotten that his "kingdom is not of this world," and that its only sword is the sword of the Spirit, the Word of God. Therefore, only by it must the war against iniquity by carried on by his people.

God in providence, however, rules the world as in grace he rules the church. Let the public conscience be awakened to this great fact. Let us beware of mingling what God has kept apart or penalty must be incurred. We can be citizens and Christians, but the duties are as apart as are those of the family and the farm. T. H.

PITH AND POINT.

THE ILLINOIS CONVENTION AT GALVA.

Friends here heartily endorse the opinion of Mrs. Weed of Monmouth, Ill., as given in your paper August 13, and would esteem it a great favor to see and hear Mr. Stoddard or some other one of the brethren. We are glad that there is one at least interested in our welfare and should be glad to make her acquaintance.—MRS. MCDIARMID, Elmira, Ill.

A NAME FOR THE ROLL.

You have doubtless learned through The Rescue, also through the United Brethren in Christ that I have enlisted what little talent, influence and ability I possess in the rising army that is training and drilling for the avowed purpose of giving battle to secretism in all its forms, but more especially all oath-bound clans. Have read your paper, the Cynosure, a good deal, with other anti-secret papers, and admire its boldness in facing the foe.—W. R CALHOON, Courtland, Ill.

ENLIGHTEN THE SOUTH.

You have sent me the Cynosure so faithfully I feel that I am under obligations to you for the best paper the United States produces. You may count me a life-subscriber. If we expect to get the next President we must enlighten the South. I would help to do that if only I had wherewith.—JOHN FAIT, Centerville, Ind.

SCATTER THE GOOD SEED.

I appreciate the Christian Cynosure very much; hope it will be a blessing to many who are ignorant of all secret societies. I never could view any secret organization as being founded on Christian principles, and want to see the light on the candlestick and not under a bushel, so that all around may be benefited. We do not need those horrid oaths to bind us to keep anything good a secret; but if we have any truth sow it broadcast, perhaps there may be some that will reap the harvest. We know not what a day may bring forth. We only have one time to pass through this world, therefore we should do all we can to Christianize the people. That may seem to be very little while there is so much intemperance abroad and so little legislation to stop it.—N. COX, Kemps Mills, N. C.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS.

LESSON X, Sept. 6, 1885.—Elijah translated. 2 Kings 2: 1–15.

GOLDEN TEXT.—And Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God took him. Gen. 5: 24.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Death to the Christian is always a translation—from one sphere of duty to another wider and higher. vs. 1–8. Elijah in his lifework resembled the desert palm which is said to extend its roots to such an immense depth as to reach springs of water which in time it brings to the surface of its sandy dwelling place. A grove of young palms spring up, grass clothes what was before a burning waste, and thus is created the fertile oasis. At Bethel and Jericho, centers of Baal worship, we find established flourishing schools of the prophets. These green places in the national desert of semi-heathenism were the fruit of Elijah's life of reform labor. A true faith in the heart of man or woman is always an active force on others. When it ceases to be this it is dead. Elijah is here an example for reformers. He carried the warfare into the very kingdom of the Beast. He chose the spots of thickest darkness in which to set the bright lights of these twin universities which were to continue his work when he had departed. It was not strange that these young prophets should receive divine intimation of the great event about to take place. The miracle needed them for witnesses. They needed the miracle to give to their teachings regarding a spiritual life beyond the grave the same seal of truth that seeing the resurrection body of Christ did to the teachings of the apostles. "We speak that we do know and testify that we have seen." Elijah's translation was clear proof of another world—of an immortal, glorified existence that flesh and blood could not inherit—just such a proof as the age and the people needed. It answered for the Old Testament dispensation that solemn question of Job, uttered a thousand years before—"If a man die shall he live again?"—as the resurrection of Christ answers it for the New. Ancient Baalism could give no reply to this question that would satisfy the soul, nor can the countless man-invented systems of worship that take its place to-day.

2. What we should most crave of our spiritual guides and teachers is a double portion of their spirit. vs. 9–15. Elisha asked a hard thing (1) because it was a thing God alone could grant; (2) because spiritual gifts are neither communicable nor inherited. The sign Elijah gives him is at the same time a severe test of his worthiness to be the successor of the lion-hearted prophet. His eye must be on his master when the fiery chariot bears him from his sight. He loses the gift if he yields to the natural emotion of fear and seeks to hide his face for an instant from the dazzling splendor. "As they still went on and talked," etc. To the last moment Elijah's mind is full of his beloved work. To a true servant of God death even works no change in the nature of his employment. Although admitted to higher service, it is still God's service. We are best prepared to die when we are best prepared to live.

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

Will a whole generation one day share with Elijah the glory of translation to heaven without death? 1 Cor. 15: 51, 52. Who are really more blessed than even Elijah? Rev. 14: 13.

"When the Lord would take up Elijah." His end was a plan of God no less than his life had been, and his times were in God's hands. He went to meet it submissively, for he had fought a good fight, and kept the faith. —Peloubet.

"Tarry here." As this mysterious change approached he desired to end his life as he had spent its greater portion, in solitude with God.—Smith. He did not wish to have any one present to witness his glorification without being well assured that it was in accordance with the will of God.—Keil.

"The sons of the prophets." The prophet communities, or so-called school of the prophets, came into existence for the first time at the period of apostasy and idolatry under Ahab, and their founder was Elijah who may, nevertheless, have had in mind certain free unions of prophets established by Samuel for the purpose of concentrating religious life. Whether he were founder or restorer of these schools they are an important testimony that Elijah not only zealously and heroically battled against idolatry, but also built up and laid foundations.—Lange.

"I will not leave thee." Nothing could keep back a heart so true.—Geikie. The band which bound him to Elijah was living faith in the living God. He honored and loved his father after the flesh (1 Kings 19: 20), but he left him; with his spiritual father he wished to remain unto the end. His love was not a mere passing, bubbling enthusiasm, but it was strong as death.—Lange. He resolved, certainly also from an inward impulse of the spirit of God, to be an eye-witness of his glorification, that he might receive the spiritual inheritance of the first-born from his departing spiritual father.—Keil.

"And Elijah took his mantle." As once Moses, dividing the water with his staff, was accredited chief of the teachers, so Elijah, dividing the water with his mantle, was confirmed chief of the prophets. The miraculous power was no more attached, in any magical way, to the mantle than to the staff; but to the prophetical calling.—Lange.

"Let a double portion . . . be upon me." Let a first-born son's double portion (see Deut. 21: 17) of thy prophetic spirit descend to me. This view is preferable to the assumption that he asked to have twice as much of that spirit as Elijah had. To say nothing of the request being unbecoming, he would know that a dying man cannot leave to his heir more than he has himself. In point of fact the figure of Elisha is throughout scripture quite subordinate to that of Elijah. While Elijah is mentioned in Chronicles, in Malachi, in every Gospel repeatedly, in the Epistle to the Romans and in the Epistle of James, Elisha's name occurs, out of Kings, only in Luke 4: 27. —Cook.

"If thou see me when I am taken from thee." If he was able to retain to the end the same devoted perseverance, and keep his eye set and steadfast on the departing prophet, the gift would be his.—Stanley.

"And Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven." Went up in this fiery storm into the sky and out of sight. Many writers hold that Elijah really rode into heaven, as indeed we often find it represented in pictures. This conception of the event has struck such deep root that people scarcely inquire whether the text really justifies it or not. But there is no assertion of this.—Lange. But the fact that it was the chariot and horses of fire which separated them implies that the whirlwind took chariot and Elijah both up in one fiery storm. So Keil says, The storm was accompanied by a fiery phenomenon, which appeared to the eyes of Elisha as a chariot of fire with horses of fire in which Elijah rode to heaven.

"Where is the Lord God of Elijah?" Elisha's smiting of the waters seems to have been tentative. He was not sure of its result. Hence the form of his invocation.—Cook. In Jeremiah 2: 8 complaint is made of the priests that they did not ask, "Where is the Lord?" To ask that question was to seek the Lord. The question of Elisha, then, was a prayer, full of faith and confidence that the God of Elijah would manifest himself to the God of Elisha also.—Todd.

OBITUARY.

Died in York, Medina Co., Ohio, Jan. 18, 1885, JULIUS AUGUSTUS BINGHAM.

Born in Windham, Conn., March 13, 1793, he had almost reached the advanced age of 92 years, a long, eventful and useful life. His boyhood days were spent partly in Connecticut and partly in Cazenovia, New York. About the age of 16 he professed conversion to Christ. Not long after he went into a printing office for the purpose of learning the typographical art. Here he was outside of all religious influence. Dram drinking, card playing, horse racing, dancing, and almost every social abomination was the order of the day. Being surrounded by such influences and associations he was drawn away from his allegiance to Christ and became entangled by the sins and follies of those with whom he was associated. When about 19 years of age he entered the military service in the war of 1812, where he spent some three months or more.

Soon after his return at the close of the war he was married in 1815 to Miss Charlotte Holman in Utica, New York. After this he spent the years of early manhood in a newspaper office, either as compositor or editor. In the year 1819 he went to Rockville, Maryland, and conducted a paper in Washington City. While living in Rockville the Lord once again called upon him to return to him. He heard and obeyed the call, sought and found pardon and peace, and himself and wife united with the Presbyterian church of that place and ever after endeavored to live a faithful, consistent Christian life. In 1825 he removed to Portsmouth, Ohio, and established a paper called the Western Times. In this place the last of his three children died. Two were buried in Washington City and one in Portsmouth. From this place he removed to Jackson C. H., O., where he studied medicine and engaged in its practice about ten years.

In 1839 he removed to Porter, Gallia Co., O. There he threw himself heartily and earnestly into the anti-slavery agitation which was then beginning to excite public attention. He has often said he was not born an Abolitionist, but while living in Jackson county, during a visit from his step-father, Luther Burnell, he was thoroughly converted to the cause of the poor bondman. From that time he bent all his energy, devoted his time and talent to the work of awakening an interest among the people in behalf of the poor down-trodden slave. To lift them up from their degradation and wretchedness, to break the fetters from their limbs and teach them how to be God's free people. He, as did others, met with bitter opposition and persecution. Many times his life was threatened. At one time, in early evening, an excited mob gathered in the street in front of his house, cursing and swearing and threatening to shoot him if he would show himself. It was bright moonlight, so they would know him. After a little he left his house by a side door, went out on the street above the crowd, and he could hear them say, "There he is; why don't you catch him." "Kill him; shoot him, the d——d Abolitionist." "Oh," another says, "he is armed, I tell you. He is armed to the teeth or he would not show himself here." But he walked leisurely along down among them, said "Good evening, gentlemen," and went back unhurt into his house. The mob soon after dispersing, himself and family retired and slept quietly and undisturbed. His home was often the resting place of the poor fugitive fleeing from slavery. His kind and Christian wife was always ready to feed and clothe them while stopping to rest a night or longer as they might dare to do.

Sometime during his residence in Porter a colored school was started in Albany, Athens Co., O., called the Albany Manual-labor University. For this school he labored some time, traveling, lecturing, and collecting funds. In the fall of 1860 he moved to Albany. During the year 1861 he commenced labor for the Western Tract and Book Society, then called the American Reform Tract and Book Society, organized in the year 1852. Its object was opposition to all known sin, especially the sin of American slavery; to espouse the cause of him who had no helper, and to vindicate the Bible from pro-slavery charges. For this society he labored ten or twelve years, traveling, while able, in winter storms and summer heat, collecting funds, lecturing wherever he could get into churches and permission to speak to the people in behalf of the society and its work. At an anniversary meeting of the society in 1863, the treasurer, in his report, said: "As heretofore our chief agency has been the Christian Press, the organ of the society, on which we have relied to remind our patrons of the society's labors and the means needed to carry on its work successfully. Yet we have found it very beneficial to employ Dr. J. A. Bingham in eastern and northern Ohio and western Pennsylvania. Aside from funds collected, his personal influence as a Christian has been uniformly beneficial wherever he has traveled."

The present secretary, in writing to a mutual friend, says, "No man has done as much with as little pay for the society as Dr. Bingham." When the new Tract House was being built the then treasurer, Mr. W. C. Gray, now editor of the Interior, was passing along the street with Dr. Bingham, and stopping to look at the house Mr. Gray said, "A monument for you, Dr. Bingham; for it is owing to your energy and perseverance that we have the house." Afterwards, when the house was finished, Mr. Gray, sending a picture of it in a letter, said, "I send a picture of the monument of Dr. Julius A. Bingham, who is yet, thank God, in the flesh. It is better than a slab of marble."

I simply quote these incidents to show the appreciation of his labor by the officers of the Tract Society. In 1863 he married his second wife, Miss Mariett Waterman, and moved to York, Medina Co., Ohio, where he afterwards resided. The last years of active service were spent in behalf of Berea College, Berea, Ky. He felt a warm interest in Berea College from the fact that there ex-slaves or their children are received to all the favors and benefits the same as white pupils. He traveled when health and strength would permit and when unable to travel, by using his pen he accomplished something financially for the college.

He was unsparing and aggressive in his opposition to secret societies, Sabbath desecration and intemperance; doing all he could by giving of his means, using his pen forcibly and energetically and by word of mouth on all proper occasions to aid in overcoming and removing these abominations from our land. He loved the Cynosure, and would call for the reading of it and the Bible after he had ceased to be interested in any other reading. While he was hated by the members of the dark conclaves and their allies he was loved by the "faithful and true."

The last two and a half years of his life his mind was somewhat bewildered and darkened and his poor worn-out body was almost helpless. On the last Sabbath of his life he said to his wife, "I do love the Lord." She replied, "I know you do." "Yes, I do," he said; and several times during the day he said, "I do rejoice in God my Savior."

The next Sabbath in the early morning his spirit was released from the "falling tabernacle." In his death the community has lost a kind friend and his companion a loving husband. He was wearied with his long affliction, and while we mourn the departure of the good and true from earth we may still rejoice that he has reached the land of eternal life and joy and is forever at rest.

THE CHURCHES VS. LODGERY.

The following denominations are committed by vote of their legislative assemblies or by constitution to a separation from secret lodge worship:

Adventists (Seventh-day.)
Baptists—Primitive, Seventh-day and Scandinavian.
Brethren (Dunkers or German Baptists.)
Christian Reformed Church.
Church of God (Northern Indiana Eldership.)
Congregational—The State Associations of Illinois and Iowa have adopted resolutions against the lodge.
Disciples (in part.)
Friends.
Lutherans—Norwegian, Danish, Swedish and Synodical Conferences.
Mennonites.
Methodists—Free and Wesleyan.
Methodist Protestant (Minnesota Conference.)
Moravians.
Plymouth Brethren.
Presbyterian—Associate, Reformed and United.
Reformed Church (Holland Branch.)
United Brethren in Christ.

Individual churches in some of these denominations should be excepted, in part of them even a considerable portion.

The following local churches have, as a pledge to disfellowship and oppose lodge worship, given their names to the following list as

THE ASSOCIATED CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

New Ruhamah Cong. Hamilton, Miss.
Pleasant Ridge Cong. Sandford Co. Ala.
New Hope Methodist, Lowndes Co., Miss.
Congregational, College Springs, Iowa.
College Church of Christ, Wheaton, Ill.
First Congregational, Leland, Mich.
Sugar Grove Church, Green county, Pa.
Military Chapel, M. E., Lowndes county, Miss.
Hopewell Missionary Baptist, Lowndes Co., Miss.
Cedar Grove Miss. Baptist, Lowndes Co., Miss.
Simon's Chapel, M. E., Lowndes Co., Miss.
Pleasant Ridge Miss. Baptist, Lowndes Co., Miss.
Brownlee Church, Caledonia, Miss.
Salem Church, Lowndes Co., Miss.
West Preston Baptist Church, Wayne Co., Pa.

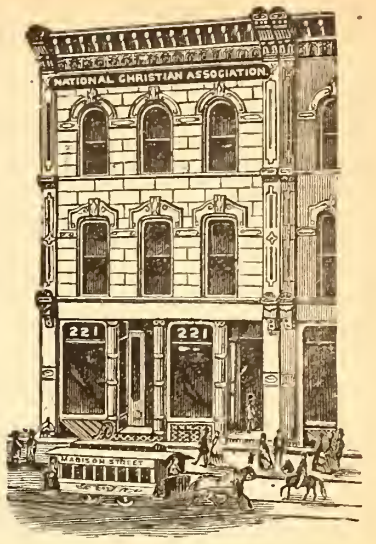
OTHER LOCAL CHURCHES

adopting the same principle are—

Baptist churches: N. Abington, Pa.; Menomonie, Mondovi, Waubeck and Spring Prairie, Wis.; Wheaton, Ill.; Perry, N. Y.; Spring Creek, near Burlington, Iowa; Lima, Ind.; Constableville, N. Y. The "Good Will Association" of Mobile, Ala., comprising some twenty-five colored Baptist churches; Bridgewater Baptist Association, Pa.; Old Tebo Baptist, near Leesville, Henry Co., Mo.; Hoopeston, Ill; Esmen, Ill.; Strykersville, N. Y.

Congregational churches: 1st of Oberlin, O.; Tonica, Crystal Lake, Union and Big Woods, Ill.; Solsbury, Ind.; Congregational Methodist Maplewood, Mass.

Independent churches in Lowell, Countryman school house near Lindenwood, Marengo and Streator, Ill.; Berea and Camp Nelson, Ky; Ustick, Ill.; Clarksburg, Kansas; State Association of Ministers and Churches of Christ in Kentucky.



CHRISTIAN WORKERS

Who depend on voluntary contributions of Christian people in whole or in part for their support:

J. F. BROWNE, Berea, Ky.
ELI TAPLEY, Columbus, Miss.
J. F. GALLOWAY, Okahumka Florida.
WM. HAZENBURG, Cape Town, S. Africa.
A. D. ZARAPHONITHES, Andros, Greece.
C. B. WARD, Secunderabad, India.

The Evangelists associated with Rev. John G. Fee, of Berea, Ky.

Contributions for either of these brethren may be forwarded through the Treasurer of the N. C. A. PLEASE DESIGNATE to which one such funds shall be sent.

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, AUGUST 27, 1885.

HARMAN G. REYNOLDS, long Grand Secretary of the Grand Lodge of Illinois, while a lawyer in Rock Island, collected a debt for C. S. Colton, paid out his client's money for produce, and started for New Orleans. He was followed and brought to by men with muskets.

"STILL HOWLING FOR BLOOD," is the charge which the Clarinda, Iowa, Journal brings against Pres. C. A. Blanchard, of Wheaton College. The facts as shown by the Journal, are these: The Masons planned a corner-stone laying for the Page county court house; and obtained a stone with the customary Masonic inscription on it. But the court house men could not elect their man this fall without the Antimasons. To avoid defeat at the coming fall election they secretly had the letters cut off. This fact was brought out in Pres. Blanchard's speech there. The Journal man first accused him of lying; then published a recantation, and charged him with "howling for blood!"

DR. GALUSHA ANDERSON has failed of an election to the presidency of Vassar College by a vote of 12 in favor to 15 against his election. Dr. Anderson has been president of the Chicago University, and The Standard says that his defeat in the Vassar board "was born of a students' secret society difference." If this means that Dr. Anderson has been pursued for years by malicious secret society opposition it adds but another to the ten thousands which show the lodge-god to be a murderer "from the beginning;" and that he stands sentinel at the gate of every American Institution.

EXTRAORDINARY MASONIC DEVELOPMENTS.

Rob. Morris, LL.D., and now Masonic poet laureate, undertook to change the Thomas Smith Webb ritual, by substituting what he called the Webb-Preston system. To do this, he instituted what he called a "Conservators' Association," which J. Eastman Johnson, Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Michigan, characterizes as "A Secret Association of Master Masons within the body of Master Masons," Annual Address, 1864. This, it seems, is "treason" in the community of Masons. Why not in the community of citizens?

At this session of the Michigan Grand Lodge, eight members of a committee of nine appointed the previous year (1863) reported, and their report is given in full, in the published "Transactions" of 1864; signed by D. C. Jacokes, Hugh McCurdy, S. Moore, O. D. Conger, S. Blanchard, Benj. Porter, J. E. Marvin and Jas. Fenton, committtee.

Their report says: "We met Bro. Morris agreeably to appointment, at the city of Ypsilanti, on March 17th, last. The Masons of Ypsilanti and neighboring lodges who had come up for the same purpose, wished to hear and so were admitted. So the meeting with Morris was made open to all Master Masons. Morris objected, and "all visitors were requested to retire." Being alone with the committee, Morris declared, among other things, that twenty-five Grand Lodges had adopted his new or modified Webb-Preston "work," which statement, the report shows, was false. Morris then proposed to tell us "all about" the "Conservators' Association," which, he said, originated with himself, Charles Scott, of Mississippi, and Phillip C. Tucker, of Vermont. (Transactions. p. 46.)

On page 48, Morris, having "expressly and emphatically claimed that Illinois had adopted his system," Harman G. Reynolds, Grand Secretary and Past Grand Lecturer, was readmitted; and, by his request, all Master Masons were invited in.

Now comes the cream of this Masonic mess. (Transactions, pp. 49-50.) Reynold's exhibited and read to the committee a little book published by Rob Morris, called Excerpta, and showed that "the obligation in full of a "conservator" consisted of twelve points:

1. Secrecy.
2. That every document, written or printed, given to a conservator, must be kept secret from all but his chief who gives it.
3. To obey all orders of the chief conservator "without question as to object or intent,"
4. To aid and help all conservators.
5 To urge Morris's Webb-Preston ritual, and exclude all others.
6. Each conservator to seek the three first or highest offices in his lodge, and the control of the Grand Lodge so as to "compel" the use of the Morris's ritual.
7. (The rest given in full.) "To root out all the old Masons who adhere to any other system from office; to depreciate and diminish their influence; reduce them to their support when necessary or advisable by giving them some unimportant office; to create divisions and jealousies among them; to attack them and drive them off from all participation in the business and counsels of the lodge.
8. "To menace and threaten all brethren who will not submit to their terms; to aggravate and persistently annoy them until they commit some indiscreet act, so that they may take advantage of the same.
9. "To make use of power when obtained to propagate the system of work dictated by the chief conservator, and to break down every lodge which stands in its way.
10. "To keep all secrets communicated by conservators, without exception, let their character and objects be what they may.
11. "To insist everywhere, and at all times, that the system of the chief conservator is the only true system, and all others are illegitimate.
12. "Not to assist in the making of a conservator who has not previously declared in writing, that he will fully conform to all the rules of the order."

The above twelve points were revealed by Harman G. Reynolds, of Illinois, to the committee whose names are above given, at Ypsilanti, Mich., March 19, 1863: and published in the "Transactions" of the Michigan Grand Lodge, 1864.

SUGGESTIONS.

The Cynosure suggests to Bro. H. A. Day; to Dr. Veerboer, of Grand Rapids, and to Rev. C. C. Foote, of Detroit:

1. To obtain copies of the Michigan Grand Lodge Minutes of 1864, and, if necessary, have them reprinted in full for general circulation.
2. To appeal to the Masons of Michigan who are named in said minutes; and to the Master Masons who witnessed these revelations by Reynolds at Ypsilanti, to know whether they or any of them will sustain a criminal prosecution of Rob. Morris for general swindling and obtaining money upon false pretences.
3. To appeal to Presbyterian authorities in Kentucky, where Morris is a ruling elder, to expel him from the church for the crimes and sins which he committed in getting up that "Conservators' Association," by wholesale lying, fraud and imposture.
4. And finally; to induce seceding Masons, and candid Masons who have not seceded, to show the people at large, that if Morris's swindle, as several Grand Lodges declare it to be in the published minutes, is treason against Masonry, Masonry itself is treason against society and the oaths administered blasphemy and the whole thing rascality reduced to a system.

The re-publication of the Michigan Grand Lodge minutes for 1864, would cost but a trifle compared with the benefits. The Cynosure editors will pay five dollars to begin the subscription.

A CALIFORNIA APOLOGIST.

The Censor, of Los Angeles, Cal., pleases and pains us. It bravely advocates the Prohibition party, the Sabbath and general Christianity with admirable ability and tact. Its antagonism to the advocacy of wine manufacture, against the sham learning of the State University, and saloon logic, evinces courage, research and eloquence truly admirable in that grape-growing State.

A singular exception to these characteristics is given July 30th, in a lank column on the Cynosure and secret societies, written it is presumed by some cable-towed, hood-winked preacher, and admitted, as the same paper admits the defense of wine, on the score of free discussion. The advocate of secret societies supplies his lack of facts and sound reasons by sneer and cant. He suggests that if the cholera comes to America the Cynosure may think secret societies brought it, with much more matter equally profound.

The Cynosure holds that Christian reformers are bound to follow Christ, all of whose methods were open, not secret. It teaches that, excluding Christ from its prayers and ritual, it "can do nothing" in the way of reform, by the decision of Christ himself. It insists that prayers by a Good Templars' chaplain, since no rule or custom of the lodge prevents his being a profane worldling, are at best "sounding brass," and that lodge initiations and mock solemn rites, which omit Christ to take in deists, non-professors, Jews, etc., are mere Gentile worship, paid, according to Moses and Paul, "to devils, not to God." All this and other fundamentals in the question, this Censor writer utterly ignores, while the whole strain of his long column is to allege (not prove,) that "Masons will not be a particle more apt to help a criminal Mason escape justice, than the Presbyterians, Methodists, or Catholics, will be to help one of their brethren to do so without any society bonds or oaths." That is to say, a man with a secret oath to have his throat cut will be no more apt to do that which he swears "than if he had sworn no such oath." This is at once very shallow and cool. Why are such oaths kept up? Why are they so concealed and guarded if they are nugatory and wholly inoperative?

The Pacific coast, cursed from the first by the sworn secrecy of the confessional, has naturally adopted the counter-curse of the sworn secrecy of the lodge; and "the god of this world" hath "blinded the minds" of his worshipers.

Will the Censor print an article or two against "Secret Societies," if ably and respectfully written?

THE LECTURERS' CONFERENCE.

The training school for our lecturers, provided by the action of the N. C. A. Board at their last meeting, opened Monday evening in the President's room at Wheaton College. A diligent correspondence on the part of the General Agent had received many responses full of sympathy, though many whose faces would have been warmly greeted found it impossible to come.

The opening prayer-meeting led by Secretary Stoddard was blessed by the Spirit's presence to all, and was a foretaste of the days to come.

Tuesday, though observed by the conference and others as a day of fasting and prayer, was also occupied with the work which had called these brethren together. The morning prayer-meeting at 9 o'clock was led by Rev. Mr. Porter, of Quincy, Mich. The topic of the forenoon led by Pres. C. A. Blanchard was "How to use the Bible in our Reform Work."

In the afternoon after the opening prayer meeting, Pres. L. N. Stratton led on the topic "Baal Peor Identical with Lodge Worship." The Baal Peor spoken of in Numbers, 25th chapter, with whom the Israelites shamelessly sinned Albert G. Mackey, in his Masonic Lexicon, identifies with the present Masonic symbolism. See his articles on "Egyptian Mysteries," especially "Mysteries of Osiris;" his article on "Phallus" and on the "Sun and Moon." The iniquities of Baal or sun-worship as therein described are too abominable for the eye of the customary reader, and he says Masonry retains the sun and moon as symbols, and swears its votaries to the chastity only of the female relatives of Masons.

WEDNESDAY.

Wednesday morning the opening prayer meeting was led by Bro. Isaac Bancroft of Wisconsin. The subject was the Baptism of the Holy Spirit. The hour from 9:30 was occupied by Pres. C. A. Blanchard with the topic, "Lecturers' Lines of Labor," 1 Cor. 9: 16–27; 2 Tim. 2: 24; 2 Cor. 10: 3–5; Jude 9.

1. The union and work of friends.
2. The conversion of the indifferent and hostile.
3. The circulation of literature.
4. The collection of funds.

(a) Different methods and arguments must be used to accomplish different ends. To enlist recruits is one thing, to lead to battle another, to win one from a hostile camp a third. 1. We win by entreaty, moderate statement, and argument. 2. We enthuse men by exhortation, bold statement, extreme statement, encouragement.

(b) But certain things are common: 1st. There must be a real love for men,—all men. 1 Peter 2: 17. This bars such names as wretches, scoundrels, liars, etc. 2. We must avoid unnecessary, ill-timed and ill-natured assaults on men's opinions. 3. We must be cleanly in person and habit—bathing, clothing, care of rooms where we are guests, etc.

(c) To do anyone of these things successfully requires time. A single lecture as a rule amounts to but little; four or five graded carefully, simple truths easily and strongly proved first—then more and more difficult, and in the end, when you have won every man that you can get, have shaken the foundations of enemies, then move for an organization and subscribers to the Cynosure.

(d) Raising money is best done before so far as friends are concerned; after so far as the indifferent are concerned. Collections should usually be taken but should not be the reliance. Money should be raised: 1st. For the sake of God's cause; 2nd, for the sake of the men who give. Covetousness is one of the great sins of the church.

During the lively discussion of this topic there some pointed illustrations were given. Sometimes we are to answer a fool according to his folly. Elder Barlow related this incident. Elder J. R. Baird while he was lecturing was met by a stranger in Dundee, N. Y., who asked,

"Is your name Baird?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did you speak against the lodge at Forestville on such a day?"

"Yes, sir, I did.

"You go to hell!"

"But, my friend, didn't you know it was impolite to ask a man to visit you at home when you are away?"

Secretary Stoddard said he was once met in the street by a man who accosted him, "You're a liar!" He rejoined, "Is that true? Then you must be sorry for me. The Bible says all liars will go to hell, and if I am a liar are you not sorry for my fate, and wish it different?"

Pres. J. Blanchard said he once learned from Martin Van Buren how to bear calumny. Henry Clay in opposing Van Buren took up one of his public papers and subjected it to the most scathing and exasperating ridicule, but Van Buren sat and heard it with the utmost nonchalance, with a smirk, almost a smile, upon his face. The speaker learned thus from a man who could endure such calumny for political office, to endure all things for Christ's sake.

Bro. Alexander Thompson led the afternoon prayer meeting which was followed by the topic, led by Secretary J. P. Stoddard, "Use of Charts in our Work." 1. They help the speaker arrange and master his subject. 2. Help his audience to follow his line of thought. 3. Object lessons make a more lasting impression, and the facts are more easily recalled by mental reference to the illustration. 4. The attention of an audience is more quickly secured and more easily retained by the aid of charts. 5. They are especially useful in showing the system of secretism, and obtaining a knowledge of the relation of the different parts and orders to each other. 6. Often help to introduce the subject in private conversation at hotels, depots, etc.

THURSDAY.

The morning prayer meeting was led by Rev. C. R. Hunt, of Buckingham, Ill., and was followed by a unique drill led by Elder J. F. Browne, who personated with great shrewdness and ability a Mason defending the order, parrying the thrusts of the other lecturers. The forenoon passed in a lively debate, and was such a drill as reminded the participants of the martial drill of the old Romans, which was always made in heavy armor, so that when going into battle with less encumbrance the real work of war might be play in comparison. All agreed that they were never likely to find a Masonic antagonist so dextrous, wily and intelligent as Elder Browne.

In the afternoon Rev. R. Loggan, of Kansas, conducted an animated conference on the Use of Masonic Authorities.

The Conference of Christian Churches voted at the N. C. A. annual meeting in June, endorsed by the United Brethren convention at Hartsville, Ind., and by the Wesleyan, was discussed at some length and with warm approval, and the sentiment of the meeting embodied in the following:

Resolved, by the Lecturers of the National Christian Association in conference assembled, that we heartily favor the holding of the proposed conference of all Christians and Christian churches which oppose secret societies for the purpose of united and energetic action, and will assist such a convention so far as lies within our power.

The lectures of the evening were given in the Wesleyan church by Elder J. F. Browne and Bro. Geo. T. Dissette.

FRIDAY.

After the morning prayer meeting a time was devoted to careful criticism of the lectures of the evening before.

The first topic was the "Lecturer's Use of the Press," conducted by Henry L. Kellogg. The points discussed were in brief:

1. The importance of the press at the present day in convincing and influencing men.

2. The press not enough used in our reform. There is already a need for a Press Bureau for the National Christian Association, and the time approaches when it will be established. Such a department of the work could send to hundreds of papers brief, clear, convincing letters informing the public of the hidden operations of the lodge, and thus warning the voters and assisting churches to preserve a pure communion. The Cynosure editors are frequently asked to write replies to lodge orations and letters for local papers. Such a department could be of great use in answering such requests. The publication of the letter to Judge Craig in the daily and weekly press of Galesburg is a good example of such work.

3. Lecturers and other correspondents should not impose upon the editor or compositors a careless contribution, which their neglect has filled with errors of spelling, punctuation, construction of sentences, or faulty style. They must remember that honorable dealing with other writers, and especially with the readers, demands the occasional use of a waste-basket.

4. Lecturers should use the Cynosure and other reform papers to advertise their work—to gain a better acquaintance with the people they expect to visit.

5. They should help the friends in places where they lecture to make good use of the local press after they are gone, so as to follow the lecture with arguments that will appeal to the community in another way and as powerfully.

This topic was followed by a Bible reading by Pres. J. Blanchard on "The Identity of Gentile Worships with Masonry."

1. Modern Spiritualism was shown to be a kind of possession of devils; and in general all false religions are literal demon worship according to the Word of God. They antagonize the true God and attempt to divorce this globe from him.

2. The Masonic literature all points to the identity of the system to the ancient "mysteries." The Elmsinian mysteries were practiced about fifteen miles from Athens. The secret worship was held in a mystic cell containing about as many persons as an ordinary theater. Cumæ, in southern Italy, was celebrated as the resort of the Sibyl, whose cave at the foot of a promontory was a vast subterranean grotto hewn out of the rock, and is described by Justin Martyr, who visited it. Mohammed received his first so-called "divine revelation" at the age of forty after spending five years in the solitude and gloom of the mountain Hira, near Mecca. Ignatius Loyola, the ignorant soldier enthusiast, received his inspiration in the cave of Manresa, in Spain, a concealed place covered with underbush. Here "he became suddenly possessed of and inspired with the most sublime science and unspeakable mysteries;" which afterward, says a history of the Jesuits, captivated and astounded the most learned theologians. All these systems, thus originating in the darkness of caverns from minds open to the action of evil spirits, are plainly in contrast to the Christian system which is everywhere declared to be light, openness, seeking publicity. Such passages as Eph. 5: 11; Is. 45: 19; 48: 16; and Prov. 5: 6 were read and expounded.

This interesting exposition was preceded by general remarks, in which the speaker said that there appeared to be lacking two things in our work: First, a want of thoroughness. We lack the organization of a political party before election. We ought to have the statistics of all lodges in every county and town. The very publication of such facts would have power. The enemy takes advantage of obscurity and ignorance: "Omne ignotum est pro magnifico"—everything little understood is counted a wonder.

Second, a want of faith. The Bible is full of argument against the lodge and of condemnation of its principles. We do not enough consider that all power is given to Jesus Christ whom the lodge rejects, and that we be well able to overcome in his name.

The afternoon prayer meeting, led by Bro. G. T. Dissette, was followed by Elder Browne on the Popular Explanation of the idea of Masonic Paganism. Comparatively few people who attend reform lectures are at all familiar with the lodge nomenclature which a lecturer is apt to use freely. The claim that there are good things in Masonry he would acknowledge but would show that these features were overborne by its entire separation from God and the true religion. Others suggested that such so-called good was like the devil appearing clothed as an angel of light—the picture is good, but it is of the devil: or it is like the fidelity of brigands to each other—fidelity, the keeping of faith, is good but it is used for murder and robbery: or it is like the good piece of cheese put on a trap, which is no part of the trap, but to attract animals to be caught. The men who treated Christ worst were the most moral men of the day. There was a proverb that if any one went to heaven it would be a Pharisee. But Christ said of the Pharisees that they outwardly appear unto men to be righteous, but within are full of dead men's bones and all uncleanness.

On the general subject it was said: Man will worship. If he has not God, he will have a goblin. Finite mind will lean on the unseen and the infinite. The passage in Job (31: 26–28) is full of instruction respecting the nature and criminality of all religious worship not paid to God.

The remainder of the afternoon was spent in a Question Drawer exercise, Pres. J. Blanchard answering.

1. What is the force and meaning of Masonic penalties?

Masonic penalties originated between thirty and forty years after Charles II., when the sentences of courts are recorded as containing such penalties as removing the bowels and burning them before the eyes of the victim. Masonic penalties were thus patterned after the penalties of the courts of that age. They are to be executed whenever the public sentiment will not make it too costly for the lodge: just as the penalties for heresy would be inflicted today by the Jesuits.

Who is the god of Masonry?

The devil. It should be upon the mind of every one, that men who do not worship God worship the devil. Charlotte Elizabeth in her work on "Principalities and Powers," says, all worship that is not paid to God is to Satan.

What is the best way to approach lodge men to secure their conviction? Be filled with the Holy Ghost and go to them with that power, realizing that by their Masonry they are devil worshipers. There is, of course, a difference to be observed with different cases. "Wisdom is profitable to direct."

How is it proved that Masonry rejects Christ's name? Because Masonry takes in Christ's enemies.

Independently of Masonic authorities, how may Masonry be shown to be a religion? Go to their funerals. They "consecrate" their lodges and use every religious phrase we do.

Should we expect to lead sinners to Christ while engaged as agents of the Association? Certainly. Christ should be first in everything that we do or say on this subject. If we speak against the devil and his works we hold up Christ as the Saviour from them.

Does the education of young ministers at the large and popular theological seminaries have a tendency to enlighten them on this as on other false religions? What effect would it have upon Anti-masonic young men? The effect is bad. A number of cases were noticed.

In the evening a good audience in the Baptist church listened to the addresses of W. B. Stoddard, and R. Loggan, who spoke respectively on "The Claims of Masonry upon Young Men," and the "Origin, History, and Character of Masonry."

SATUDAY.

Rev. A. J. Chittenden led the morning prayer meeting and also conducted the discussion which followed the criticism of the lecturers of the evening previous. He first propounded several questions on the use of the name of Christ in some publications of the Masonic ritual; what is devil worship; the oath of the Grand Army of the Republic. He then passed to the general subject of the labor lodges, trade unions and secret combinations of capitalists and monopolies.

In the afternoon the time was spent very profitably in discussing "How to use the Expositions of Masonry." Pres. C. A. Blanchard led in the consideration of this topic.

In the evening the Wesleyan church was again opened and addresses were made by C. F. Hawley and Isaac Bancroft. The original and forcible use of Scripture argument by the latter aroused a hearty interest.

On the Sabbath, Bro. Dissette preached in the Wesleyan church and Elder Browne in the College chapel. In the evening a union service of these churches was held with the Baptist brethren, Elder Barlow addressing them. A violent storm interfered with what would otherwise have been a crowded house.

NOTES.

—The programme for Monday, the last day of the institute, was: for the forenoon, the circulation of the Christian Cynosure and other literature of the reform; in the afternoon, What Constitutes the Power of the Lodge; and in the evening an address by Elder Barlow in his own church. The report of this day must be postponed till next week.

—This training school, though an experiment, will be forever remembered as a very successful meeting, the model and precedent for frequent meetings of the kind hereafter.

—The discussions of the week, though conducted with the utmost freedom, were characterized by a beautiful and Christ-like harmony. If differences of opinion arose they were subordinated to the great object for which the meeting was called, and all felt that they were disciples of one Master and filled with one purpose by the Holy Spirit.

—Bro. Dissette brought his whole family with him to the meeting, and will locate in Wheaton for the present. Mrs. Dissette and the four children are already making friends with all who become acquainted with them.

COUNTRY LIFE.

Not what we would, but what we must,
Make up the sum of living;
Heaven is both more and less than just
In taking and in giving.
Swords cleave to hands that sought the plow,
And laurels miss the soldier's brow.

Dear country home! Can I forget
The least of thy sweet trifles?
The window vines, which clamber yet,
Whose blooms the bee still rifles?
The roadside blackberries, growing ripe,
And in the woods the Indian-pipe?

Happy the man who tills the field,
Content with rustic labor;
Earth does to him her fullness yield
Hap' what may to his neighbor.
Well days, sound nights—O, can there be
A life more rational and free?

Dear country life of child and man!
For both the best, the strongest,
That with the earliest race began,
And has outlived the longest.
Their cities perished long ago;
Who the first farmers were we know.

Perhaps our Babies, too, will fall;
If so, no lamentations,
For Mother Earth will shelter all,
And feed the unborn nations;
Yes, and the swords that menace now
Will then be beaten by the plow.

THE FLOWER MISSION.

BY REV. J. F. AVERY, EDITOR OF BUDS AND BLOSSOMS.

I believe flowers have a mission and speak a language for Him who said, "I am the Rose of Sharon, and the Lilly of the Valley." Deep rooted in human nature lies a love for flowers; over hard, as well as tender hearts they exert a charm. The poor and unhappy seem to turn naturally to flowers. It has been written that the great Napoleon on St. Helena was often seen industriously tending his flowers, turning up the soil and wielding his watering-pot. Imagine the man who played such havoc amongst the thrones and dynasties of Europe thus engaged, passing the hours of life away, and doubtless, a little cheating melancholy and despair by ministering to flowers; and, may we not hope, soothed and softened thereby. Certainly the influence of flowers is wonderful. The poetess, Mary Howitt, sweetly wrote of the use of flowers:

"God might have made the earth bring forth
Enough for great and small,
The oak tree and the cedar tree
Without a flower at all.

Then wherefore, wherefore, were they made,
And dyed with rainbow light,
All fashioned with supremest grace,
Upspringing day and night?

To comfort man—to whisper hope
Whene'er his faith is dim;
For who so careth for the flowers
Will much more care for him!"

Myriads of flowers in the profusion of nature bloom as if to show the desire of God to make the world beautiful.

But when you know flowers are so eagerly sought after by the sick and suffering, would it not be cruel, if for lack of sympathy and energy on your part, you allowed the flowers within your reach to bloom and blush unseen and waste their sweetness, when in the hospital or poorhouse ward they would minister so much sweetness and comfort?

A few days since some one told me of a sick lady in the hospital and asked me to visit her. I did so and took her a bunch of flowers from my garden. I had some other delicacies, but she put them aside and seizing the flowers she said, "I care more for these than anything else." Then turning to the nurse said, "If I die you must put them into my coffin." Within a few hours she passed away.

Who will aid the workers in this service for Christ?

Recently under the leadership of Miss Barss, in Wolfville, a number of young ladies have formed themselves into a "Floral Band" to write texts, cultivate and collect flowers for the Tabernacle Mission.

Let us remember—

Each little flower which thus we send will meet some sufferer's eye,
Reminding him that winter's past and brighter days are nigh.
Each of our friends who plucked a flower, for one in pain to see,
Can listen to a voice which says, "You plucked that flower for me."

COLLEGE ELECTIVE STUDIES.

Dr. MacCracken, vice-chancellor of the University of the City of New York, has recently delivered a strong address on electives in colleges. He makes a distinction not only between the college and the academy or high school, but also between the college and the university, treating the academy as preparatory to the college, and the college as preparatory to the university. "The college is a school that teaches something about everything; the university is a collection of schools, each of which teaches everything about something."

The speaker criticises Harvard for making specialists of boys of seventeen or eighteen years of age, by putting the freshman or sophomore into some "ology" or "ism" before he knows for what field of learning his mind is adapted. He criticises Dr. Patton, also, for advocating the beginning of one's special or university work in the junior year of the college. Dr. Patton gives three reasons,—life is too short, money not sufficiently abundant, and the university that should require graduation at college as a condition of admission would have few students.

Dr. MacCracken disposes of these three arguments by citing Johns Hopkins, the only institution in the country whose principal department is a university proper as above described. Johns Hopkins, last year, enrolled one hundred and seventy-four graduates, representing ninety-seven colleges. The Doctor maintains that it is better for America to have one such university, with one hundred and seventy-four students, all past the degree of bachelor, than to have a score of universities offering cheap courses to the injury of the prime object of the college. Also, that the degree of Bachelor of Arts should be reserved for the classical student, and that of Bachelor of Philosophy, or of Bachelor of Science, be given to those who take modern languages without the ancient.

We think that some prominent institutions of learning are making a mistake in rushing from the old, close-drawn requirements of the curriculum to the opposite extreme, and in granting absolute freedom in the choice of studies to young men who know not what is best for them, or knowing, choose those studies that will be easiest and most suited to their taste. There is not one college student in ten, during the first two years of college work who knows for what line of thought or study he is best fitted, and there is not one student in ten who will not select an easy course instead of a hard one, when he receives the same credit therefor.

The cry for the practical, i. e., the immediately practical, and the quickest way to acquire an education, and the cheapest and shortest courses may just now be in the ascendant, but we believe that this sentiment is only a passing wave which will disappear in a few years, leaving, to be sure, a trace of good, and having accomplished its purpose—to add a new element, a new thought to the many-sided and perplexing question of a true education.—Academy News.

THE COPENHAGEN WAY.

Copenhagen has a different way of dealing with a great scandal from that employed by the Londoners. Not long ago three conservative journals in the Denmark metropolis published exposures very much like those recently published by the Pall Mall Gazette in London. The Copenhagen scandal involved many of the most prominent men in Denmark, including a professor in the university, the president of a leading scientific society, one of the most eminent authors of the state, as well as a large number of wealthy merchants and even some members of the magistracy. The practices exposed were similar to those exposed in London.

But the people of Copenhagen did not stop to discuss the probable moral effect of the publication. The question with them was: Is the story true? The authorities at once instituted an investigation, and as fast as they obtained evidence against the culprits they arrested them. They seemed to think the crime lay more in the committing of the sin than in the exposure of it, and hence they pursued the sinners and not the journals that told the story of their sin. The result thus far has been the arrest of ten of the men and the suicide of two others who indulged in these sickening practices.

Perhaps London might learn a valuable lesson from the action of the Copenhagen people. Perhaps the best way to purify London society and to make such obnoxious exposures impossible in the future is to break up the practice by arresting the practicers, instead of speculating on the moral effect of exposures already made and impossible of withdrawal. —Daily News.

SOCIETIES AND FREEDOM.

[From the Philadelphia Public Ledger, July 18.]

Probably nowhere has the principle of association been so actively developed as in our own country. From the most important public measure, in which the national welfare is concerned, down to the relief of an oppressed animal, everything good and desirable is made the subject of organization. Societies of all kinds abound, especially in our cities, and very few men and women, or even children, can be found who are not enrolled in the ranks of some of them. Advancing intelligence has discovered the truth that associated action is more efficacious than any other; and as our people are more accustomed to personal responsibility, and more interested in whatever goes on around them, than the masses in other countries, it is not strange that they should also more eagerly embrace a method having such palpable advantages.

Yet as no good thing is without some drawbacks and dangers, so the prevalence of societies has at least one tendency which needs to be guarded against. They are liable to exert a coercive influence upon the minds of their respective members. If there is one thing above all others upon which we congratulate ourselves it is upon our liberty. Every one, we think, is free to come and go, to think and to act, to speak and to keep silence, at his own pleasure. Yet while it is true that no outward authority compels obedience it is also true that we are often held in another kind of bondage, more subtle but no less stringent. A party is formed, for example, to carry out certain political measures or to advance a needed reform, or to execute some charitable work, or to uphold certain principles. The object in view is good, and those who have it at heart eagerly rally around the standard erected. So far all is well. Combination effects results that individual efforts could not compass, and the work goes on satisfactorily. By and by, however, the association grows larger and side issues begin to creep in. Where there was at first a single worthy object actuating all the members, there comes to be a complicated network of interested ends sought, more or less irrelevant to the main purpose. Leaders spring up, strong and determined, who give a different tone to the society and adopt different measures from any that were at first contemplated. Then begins a silent and, perhaps, unconscious tyranny over such of the members as do not heartily endorse every proposed measure. They are made to feel that, instead of helping the cause, they are hindering it by their opposition or delaying it by their hesitancy. If they utter their honest convictions, if they decline to support men whom they do not approve, or to adopt measures they consider unjustifiable, they are either openly denounced as traitors to the cause they had espoused, or silently ignored and left out in the management of the society. In either case individual freedom is assailed, dissenting opinion silenced, and those who hold it either retire altogether from a sphere where they can no longer act conscientiously, or remaining in it they sink their individuality, stifle their convictions, and suffer themselves to drift wherever the tide of popular opinion may carry them.

This is, however, by no means a necessary result of organization, neither is it always an actual sequel. All honor to those societies, formed for whatever good object, which have kept themselves pure from the taint of oppression, and single to their proper cause. Yet nearly every one's experience will testify that such is the tendency of associations, and a tendency too seldom resisted. Indeed it is chiefly on account of the value of these combinations, and the worthy objects for which they were established, that adverse criticism of them is so rare. To attack their evils seems like attacking them, a thing which no one wishes to do, or to be suspected of doing; consequently they remain to a large extent unexamined and uncorrected.

This coercive influence is not only injurious to the individual character, but even more so to the societies and the work they undertake. There is nothing of which they stand more in need than fresh and vital thought, honestly and earnestly expressed. It is like the pure air, which, coming in freely through our windows, purifies and sweetens our dwellings. When honest opposition is silenced or oppressed the society becomes either narrow and dogmatic or extravagant and wild, according to the character of those who have assumed its leadership. Many a society has shrunk into insignificance; many a one has wasted away in wild vagaries; many a good work commenced has been abandoned and come to nought simply because the honest convictions and wise suggestions of some of the most valuable members have been repulsed and denied utterance.

An ounce of cheerfulness is worth a pound of sadness to serve God with.

ONE POOR STONE.

Two masons were working together on the rear wall of a church, when one stopped the other just as he was putting a stone in its place.

"Don't put in that stone," he said, "it's flaky, and will soon fall to pieces."

"I know it isn't a very good one, but it is so handy and just fits here. Nobody will see it up here, and it is too much trouble to get another."

"Don't put it in. Take time to send for another. That stone won't stand the weather, and when it falls the whole building will be damaged."

"I guess not. It won't hurt us; so here goes."

"So he lifted the stone into its place, poor and loose-grained and flaky as it was, covered it with mortar, and went on with his work. Nobody could see the stone, and none knew of its worthlessness but the two masons, and the church was finished and accepted.

But time and the weather did their work, and soon it began to flake and crumble. Every rain storm and every hot, sultry day helped its decay, and it soon crumbled away. But that was not all nor the worst. The loss of the stone weakened the wall, and soon a great beam which it should have supported, sunk into the cavity, a crack appeared in the roof and the rain soon made sad havoc with ceiling and fresco. So a new roof and ceiling and extensive repairs were the result of one poor stone put where a good one should have been placed.

Each one of us, young or old; is building a structure for himself. The structure is our own pure character, and every act of our lives is a stone in the building. Don't work in poor stones. Every mean action, every wrong act or impure word, will show itself in your after life, though it may pass unnoticed at first. Let every act and word of every day be pure and right, and your character will stand the test of any time—a beautiful edifice, enduring to your praise and honor.—Sel.

NEAREST WAY TO HEAVEN.

When Mr. Whitefield was preaching in New England, a lady became the subject of divine grace, and her spirit was particularly drawn out in prayer for others. She could persuade no one to pray with her but her little daughter, about ten years of age. After a time it pleased God to touch the heart of the little child and give her the hope of salvation. In a transport of joy she then exclaimed: "Oh, Mother, if all the world knew this! I wish I could tell everybody. Pray mother, let me run to someone of the neighbors and tell them that they may be happy and love the Saviour." "Ah, my child," said the mother, "that would be useless, for I suppose that were you to tell your experience, there is not one in many miles who would not laugh at you and say it was all a delusion." "Oh, mother," replied the little girl, "I must go over to the shoemaker's and tell him; he will believe me." She ran over and found him at work in the shop. She began telling him he must die, that he was a sinner, and she was a sinner, but that her Saviour had heard her mother's prayer and forgiven all her sins, and that now she was so happy she did not know how to tell it. The shoemaker was struck with surprise, and his tears flowed like rain. He threw aside his work, and by prayer and supplication sought mercy and life. The neighborhood was awakened, and within a few months more than fifty persons were brought to the knowledge of Jesus and rejoiced in his power and grace.—New York Observer.

MY BOY, DO YOU SMOKE?

The United States Navy annually takes into its service a large number of apprentice boys, who are sent all over the world and taught to be thorough sailors. It has been the policy of the government since the war to educate the "blue jacket," upon the principle that the more intelligent a man is, the better sailor he is likely to become. There is no lack of candidates for these positions. Hundreds of boys apply, but many are rejected because they cannot pass the physical examination. Major Houston, one of the Marine Corps who is in charge of the Washington Navy Yard barracks, is the authority for the statement that one-fifth of all the boys examined are rejected on account of heart disease.

His first question to a boy who desires to enlist is: "Do you smoke?" The invariable response is, "No sir," but the tell-tale discoloration of the fingers at once shows the truth. The surgeons say that cigarette smoking by boys produces heart disease, and that in ninety-nine cases in a hundred the rejection of would-be apprentices on account of this defect comes from excessive use of the milder form of this weed. This is a remarkable statement, coming, as it does, from so high an authority and based upon the results of actual examinations going on day after day, month after month. It should be a warning to parents that the deadly cigarette is sure to bring about incalculable injury to the young. A law passed restricting its use to the dudes would not, perhaps, bring popular disfavor, because it might reduce the number of these objects about our streets, but boys indulging in the cigarette ought to be treated to liberal doses of "rod in pickle" until the habit is thoroughly eradicated.—Scientific American.

HOW WOOD PAPER IS MADE.

At Mapleton, Pa., there is a mill where paper is made from wood, and in this mill there is a machine resembling in appearance a large cheese box, about six feet in diameter, standing on its edge. In this cheese box there revolves, at an enormous speed, a strong iron disk, armed with a great number of sharp steel knives, which cuts up the wood into shavings similar to those made by a draw knife. While we were looking at this machine an attendant picked up a heavy stick of cord wood, which he placed in an inclined trough by the side of the machine, and shoved it into the same. In a twinkling the log had disappeared, and a second was sent after it, quickly followed by a third. Although it may seem incredible, that machine reduced those heavy 4-foot sticks to shavings at the rate of three a minute?

These shavings are carried off by a conveyor to the "boiling room," where they are boiled for several hours in caustic soda—"soda lye"—which combines with all the resinous matters in the wood, and reduces it to a mere fibrous pulp. This pulp is next run into the "washing machines," which are oval tubs about fifteen feet long and six or eight feet wide, having a longitudinal partition in the middle, extending nearly the entire length of the vat. In one of the compartments thus formed there is a "beater," composed of a number of steel blades with rounded edges, which revolve at a high rate of speed between stationary blades in the bed plate below. In the other compartment there is a "washer," which consists of an octahedral frame covered with very fine wire gauze, and inclosing a sort of water-wheel. The water runs in the opposite direction to the beater, but very slowly, and the result is a constant current of pulp up one side of the machine and down the other. A stream of water is constantly flowing into the machine, and the water in the washer is as constantly scooping it up and emptying it through its hollow shaft. The beater forces all the dirt and foreign matter out of the pulp, and the washer removes the dirty water, so that the fiber becomes thoroughly cleansed. It is now removed to another machine similar to the first, where it is bleached by means of chloride of lime and muriatic acid. The washer is dispensed with during the bleaching. After the bleaching comes another washing, to remove the chemicals from the fibers, and the pulp, thoroughly softened and mixed with the water, is drawn off into storage tanks, whence it is pumped into the paper machines. At one end of the latter is a box into which the pulp is pumped from the tanks. This box has a fine horizontal slit, from which the pulp flows in a steady stream on to an endless wire gauze apron, about six feet wide, which is constantly running away from the box. The rolls over which this apron runs have an "end shake" similar to that of a grain separator. The apron runs over a copper "suction-box" having numerous holes in the top, from which the air and water are being constantly exhausted. The effect of the suction box is to remove most of the remaining water from the pulp, which by this time resembles a wet sheet of paper. The damp sheet is now taken up by a felt blanket and carried over steam heated drums. By this time the paper is strong and dry enough to support itself, so it leaves the felt and passes unaided between the highly polished calender rolls, which smooth it and give it a hard surface. It is now rolled up ready to be removed to the cutting machine, where revolving knives reduce it to sheets, which are piled, sorted, and counted ready for shipment.

If a fine paper is desired, the roll in place of being cut up into sheets is reground in a "rag engine" similar to washing machines, still further washed and bleached and sent through another "Fourdrinier machine," whence it issues as pure white finished paper. The "size" which gives paper its glossy finish is introduced into the pulp while it is in the last washing machine. At the West Newton paper mills rolls of paper four miles long are regularly made, and rolls nine miles long have been made from reground wood paper.—Paper and Press.

TEMPERANCE.

THE UNCLEANNESS OF TOBACCO HABITS.

REV. A SIMS.

Neither is filthiness of the flesh condemned only by the Christian; for Mohammed, in harmony with Bible sentiments, anathematises impurity; and in his fifth commandment says: "KEEP THY BODY CLEAN."

"There are but three kinds of animals which generally use tobacco. The Rock Goat of Africa—whose stench is so unsufferable, that no other animal can approach it; the tobacco Worm, whose intolerable visage gives to every beholder an involuntary shudder; and one other nondescript animal, whose tobacco frothing and spittings defile his own visage, bespatter and bedaub everything within his reach; who besmudges and pollutes the atmosphere with his nauseous fumigations, and whose Stygian breath seems to denote approximation to some bottomless pit."—Dr. Coles.

Dr. Welsh of Yale College says:—"The tobacco user is giving forth pestilential vapors from all the pores of his skin; he is the embodiment of perpetual miasma—a walking distillery of deadly essence."

In 1492, as Columbus lay with his ships side by side at the Island of Cuba, he sent two men, a "Caleb and Joshua," to search the land, and report what they might see. On their return, among other things, they said they saw "the naked savages twist large leaves together, light one end at the fire, and smoke like devils!" Smokers should bear in mind their pedigree! Barbarous! Sensual! Devilish!

"In the house of God, where of all other places, deacency and cleanliness should be observed, it is appalling to notice the repulsive and abominably filthy state of many of the pews; rendered so by the spitting habits of those who smoke or chew tobacco. Churches are most scandalously used by the tobacco chewers who frequent them; and kneeling before the Great Jehovah, which is so becoming when sinners approach their Maker in prayer, is rendered impossible in many seats for ladies, because of the large quantity of tobacco saliva which is ejected in all directions."—Dr. A. Clarke.

A snuff taker, of twenty-eight years' standing, determined to give up the habit, after reading the following sentence: "Next to dying an unpardonable transgressor, I should shrink from the idea of being laid in my coffin with my nostrils charged with snuff."

"Oh, how terrible for a minister—or indeed any one professing religion—to use as a luxury a drug so terribly poisonous, and so awfully filthy! If his cat should do the same thing, he would kill the unclean animal. Man is intolerant of such filth in anything but himself. Then how can his Maker tolerate it in him?"—Culver.

Dr. Buell relates the following:

"An old man related to me, that he was engaged in the backwoods of Canada; and by some chance he lost his way; and his provisions became exhausted; when he fortunately encountered three Indians, who were engaged in hunting. He solicited some provisions from them, but he was informed that they had none. He then begged for some tobacco; and there was only one solitary quid in the company, and that was half masticated; but with true generosity, the Indian took it from his mouth, divided it, and presented him with one-half. He accepted it, and declared it was the sweetest morsel he ever enjoyed."

"Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh, and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."—1 Cor. 7: 1.

"If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, whose temple ye are."—1 Cor. 3: 17.

There are expected to be more of the great leaders of the Temperance Reform present next week at Lake Bluff than at any other meeting this summer, and the utterances will be the authentic expression of the temperance agitators. If one would know what Prohibitionists want and why they want it, let him attend the National Prohibition Conference on the 27th and 28th. The Woman's Training School has a conference on the 21st and 22d. There are also scientfic lectures and lectures by Southern as well as Northern people. It will be a great national occasion.

The Baptist Total Abstinence association of England numbers in its ranks 1,171 ministers, 2,688 church officers, and 212 students, making a total of 4,071, having an increase of 355 over last year.

WHEATON THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.

This young institution, so often and so kindly referred to in the columns of the Christian Cynosure, is located at Wheaton, Ill., near Chicago, and occupies suitable and pleasant rooms in Wheaton College building. By an arrangement made in June, 1881, the Theological Seminary is free to all students of the College, and the College studies are free to all members of the Theological Seminary.

Numbers of the College studies are nearly indispensible to a student who is to enter the world's great arena for action, and in a few years to pass from the labors of earth to the accounts of the great judgment day.

Wheaton is a very moral place. The College rules are very strictly and wisely enforced in regard to all deportment and worship, and against all immorality, profanity, obscenity, smoking and unmanly conduct.

The Theological Seminary holds to evangelical doctrines and methods, and urges its students to the highest known positions on all moral and spiritual questions, and to the most active service for the Master. The Wesleyan Methodist people, who have founded and given the main support to this institution can be contented with nothing short of a living, throbbing, animated, theological belief, and reformatory principles which make men alive from the dead, and not mummies of an ancient and unknown antiquity.

The institution has a theological course, similar to, and we hope better than is frequent in schools of the kind. Every student has all the special and personal drill he can perform, and that which applies directly in the line of his course as a living Christian, and an active laborer in the work of the ministry.

The next year opens October 6th, and closes May 28th, being three terms of thirty-two weeks, divided by two vacations of ten days each. During the year there are often vacant churches which young men can supply with preaching, especially in their third years, while missionary and hand-to-hand work with the influential and unsaved, is very abundant and inviting. All the advantages of the College, with its classes of instruction, its library, its religious and literary exercises, its lectures, and frequent important and instructive gatherings are laid at our feet without money or price. Young men, come and freely occupy, and take the advance position in the work of the Lord which your Maker intended you to hold and sustain.

Board is cheap; self-board is common and cheaper, and the gains to be made are worthy the asceticism of a Culdee's cell, if you can only get them. But if you want always to be toddled and toasted and teased to advance; tossed in a blanket, rolled in a sedan, or rocked in a gondola, it is not likely that you better trouble yourself about the resolute Puritanism of this place. It would, however, mislead, did I not say this is one of the most cheerful, obliging, and peaceable communities and schools on earth. Correspondence is invited.

THE CHURCHES.

—It is reported that Rev. C. J. Kephart, late president of Avalon College, Missouri, has deen elected to the chair of mathematics in Western College, at Toledo, Iowa, and has accepted the position. His health is much improved and he will enter upon his new field of work with the opening of the fall term, September 9th. Prof. Kephart graduated at Western College some ten years ago.

—Rev. G. Peters, the faithful and successful pastor of the Swedish church at Rockford, Ill., in which the late Augustana Synod was held, is spoken of as superintendent of missions in the Illinois Conference of the Synod.

—The number of communicant members in the Augustana Synod by the latest statistics is 55,990. They are divided as follows: Illinois Conference, 18,112; Minnesota, 18,549; Iowa, 6,318; Kansas and Nebraska, 6,619; New York, 5,956; and the West Coast District, 437. The population in the churches is considerably more than 100,000. The synod numbers 212 ministers and 443 churches, with material for as many more.

—George Muller has received $5,063,850 since March, 1834, for his orphan asylum and other religious work.

—G. H. Gregorian, an Armenian student of Wheaton College and Union Park Seminary, Chicago, is supplying the the churches of Liber and Westchester, Ind., for a few weeks.

—At Vienna, last year, it is said, no less than two hundred and sixty-three Jews become Christians—among whom were thirteen barristers, nine physicians, four journalists, three professors, three judges, seventeen merchants and manufacturers.

—By careful investigation it has been ascertained that, in the various churches and mission halls of London, there is accommodation for 1,388,792, or 34.55 per cent of the population. The Church of England provides 677,645 sittings, and the Free churches 711,147.

—A converted Hindu minister, with his congregation, has been building a church at Simla, the corner-stone having been laid last year by Lady Atchinson, wife of the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjaub, in the presence of a large number of influential Europeans. This native preacher has won the respect, not only of Europeans, but of Hindu and Mohammedan princes and nobles.

—The Indian school at Rancho Chico was organized in 1875, by Mrs. General John Bidwell, of Chico, and, excepting necessary intermissions, has continued till this time. Gen. Bidwell built a chapel within his own grounds, and Mrs. Bidwell has taught these Indians much of the time. Now, that her health has partially failed, the school has been transferred to the Board of Foreign Missions, and $25 per month has been pledged for its support.

—Missions by the London Missionary Society were commenced in the Samoan Islands, Polynesia, in 1836. The society has now on eight of the islands, nine male and seven female missionaries, and 184 native pastors and teachers. These islands, sixteen in number, have a population of 10,000, with 2,461 church-members, and 2,461 children in schools. The people, besides paying for the salaries of their teachers, either in money or produce, contributed last year, £308 to the London Missionary Society.

—The missionary work of the world now includes 100 societies—fifty American and fifty European—which report an income of $9,723,850, of which $4,420,613 came from America, $6,203,237, from Europe. The American societies report 675 ordained missionaries, 129 lay missionaries, 1,133 female missionaries, 1,102 ordained native preachers, 10,936 other native helpers, 248,070 communicants in churches. In connection with the European societies there are 1,780 ordained missionaries, 549 lay missionaries, 1,030 women missionaries, 1,241 ordained native preachers, 15,420 other native helpers, and 276,715 communicants in churches. The total Protestent missionary work of the world has, therefore, 2,755 ordained missionaries, 2,162 women, 2,243 ordained native helpers, and 644,784 communicants in churches. These totals show a gain over the preceding year of $656,350 in income, 25 ordained missionaries, 70 lay missionaries, 140 women, 133 ordained natives, 3,637 native helpers, and 26,137 communicants.—Chr. World.

—The Year Book of the Young Men's Christian Associations, for 1885, together with the official report of the International Convention held in Atlanta, last May, has just been published. The proceedings of the Convention, including the addresses and papers delivered there are given in full; also complete reports from the nine hundred American Associations, and lists and reports of the two thousand Associations in Europe and other parts of the Old World. There are now in all 2,931 of these societies. Eighty-two of the American Associations own the buildings they occupy, which are valued at over three and a half millions of dollars. Add to this the other real estate, and the total property is $4,353,090. Three hundred and seventeen report libraries valued at $265,703. There are 994 Bible-classes and Gospel meetings for young men only, with a total average attendance of 15,690, and hundreds of educational classes, lectures, literary societies, and reading rooms are reported. Nearly four hundrd men are at work as general secretaries and other paid officers of local associations, and State and International Committees. Associations are reported to exist in 190 colleges; and sixty-nine railroad branches, twelve German branches, and thirty-four colored associations send in reports. A comparison of the summeries for several years past shows a gratifying and steady increase.

—The fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the Congregational church at Batavia, Ill., was celebrated August 8th and 9th. Rev. William Coffin delivered a grand historical address, which is to be published. This church was organized by Rev. Messrs. Gridley and N. C. Clark, in a log house four miles east of Fox river. Three of the fourteen original members were present, one coming from Nebraska to be there. At first this was called the church of Big and Little Woods; its territory extending along Fox river from St. Charles (then Charleston) to Aurora. There was in fact no church to the north; none to the west nearer than Galena, or to the south nearer than Ottawa. In 1840, Batavia was made the church center, and that year the first house of worship was begun. The present house was built in 1855. The church has had fifteen pastors and 569 members. It has been outspoken in its testimony against slavery and intemperance, and some of its members have also toward the lodge,—an example the whole body might well follow.

CONVENTION OF CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

Mr. Moody's convention of Christian Workers at the seminary at Northfield, Mass., which began on Wednesday, Aug. 5, and closed on Friday, Aug. 15, says a correspondent of the Advance, has been successful beyond the sanguine expectations of Mr. Moody and those associated with him.

Mr. Moody has, of course, been the directing force in these meetings, and has conducted the morning and afternoon services, but has made only two or three addresses. The leaders of the Young Men's Christian Association have been present in force, and have helped a great deal in the details of the arrangements. Among the most active have been Richard C. Morse, General Secretary; L. D. Wishard, General College Scretary; C. K. Ober, Secretary, and Joseph Hardie and H. M. Moore, members of the International Committee. Count von Pœckler, who represents the Berlin Association, and was present as a delegate at Atlanta, has been a delighted listener. Rev. Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, Rev. Dr. Pierson, of Philadelphia, Rev. George Needham, Rev. George F. Pentecost and Rev. Dr. Erdman, of Jamestown, N. Y., have been the speakers most prominent in the meetings, and their addresses, Scriptural expositions, and answers to questions have been very helpful. In the service of song, Mr. Sankey, whose voice seems more effective than ever, Prof. Downer and his wife, and E. J. Parker, a singing evangelist from England, and a graduate of Spurgeon's College, have led. Mr. J. E. K. Studd, of London, whose wife, a daughter of Lady Beauchamp, was one of Mr. Sankey's most valued helpers in the London meetings, conducted the services of the tent on Sunday evening. The program has been varied from day to day, but the usual order has been an address or sermon in the morning, a question-box service in the afternoon, and a meeting of praise and experience in the evening.

The key-note of the Convention was struck at the opening session in the sermon by Dr. Pierson, of Philadelphia, on "Being filled with the Spirit." At the forenoon meeting of the second day there was a Bible-reading, led by Mr. Moody, with the Word of God as the topic, and the theme was carried into afternoon meeting, at which many speakers gave briefly their idea as to methods of Bible study.

Doctrinal questions and answers occupied the morning of Monday, and missionary methods and results were discussed and described in the afternoon and evening, separate meetings for men and women being held in the evening, at which several missionaries gave thrilling accounts of their work among the heathen. The missionary enthusiasm of this day found expression in the following resolution, which was adopted unanimously:

Resolved, As those gathered in the presence of Almighty God this 11th day of August, 1885, that this conference appoint a committee of seven to prepare and issue a circular letter addressed to Christian disciples of every name, calling them to united prayer for a mighty effusion of the Spirit on all ministers, missionaries, evangelists, Christian teachers and workers, and suggesting that, at some great world-center at an early date, a world-counsel be called with reference to the immediate distribution, occupation and speedy evangelization of all districts of the earth now destitute of the Gospel.

The committee on this proposed missionary council was constituted of Rev. Dr. Pierson, of Philadelphia, chairman, Rev. Dr. Gordon, of Boston, L. W. Munhall, of Indianapolis, Rev. George F. Pentecost, of Brooklyn, J. E. K. Studd, of London, Rev. Wm. Ashmore, of China, and Miss A. Dryer, of Chicago.

On Tuesday, Dr. Gordon preached in the morning upon the Holy Spirit, and in the afternoon Mr. Moody repeated his familiar talk upon the same subject. Wednesday morning the subject of Sanctification was discussed; in the afternoon Sunday-school methods were considered; and in the evening John B. Gough made one of his stirring and inimitable temperance addresses. Mr. Gough is now well advanced in years and, as he himself feels, near the end of his work. The heat and exertion of speaking on Wednesday were too much for him, and he was a good deal prostrated in consequence. On Thursday the Second Coming of Christ was the theme of the day, and pre-millennarian beliefs were earnestly presented by Rev. N. W. Clark and Drs. Gordon, Pierson and Pentecost.

FARM NOTES.

CHURNING CREAM OF FARROW COWS.

This is the season that brings numerous questions concerning the vexation of trying to change the cream of farrow cows to butter. Some have the single farrow cow, taking a week to get cream enough to churn, and as one says, taking another week to churn it; others have to make this attempt to find butter every two or three days and their afflictions are beyond endurance. Now, there is an easy escape from all these trials with farrow cows. Heat the milk before setting to 130 deg. Fahrenheit. This will cause the cream to rise more completely, and when properly ripened it will churn in from 15 to thirty minutes. It often happens that those who are making winter butter have a part of their cows fresh and the others long in milk. In such a case the milk from cows long in will not churn as soon as that from those nearly fresh, and it will not be proper either to mix the milk or cream, for the cream from the fresh cows will churn in less than half the time of the other. But heating the milk of those cows long in, before setting, will cause the cream to churn with that from the fresh cows. This is a matter of much importance, as in many cases the milk of the different cows is mixed, and in that case the cream does not much more than half rise in the old milk, and what does rise will not churn in the same time, and this causes nearly a complete loss of the butter from the cows long in milk. The best way to heat milk is to have two pans, one larger than the other. Set the largest on the stove, with two inches of water in it, and lay two pieces of iron a half inch thick across the bottom. Put the milk to be heated in the other pan and drop that inside the larger one. The milk will then be heated with hot water in the larger pan and cannot be injured by burning. The degree of heat should be tested with a thermometer, because it will then be heated uniformly.—Live Stock Journal.

Lima beans, gathered and dried when still green, are much better for winter use than those that are allowed to ripen. They should be picked when nearly full grown, shelled and placed on paper or cloth in a dry, airy room, but not where the direct rays of the midday sun can reach them. They will soon be dry enough to put away for winter.

Prof. L. A. Arnold says: "The fleshy part of apples is made up mostly of a liquid contained in cells whose walls are exceedingly thin and delicate. It is of the utmost importance that the harvesting be done so carefully that the cells are not ruptured and the juice exposed to the air to induce fermentation.

There seems to be just such a time in the growth of a plant when, if it be cut down, that is, the top to be removed from the roots, it will perish. To destroy a growth of Canada thistles some say the land must be ploughed five or six times during the season, but I have seen a dense growth of these as high as a man's head destroyed, so that there is not one to be seen on the land to-day, by simply having been cut down once; this was at just the time they were coming into blossom.

Perhaps for general purposes the Holsteins are superior to any other breed of cattle we have. No animal possesses all the qualities requisite, but predominate in certain particulars. The Holsteins are the best of all for milking purposes, as they give the largest yields, and the oxen of this breed are active, strong and intelligent. When the steers are fatted for beef it requires a good shorthorn to be better, and for easy keeping they are unrivalled.

N. J. Shepherd says in Seed-Time and Harvest that he has always found it profitable to harvest onions and potatoes as soon as they are fully ripe. Onions require a cool, dry place, and plenty of ventilation, and when this is secured there is little danger of their rotting. Both onions and potatoes should be thoroughly dried before storing.

KANSAS STATE MEETING.

The annual State Christian Association for Kansas will convene, D. V., at Willis, Brown county, Kansas, twenty-five miles from Atchison on the Missouri Pacific, in the Wesleyan Methodist church, September 1, 1885. In view of the great work we are engaged in as reformers in defense of truth and against error—the anti-Christ—let every true Christian and lover of truth be present to help and encourage this much needed reform in Kansas.

We expect Rev. J. P. Stoddard, Secretary of the N. C. A.; Pres, C. A. Blanchard, of Wheaton; Rev. J. S. T. Milligan; Rev. B. F. Worrell, and other able speakers to adddress the convention.

Ample provisions will be made for all who attend. We cordially invite the cooperation of all in this effort to bring before the people "wiles" which threaten the peace and well-being of our civil and religious institutions, and to secure under the blessing of God the glorious remedy provided through our Lord Jesus Christ in the Gospel.

The convention will commence at 2 P. M. Tuesday, September 1. Let there be a grand rally! Address letters to Rev. G. H. Heminway, Willis, Kan.

A Wonderful Woman, A Wonderful Life, AND A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Elizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

IN BRIEF

A story worth telling of the late Prof. Chas. O. Thompson illustrates both his quickness of thought and marvelous memory. One morning some waggish Worcester students replaced the large chapel Bible with Webster's dictionary, and the Professor, rising to officiate at prayers, read without an instant's hesitation a long psalm from the dictionary page, to the utter confounding of the conspiracy.—Boston Journal.

Every one who is worth his salt has his enemies who must be beaten, be they evil thoughts and evil habits in himself, or spiritual wickedness in high places, or Russians, or border-ruffians, or Bill, Tom or Harry, who will not let him live his life in quiet till he has thrashed them. —Thomas Hughes.

The bullying manner of the German students is proverbial, as is also their mania for dueling. It was at Heidelberg that a quiet citizen, leaving the cars, said to a swaggering student: "Sir, you are crowding me. Keep back, sir!" The student turned fiercely, and said in a loud tone: "Do you not like it? Well, sir, I am at your service whenever you please!" Oh, thank you!" said the traveler, "your offer is very kind, and you may carry my valise to the hotel for me." The student fled amid shouts of laughter.

What is to become of us? With the morphine habit making a host of liars; the quinine habit, a ghostly band of nerveless, would-be suicides; the tobacco habit giving us a tendency to cancer and what not; the whiskey habit taking people by crooked ways to early graves; the money habit filling the country with avaricious speculators, thieves and bank-robbers; the office-seeking habit turning honest people away from honest work to getting an office, it does seem we are generally in a bad way.—Columbia (S. C.) Register.

John G. Tygett, a wealthy farmer and blooded stockman living near Anna, Ill;, owned a fine bulldog, which went mad Tuesday and ran snapping and biting about the house, and dashing into a door yard encountered a bevy of little girls at play, and in an instant had bitten three of them upon the hands, face and limbs. They were all children of Tygett. The animal then made his way into an adjacent field, where he bit twenty or thirty head of thorough-bred cattle, finally escaping into the timber. A posse of men hunted the animal down and after a chase shot him dead, but not until after a hard fight in which he attempted to bite several of the farmers. A number of the cattle died in great agony of hydrophobia, and it is probable that all that were bitten will succumb. Tygett sent to Anna for a madstone. Thus far the children have not suffered. It is feared other dogs were bitten. Tygett loses $10,000 worth of cattle.

I know some good men, some of the best in the world, who will "confound" it, and even "dog-on" it, and in New England even a deacon has been known under a terrible strain, to "condemn" it. But as a rule, my boy don't do it. Don't swear. It is not an evidence of smartness or worldly wisdom. Any fool can swear. And a good many fools do it. Ah! if you could only gather up all the useless, uncalled-for, inaffective oaths that have dropped along the pathway of my life, I know it would remove stumbling blocks from many inexperienced feet, and my heart would be lighter by a ton than it is to-day. But, if you are going to be a fool just because other men have been, oh, my son, what a hopeless fool you will be!—R. J. Burdette.

THE BEREA EVANGELIST

AIMS TO ADVOCATE

CHRISTIANITY,

AND TO

Help Break Down Everything that Hinders Its Spread.

IT TEACHES that men need to be converted to a person—the personal Christ—and not simply to a system of truth; and that there must be implanted in them a divine life, as well as a correct belief.

THE EVANGELIST seeks to show that the DIVISION OF CHRISTIANS into parties—denominations—sects—is a great wrong, and a very serious obstacle to the advancement of the Redeemer's Kingdom, and it seeks to show Christians and Christian churches how they may be ONE IN CHRIST, in the "Apostle's fellowship," and to persuade and help them thus to unite.

THE EVANGELIST also opposes INTEMPERANCE, SECRET SOCIETIES, all WORLDLINESS, and the spirit of CASTE, and aims to "war a good warfare" against all wrong.

In thus opposing evil the EVANGELIST carefully endeavors to avoid harsh speaking, believing that it is as much duty to speak truth kindly as it is to speak it at all.

IN THE COILS;

— OR —

The Coming Conflict.

A NEW AND STRANGE STORY BASED ON STARTLING FACTS, VIVIDLY PORTRAYING A MYSTERIOUS AND DANGEROUS POWER AT WORK IN THE GOVERNMENT, THE CHURCH, AND THE HOME.

"All will agree that this is a powerfully written story."—Evangelist, (Chicago, Ills.)

"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D. D. in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia.)

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

"The book will create a sensation in Masonic circles, and evoke criticism of a most relentless character. The courage of the author in attacking such a rock-rooted bulwark as Freemasonry is something to admire, Fanatic though he be."—Nebraska Watchman.

"Light is needed on this subject and needed badly, and we welcome this contribution to the literature of anti-secretism, and cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers."—United Presbyterian, (Pittsburgh.)

"A charming work, fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin;' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the book, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.'"—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ills.)

Thick paper, beautifuly bound, 352 pages, sent to any address for $1.50. AGENTS WANTED.

BATAVIA CONVENTION PAMPHLET.

A Staggering Blow!

Such was to Freemasonry the great NATIONAL CONVENTION held in BATAVIA, N. Y., September, 1882. It gave the world

Thurlow Weed's Great Letter

On the abduction and murder of WILLIAM MORGAN in 1826, which has been the most widely published of any Anti-masonic document. The dedication of a noble granite monument to the memory of Morgan, and the able and eloquent addresses of the Convention make this a most valuable pampbiet.

SEE WHY.

It contains—
1. Portrait of Morgan.
2. Portrait of Thurlow Weed.
3. Fine picture of the Monument.
4. The great letter of Thurlow Weed and his affidavit—almost the last public act of his life.
5. Address by J. E. Roy, D.D.
6. The monument oration by Pres. C. A. Blanchard.
7. Addresses on "Christian Politics" by Pres. J. Blanchard, on the Character of Freemasonry by Prof. E. D. Bailey, on the "Freedmen and Secret Societies" by Rev. H. H. Hinman; and very interesting personal and historical reminisences.

The American Party.

FIRST NOMINATION for President at Oberlin, Ohio, May 23, 1872.
PLATFORM ADOPTED at Chicago, June 28, 1872.
NAME ADOPTED at Syracuse, N. Y., June 3, 1874.

PRESIDENTAL CANDIDATES:

1872—Charles Francis Adams and Joseph L. Barlow.
1876—James B. Walker and Donald Kirkpatrick.
1880—J. W. Phelps and Samuel C. Pomeroy.
1884—J. Blanchard and J. W. Conant nominated; the former withdrawing, Samuel C. Pomeroy was nominated. Both nominees withdrawing, the support of the party was generally given to John P. St. John and William Daniel, candidates of the Prohibition party.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That the Bible should be associated with hooks of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.

4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.

5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.

7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.

8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.

9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.

10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.

11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency

13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.

14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.

15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

A full illustrated ritual of the six degrees of the Council and Commandery, comprising the degrees of Royal Master, Select Master, Super-Excellent Master, Knight of the Red Cross, Knight Templar and Knight of Malta. A book of 341 pages. In cloth, $1.00; $8.50 per dozen. Paper covers, 50cts; $4.00 per dozen.

Grand Lodge Masonry. Its relation to civil government and the Christian religion. By Prest. J. Blanchard, at the Monmouth Convention. The un-Christian, anti-republican and despotic character of Freemasonry is proved from the highest Masonic authorities. 5 cents each; per dozen. 50 cents.

Judge Whitney's Defense before the GRAND LODGE OF ILLINOIS. Judge Daniel H Whitney was Master of the lodge when S. L. Keith, a member of his lodge, murdered Ellen Slade. Judge Whitney, by attempting to bring Keith to justice, brought on himself the vengeance of the lodge, but he boldly replied to the charges against him, and afterwards renounced Masonry. 15 cents each; per dozen. $1.25

Oaths and Penalties of Freemasonry, as proved in court in the New Berlin Trial. Also the letter of Hon. Richard Rush to the anti-Masonic committee of York County, Pa., May 4th, 1831. The New Berlin trials began in the attempt of Freemasons to prevent public initiations by seceding Masons. These trials were held at New Berlin, Chenango Co., N. Y., April 13 and 14th, 1831, and General Augustus C. Welsh, sheriff of the county, and other adhering Freemasons, swore to the truthful revelation of the oaths and penalties. 10 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

Stearns' Inquiry into the Nature and TENDENCY OF FREEMASONRY. With an Appendix treating on the truth of Morgan's Exposition and containing remarks on various points in the character of Masonry, and a Dialogue on the necessity of exposing the lodge. 338 pages: cloth, 60 cents each per dozen, $5.00. Paper covers, 40 cents each; per dozen, $4.00.

Masonic Oaths Null and Void; or, Freemasonry Self-Convicted. This is a book for the times. The design of the author is to refute the arguments of those who claim that the oaths of Freemasonry are binding upon those who take them. His arguments are conclusive, and the forcible manner in which they are put, being drawn from Scripture, makes them convincing. The minister or lecturer will find in this work a rich fund of arguments. 207 pp., postpaid.....40 cts.

Bernard's Appendix to Light on Masonry. Showing the character of the institution by its terrible oaths and penalties. Paper covers: 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Freemasonry Self-Condemned. By Rev J. W. Bain. A careful and logical statement of reasons why secret orders should not be fellowshiped by the Christian Church, and by the United Presbyterian church in particular. Paper covers: price 20 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Masonry a Work of Darkness, adverse to Christianity, and inimical to republican government. By Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong (Presbyterian), a seceding Mason of 21 degrees. This is a very telling work and no honest man who reads it will think of joining the lodge. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

The Mystic Tie, or Freemasonry a LEAGUE WITH THE DEVIL. This is an account of the church trial of Peter Cook and wife, of Elkhart, Indiana, for refusing to support a reverend Freemason; and their very able defense presented by Mrs. Lucia C. Cook, in which she clearly shows that Freemasonry is antagonistic to the Christian religion. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

Sermon on Masonry, by Rev. James Williams, Presiding Elder of Dakota District Northwestern Iowa Conference, M. E. Church—a seceding Master Mason. Published at the special request of nine clergymen of different denominations, and others. 10 cents each; per dozen, 75 cents.

Are Masonic Oaths Binding on one Initiate. By Rev. A. L. Post. Proof of the sinfulness of such oaths and the consequent duty of all who have taken them to openly repudiate them. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Freemasonry Contrary to the Christian Religion. A clear, cutting argument against the lodge, from a Christian standpoint 5 cents each; per dozen. 50 cents.

Thirteen Reasons why a Christian should not be a Freemason. By Rev. Robert Armstrong. The author states his reasons clearly and carefully, and any one of the thirteen reasons, if properly considered, will keep a Christian out of the lodge. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Oaths and Penalties of the 33 Degrees OF FREEMASONRY. To get these thirty-three degrees of Masonic bondage, the candidate takes half-a-million horrible oaths. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

ON ODDFELLOWSHIP.

Sermon on Odd-fellowship and Other Secret Societies, by Rev. J. Sarver, pastor Evangelical Lutheran church, Leechburg, Pa. This is a very clear argument against secretism of all forms and the duty to disfellowship Odd-fellows, Freemasons, Knights of Pythias and Grangers is clearly shown by their confessed character as found in their own publications. 10 cents each; per dozen. 75 cents

Odd-fellowship Judged by Its Own Utterances; Its Doctrine and Practice Examined in the Light of God's Word. By Rev. J. H. Brockman. NEWS OF THE WEEK.

COUNTRY.

Gov. Bullock of Georgia states in an interview that there is no negro problem in the South. The Southern people believe in equality, but also in separation. He thinks the negro laborers of the South and the white laborers of the North occupy relatively the same position, socially, in their respective localities.

The Ohio Democratic convention at Columbus Thursday nominated Judge Hoadly for Governor, who made a speech defining his course in office. President Cleveland's administration was strongly endorsed.

The Iowa Democratic State Convention on Wednesday nominated on the first formal ballot Hon. Charles E. Whiting, of Monona county, for Governor, and after a spirited debate on fusion, Hon. E. H. Gillette, Greenbacker, of Des Moines, was selected for Lieutenant Governor. The platform demands the repeal of the prohibitory liquor law and the fixing of license fee of $250, which may be increased to $1,000.

The New York Canal Conference, in session at Utica Wednesday elected Hon. Horatio Seymour as chairman. It was stated that that the Erie canal delivered at New York during the season of 1884, 37,501,424 bushels of grain, while the total receipts by all the railroads were 28,049,020 bushels, an excess in favor of the canal of 9,452,404 bushels.

There are 190 persons serving life sentences in the prisons of New York State, thirteen of whom are women, all for murder in different degrees.

From March 1 to date the total number of hogs packed in the West was 3,365,000, against 2,825,000 for the same time last year.

There was promulgated Monday at Moberly, Mo., where the Wabash railway has extensive shops, an official order from the general committee of the Knights of Labor directing all members of that organization employed on the Wabash system to quit work on Tuesday, August 18, and remain out until further orders.

Typhoid fever in almost epidemic form is reported at Mattoon, Ill., attributed to impure water and ice.

The train carrying the first installment of tea over the Northern Pacific road, which left Tacoma on the 8th, reached New York at noon Tuesday, making the run of 3,378 miles in eight days and four hours, the fastest time ever made by a freight train from ocean to ocean.

At a meeting of striking Polish, Hebrew and German tailors at New York Wednesday at which over 3,000 were present, it was stated that a number of men worked ten hours per day for six days and earned less than $4. The men demand $15 a week. All the leading cloak and clothing manufacturers are affected by the strike.

Fred A. Austin, one of the oldest conductors on the Chicago and Iowa road, died suddenly as his train pulled out of Aurora Wednesday evening, due to excitement occasioned by defending himself against assault by a drunken passenger.

Striking miners at Shenandoah, Pennsylvania, Tuesday attacked the Poles and Hungarians who were put to work in the mines, and a general fight ensued in which twenty persons were injured.

Three children of Emil Lirett of Little Caillon, Terrebonne Parish, La., were instantly killed, their mother fatally burned and the father and two other children seriously injured by the accidental explosion of gunpowder a few days ago.

While cars were ascending and descending the incline railroad at the Cabin Creek coal mines, near Charleston, W. Va., on Wednesday, a loaded car broke loose and collided with a car in which were Layton Oakford, President of the road, and three other persons, all of whom were killed.

A thunderstorm broke over Erie, Pa., Tuesday night and a bolt struck the electric light dynamo and plunged the business part of the town in darkness. A dwelling house was struck and its occupants were found unconscious in the debris. Barns with crops and horses were burned and orchards and vineyards demolished.

Eight men were out fishing in the Illinois river about three miles above Peoria Tuesday morning, when lightning struck the boat, instantly killing three of the party, Schofield, Murphy and one other.

David McMullen, a ranchman thirty miles from Pueblo, Col., who has 30,000 acres of government land enclosed, was shot Tuesday by a United States Marshal while resisting arrest for contempt of court in not removing the fences.

As the steamer S. M. Felton left her dock at Philadelphia Monday morning en route for Wilmington, Del., an explosion occurred which investigation proved was caused by dynamite. Sixteen persons were severely injured.

The Wisconsin insurance commissioner claims to have discovered evidence showing that about seventy-five insurance companies in that State are doing business in violation of the law, and estimates their collection the past year at $700,000. A large proportion of these are probably secret lodges.

The loss of Oberne, Hosick & Co., whose hide and wool house in this city was struck by lightning and partly burned Friday morning, is estimated at $150,000.

Chicago is becoming the great tea center of the continent. Within two months nearly 3,000,000 pounds have been received.

A fire, causing a loss of over $100,000, broke out on the steamer Colorado, lying off Plumb Beach, Long Island. The flames spread to the Minnesota, Susquehanna, Congress, South Carolina, Iowa, Lotta Grant, and Fairplay, all with the exception of the last two having formerly belonged to the United States navy, and they burned to the water's edge and sunk.

FOREIGN.

There were twenty-five deaths from cholera, at Marseilles, Thursday night. The St. Loup quarter is becoming the centre of the cholera epidemic. The situation is growing worse. Between 8 A. M. and 5 P. M. Friday, 100 deaths were reported, of which fifty were from cholera.

The excitement among the people of the Canary Islands, caused by a fear of cholera, amounts to a panic. They now refuse to let any person from Spain, land. They made an exception in favor of the new governor, and allowed him to come ashore, but received him with riotous demonstrations and threw stones at him.

Throughout Spain Thursday there were 5,104 new cases of cholera and 1,644 deaths. A quarantine has been established at Gibraltar. Two new cases of cholera are reported at Toulon.

Alarm over the spread of small-pox in Montreal continues. Thirty new cases were reported Thursday and sixteen additional cases Friday morning. Many of the French-Canadians have been vaccinated.

Russian troops are reported as having lately approached so near the Afghan forces that the latter stood to their arms. The fortifications of Herat are being steadily improved, under the supervision of British officers.

The Salvation Army in England is engaged in raising $100,000 to send fallen women to the United States and Canada, that they may reform and live respectably. The appeal for money is said to be meeting with much success.

Excitement in Spain over the seizure of the Caroline Islands by Germany increases rather than abates. It was feared the populace in Madrid would make a hostile demonstration against the German Embassy. Germany expresses a willingness to make examination into the merits of the case.

The German corvette Augusta, with a crew of 238 officers and sailors, was lost in a cyclone in the Red Sea.

Dispatches from London state that Lord Salisbury and M. de Giers have reached a definite agreement with regard to the Afghan frontier system.

THE TEMPERANCE CENTENNIAL which occurs this month celebrates the one hundredth anniversary of the publication of the celebrated essay "An Enquiry into the Effects of Ardent Spirits upon the Human Body and Mind" by Dr. Benjamin Rush. From that justly celebrated document we shall next week give a generous selection, and our first page will be handsomely adorned with a fine portrait of the author. The next number will also contain the conclusion of Miss Flagg's latest and best story, "BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS." Every friend of the Reform will find this a good number for canvassing. Make an effort to secure one new name before the week closes.

THE BIBLE BANISHED FROM THE COMMON SCHOOL.

FROM A LECTURE BEFORE THE DU PAGE COUNTY TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

It is a fundamental error when under pretence of suppressing sectarianism, men suppress religion itself. Satan has split the living "body of Christ," the church, into sects and is now seeking to murder it.

The bankrupt Archbishop Purcell, who swindled the Catholic people out of more than a million of money, commenced this onslaught on religion in the public schools of Cincinnati more than a quarter of a century ago. The plan and motive of this attack were apparent: to turn out religion and the Bible from the public schools, and having thus made them godless, denounce them and destroy our system of free schools by withdrawing the Catholic children, and then demand and obtain the lion's share of the school money for the sectarian uses of Romish priests. This wicked scheme has succeeded but in part. Some Catholic priests and multitudes of Catholic parents still support the American school system, and vote for retaining the Bible.

Every possible concession was made the Archbishop by the Cincinnati school board. They voted:

1. To request Purcell to point out obnoxious passages in the school books for expurgation.

2. That no pupil should be required to read Testament or Bible unless parents desired it. (Aug. 29, 1842.)

3. And in 1852 a rule was adopted that the Catholic Bible might be used if desired; and in the second district the Douay or Catholic Bible was used.

All these humble concessions went for nothing. Bishop Purcell prevailed; and in 1869 the Bible and all religious instruction was cast out of the common schools of Cincinnati. And our free school system would have been destroyed before this time had not multitudes of Catholic parents refused to withdraw their children. All the public schools in Europe continue to use the Bible, and all the schools in the United States do the same, except those from which it has been expelled by the influence of infidels and priests, to secure Catholic votes, and by a mistaken compliance on the part of patriotic Americans under the mistaken idea that the Bible is a sectarian book.

But how can the Bible be a sectarian book when every sect claims it as its standard? Christ condensed the whole Bible code into two propositions, supreme love to God, and equal love to man. Are these sectarian?

But they tell us, "The Bible is not needed; that morality did not come from the Bible." Indeed? Whence then did morality come? From the religion of Congo, Abyssinia or Hindostan?

The little child's idea of God is doubtless that of a father, mightier than the one on whose arm he leans, and receives law from his lips. He learns justice by yielding to brothers and sisters equality of rights; and there, too, and not from the civil law, he finds how liberty may consist with submission and government with love. If you drop the Bible all just ideas of the family drop with it; and how will you teach morality to a child in a harem or seraglio? No! We may as well shut out the light of the sun and hope to raise flowers by lamplight, as hope to draw from human reason that morality without which good government is impossible.

But why not yield the Bible to silence clamor? and allow our schools to be secularized, and trust for religious teaching to the family and the church? Because education without religion is worthless or worse than worthless. "Mere intellect," said Daniel Webster, "is nugatory, and may be cultivated to any extent without improving the understanding or purifying the heart?" Or, in the more graphic words of Mr. Rufus King, in the Cincinnati trial, "Why am I bound to pay taxes for teaching other people's children mere reading, writing and ciphering, when it only makes the little rascal of a boy twice as sharp as he was before, thrice the greater adapt in vice and villiany, while it gives me no protection for my throat?" It is on this clear and substantial ground the seventh article of the American platform rests:

"To cultivate the intellect without improving the morals, is to make men mere adepts and experts; therefore the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

The child conscious of his own thoughts, and observing the thoughts of others, comes to know himself surrounded by invisible thinking spirits, all whose faculties are finite. And these give him the Infinite Spirit—God: as sure and certain as material bodies give him the unseen, infinite space which bodies occupy. But this natural, rational conception of God was a moral blank to men till Christ taught us to fill that blank with the idea of a Father, and the name. So true is it that "No man knoweth the Father, but he to whom the Son reveals him." And life eternal is to know the Father and Jesus Christ.

This brings us to the most dire and terrible force which is pushing the Bible from our schools. It is the universal and everywhere increasing desire to get rid of Christ and the Scriptures which "testify" of him. The secret lodges which now cover and corrupt all lands, Christian and pagan, are the one grand final antagonism to Christ. While theologians deny him; while Romanism supereedes him by ceremonies, and science falsely so called by philosophy, the secret lodge system adopts the simple, fatal, effectual method of putting all religions, false and true upon a moral level; and treating all alike; as the Jewish priests made the multitude reject and revile Christ, by classing him with thieves.

In the sublime imagery of the Revelation, as time is drawing near its close, the prophet sees a star fall from heaven and the bottomless pit open and smoke ascending as of a great furnace, darkening the sun and air, and locusts and scorpions inhabiting the smoke and hiding in the darkness to strike men. Prophecy, like parables, is fulfilled by whatever fulfills it. "And the Scripture," saith Matthew Henry, "hath many fulfillings." Evil is bottomless: and error comes from its pit. And no pencilled cartoon and word painting could more accurately describe the lodge-locusts and scorpions of the present day than the picture in this ninth chapter of Revelation. They devour the substance of the laboring classes like locusts, and like scorpions they sting them. Their deism darkens the moral and religious heavens; "and they strike only those men who have not the seal of God in their foreheads." They are producing a universal moral and religious bewilderment; and churches, states and empires are being stunned and stupified by their effects. Let us pray that the teachers who are to guide our common schools may escape the contamination of this Christ-rejecting system and our land be healed of its leprosy.

OUR JOLLY PRESIDENT AND HIS COMPANIONS.

BY JOEL SWARTZ, D. D.

A correspondent of the New York World tells of his adventures in finding President Cleveland and his companions, Dr. Ward and Mr. Bacon, on their summering tour in the wilderness of the Adirondacks. Describing their pastimes in hunting, fishing, etc., he says:

On such nights as they are held in camp by rain or fatigue after a hard day's sport, the party spend the time until daylight in a game of euchre. One of the guides informed me that the President since he had been in camp had not averaged over three or four hours' sleep out of twenty-four. The principal liquid sustenance of the party consists of plenty of Apollinaris and some whisky. The whisky is obtained at the Prospect House and is abominably bad. It has the merit of strength, however. On the day I entered the camp the supply had been exhausted, and Dr. Ward asked my guide if he had brought a bottle along. Unfortunately we had left our almost empty flask some distance from the President's camp, and so were unable to accommodate them.

Some of the opposite party papers have been criticising the President's "absenteeism." I think, however, that few unpartisan people will begrudge the hard-worked Chief Executive the rest and the becoming pleasures of a summer's vacation. The wilderness of the Adirondacks is doubtless a good place to go to, and I think it may be regretted that the pushing reporter of the World found out his seclusion. The decent people of the land cannot but regret the exposure which the all too laquacious reporter makes of the President's conviviality and euchreism. If the President finds relaxation in his protracted and unseasonable games, one can only wonder at the dignified passionateness of his taste for euchre.

But his taste for euchre, strong as it is, is not as bad as his taste for strong whisky. It is not said, however, that the President drinks the bad, strong whisky. Perhaps his gay companions do the whisky drinking. One can only say, if this is so, the President is in bad company, and exposes himself to suspicion by choosing such associates. But the inference fairly is that he himself is a drinker of the bad whisky. Previous reports concerning his bibulous propensities give color to this inference. It would not be a pleasant revelation to be told that good ex-President Hayes or Garfield or Lincoln or Grant or Washington took their summerings after this style.

The truth is, we seem to have fallen on evil times. And it is to be regretted that when the land is cursed with whisky, and when so much is being done and attempted by good men and women to remove or at least in some way abate the fearful drink curse, that men high in authority should lend all the influence of their mighty example to strengthen the evil which every wise and patriotic citizen cannot but deplore and desire to see removed.

If the President will take his whisky, we wish the shame and evil of his practice could be concealed in the secrets of the wilderness and not dragged into the light to become a temptation and a snare to others.

Perhaps the time will yet come when if public men will not leave their evil examples and corrupting habits, that the sober and virtuous public will retire them to the privacy where they belong, and where the people will have no responsibility for the shame of their indulgences. Let it once again be said, "They that be drunken are drunken in the night." Let such seek the decent concealment of darkness for their deeds of darkness.

Let us hear no more of the President's whisky or beer drinking or Sabbath desecration. We heard enough about him before he became President; it becomes him whom we now wish and delight to honor and uphold in all that is good, to be jealous of his good name, and by an irreproachable moral life make us forget the Mayor of Buffalo in the splendid recollections of President Cleveland.

GOLD OR MICA?

In United States histories we are informed that some early colonists discovered a glittering sand. Supposing there might be gold in it they sent a shipload to England. Gold or mica?

Moses left the grand court of Pharaoh, led the Israelites through the waste, howling wilderness, endured years of hardship and privation, and obtained a more honorable burial in the end than ever did Freemason or Odd-fellow. Gold or mica?

Homer, Virgil, Johnson, Milton, Burns, Goldsmith labored much in writing poetry. Most of them made but little money. Goldsmith says, "Thou foundest me poor at first and keepest me so." Gold or mica?

Paul espoused the cause of Christianity; Luther that of the Reformation. Both endured hardships and buffeting and attained enduring honor. Gold or mica?

Garrison, Coffin, Douglass and others espoused the cause of the slaves. After some years of labor, they lived to see the final triumph and were the recipients of due honor. Gold or mica?

We might go on. It is not necessary. Many are still cleaving to the corrupt and partly defunct Republican party who ought to embrace reform principles only found in another—Douglass among this number. Do they see a glittering sand? Gold or mica? Esau sold his priceless birthright for a mess of pottage. Gold or mica? A certain man traded his beautiful wife for a barrel of whisky and a one-horse wagon. In her new relation she bore talented sons. Gold or mica? QUAKER BOY.

THE LODGE DEFENCE.

ADDRESS OF PRES. C. A. BLANCHARD AT THE IOWA STATE CONVENTION, WEST BRANCH, IOWA.

On the fourth day of July, 1828, a convention of seceding Freemasons was held at Leroy, N. Y. One hundred and three gentlemen were present who had taken degrees in the order, varying in number from the entered Apprentice to the Thrice Illustrious Order of the Cross. At this convention, composed exclusively of those who had been connected with the order, the following declarations were made and signed by the entire list of one hundred and three men.

"1. Freemasonry exercises jurisdiction over the persons and lives of citizens of the Republic.

"2. It arrogates to itself the right of punishing its members for offenses unknown to the laws of this or any other nation.

"3. It requires the concealment of crime and protects the guilty from punishment.

"4. It encourages the commission of crime by affording to the guilty facilities of escape.

"5. It affords opportunities for the corrupt and designing to form plans against the government and the lives and characters of individuals.

"6. It assumes titles and dignities incompatible with a republican form of government and enjoins an obedience to them derogatory to republican principles.

"7. It destroys all principles of equality by bestowing favors on its own members to the exclusion of others equally meritorious and deserving.

"8. It creates odious aristocracies by its obligations to support the interests of its members in preference to others of equal qualifications.

"9. It blasphemes the name, and attempts a personification of the great Jehovah.

"10. It prostitutes the Sacred Scriptures to unholy purposes to subserve its own secular and trifling concerns.

"11. It weakens the sanctions of morality and religion by the multiplication of profane oaths and an immoral familiarity with religious forms and ceremonies.

"12. It discovers in its ceremonies an unholy commingling of divine truth with impious human inventions.

"13. It destroys a veneration for religion and religious ordinances by the profane use of religious forms.

"14. It substitutes the self-righteousness and ceremonies of Masonry for the vital religion and ordinances of the Gospel.

"15. It promotes habits of idleness and intemperance by its members neglecting their business to attend its meetings and drink its libations.

"16. It accumulates funds at the expense of indigent persons and to the distress of their families, too often to be dissipated in rioting and pleasure, and its senseless ceremonies and exhibitions.

"17. It contracts the sympathies of the human heart for all the unfortunate by confining its charities to its own members, and promotes the interest of the few at the expense of the many."

Following these seventeen theses is the declaration of independence of Freemasonry, which these gentlemen made. I desire to add other theses and for convenience shall number them in continuation of those already stated.

"18. The accredited representatives of Freemasonry clearly show that it is a religious system founded on the worships of paganism, especially that of Baal.

"19. Masonic historians clearly prove that as an organization, Freemasonry is less than two hundred years old, while its principles are, as above stated, as old as paganism.

"20. The history, philosophy, ceremonies, obligations, and penalties of Freemasonry are all published, have been repeatedly published, and may be known by any intelligent man who chooses to inform himself concerning them.

"21. As thus revealed by its obligations and penalties Masonry is proved to be thoroughly evil. The objection to the order is not that Masons are bad men, but that the order is designed for the protection of crime, and its members are held to it (the order) under penalties calling for murder.

"22. Other secret societies in free lands and peaceful times, while they may not be so evil as Masonry, are like it in principle, many of them resemble it in ritual, all of them tend to prevent opposition to it and, being needless for any good purpose, their secrecy may be used for any bad one.

"23. The wisest, greatest, and best men of the present and past generation in the United States have been, and are, opposed to Freemasonry.

"24. There is sufficient reason to believe that the only real Masonic secrets at the present time concern the plans of Masons to promote the business and political interests of themselves; to injure those who oppose the order, especially seceding members; and their attempts to protect brethren who have violated law from punishment.

"25. Freemasonry is purely selfish, falsifies history, contradicts the Bible, mutilates the Bible, profanes the name of God, personates Jehovah by sinful men, rivals the church, subverts just human law, breaks the unity of the home; in short, is a subtle, secret, deadly enemy to all the temporal and eternal interests of men."

I have perhaps wearied you by this statement of the charges which have been brought against this system. There is a measure of repetition in it, as the last thesis is in a sense a summary of the preceding twenty-four. Now concerning these charges there are several things to be said.

And first. Most or all of them have been repeatedly published to the world in sermons, addresses, newspapers, books, and tracts during the last seventy years.

Second. They are not the words of ignorant or wicked men, but are the utterances of such persons as Daniel Webster, John Marshall, John Quincy Adams, Charles Sumner, Charles Francis Adams, Wm. H. Seward, Thaddeus Stevens, Charles G. Finney, Thurlow Weed, D. L. Moody, Nathaniel Colver, and an uncounted host of men similar in character. If these statements were made by foul-mouthed libertines, bankrupts in purse, character, and influence, they might be lightly passed by, but such is not the case.

Third. Though now almost seventy years since these charges were published by responsible parties over their own names, and though many candid men believe these charges so that the United Presbyterian, Reformed Presbyterian, United Brethren, Wesleyan Methodist, Free Methodist, Lutheran, Friend, Quaker, and other churches exclude members of this secret society from membership, yet at this time there is no substantial refutation of these charges, published by these responsible, able, and excellent men ever attempted.

Fourth. Though these charges have never been refuted, and though, if true, they conclusively prove that no Christian or patriot should have an hour's connection with such an organization, yet professed Christians retain membership in it, and seemingly reputable citizens say that one who breaks these oaths ought to be killed, i. e., should be murdered.

Fifth. Though the order refuses to answer the charges made, and yet continues to impose its bloody oaths and to practice its Christ-rejecting religion, it assails the reputation, property and life of men who, because they believe them to be true, speak as free American citizens against it.

Now, in view of these facts, which if doubted or denied can be easily established, what ought intelligent, patriotic Christian citizens to do concerning this order, which, together with its lesser branches, aspires to fill the land, monopolize the offices taking, possession of the court houses, and crushing every church which it cannot control? How can we expect to enforce prohibitory laws or laws of any kind, when criminals, judges, sheriffs, jurors, and witnesses, have sworn to recognize and obey each other's signs?

It is idle to say that certain persons connected with the order will or will not do certain things. The question what any man will do is one that God alone can answer, and if every Mason on earth would break his oath that fact would make Freemasonry neither better nor worse. The question is, What is Masonry? Do its penalties comprise throat-cutting and disemboweling? Is the Master Mason sworn to keep all secrets except those relating to murder and treason, when he receives them on the square from a brother Mason, or not? Is a Royal Arch Mason bound to aid a companion of that degree engaged in any difficulty and to extricate him from the same if he can, whether the one in trouble is right or wrong? To talk about assurances given by the master or high priest before the obligation is taken, is childish. It is stated by worthy and responsible men as matter of personal knowledge that these criminal obligations, these bloody penalties, are administered in the lodge. The officers of the Grand Lodge of Rhode Island swore that the oaths as given were correct, and now some one says, "So-and-so wouldn't keep such an oath;" "Such penalties are not inflicted;" and men call such babbling argument! Or, worse still, some profane tippler says that men like President Charles G. Finney are perjured scoundrels unfit to be believed!

For the proof that Freemasonry is descended, or, more properly speaking, made up from the horrible rites of heathen worship, we are not dependent on those who have left the orders. Mackey, Morris, Sickels, Rebold and others who adhere to the order, hold its offices and write its books are the men who tell us that Freemasonry is in fact nothing but a continuation of those ancient systems of false worship which filled the old world with nameless cruelties and crimes. In the history of initiation and the explanation of symbols we are instantly taken by them to the study of the worship of Bacchus, Baal, Cerces, Osiris, etc., etc.

And though there is no possible refutation of these statements of leading Masons, and though, if true, they stamp the whole system and its descendents with the undeniable seal of paganism, yet professed Christian men adhere to this system, say that it is all founded on the Bible, and that Christian ministers who renounce such a system ought to be killed.

As we understand the matter the theses stated in the opening are all believed to be true, and will be maintained in oral or written debate by the National Christian Association against any who believe them untrue. And we submit that while such serious charges, made by so many men, of so excellent character, are unanswered, Christian men should have no fellowship with such an unfruitful work of darkness but rather reprove it. Here, as we believe, is the key to the present lawlessness and perjury which seem almost or quite collossal in their proportions. Against the source of such evils Christians should pray and citizens be on their guard.

CHRIST FOR THE WORLD.

STIRRING ADDRESS ON MISSIONS BY DR. PIERSON AT THE NORTHFIELD CONVENTION.

Evangelization is universal; it consists in preaching, teaching and testifying; it relies on three promises of Christ—always to be with you, to send the Holy Spirit, and give supernatural signs. It is also obligatory. "Do ye," said Christ; not Mr. Moody or myself—all of you. The subject of evangelization is Christ; its object is man. The pillar of cloud and fire which accompanied the Israelites in the wilderness was a supernatual sign of ancient times. "The modern era of foreign missions," says Christlieb, "is the closest parallel of the supernatural signs of old time." The miracle of regeneration among abandoned men is the pillar of fire to-day. The ten great obstacles to modern missions drop into four groups of approach, intercourse, impression and action. Glance at the way they were combined and the wonderful manner in which they have melted away. When the work began, the penetration of the continents with the Gospel was a physical impossibility.

Many nations of the earth were shut even to commerce. China was enclosed by the sea and the great wall. Africa was a vast stretch of unexplored country,—only the mere thread of coast line being known geographically. The deeds of the Fiji islanders to missionaries had been fiendish, horrible beyond expression, written in blood and registered in hell. Languages in scores were unknown, without grammar or dictionary. Women in thousands, cooped up in zenana, harem and seraglio, were absolutely inaccessible. Now what has been accomplished? Corea, the hermit nation, is free to our men, the last nation to come in and making every country accessible. Women in foreign lands everywhere can be reached by the Gospel. Sixty language have been reduced to writing and a grammatical form. Even the Malagasys, described as veritable asses to a missionary, are joining the Lord's side. Not an obstacle of fifty that confronted workers at the beginning is before us now. All this has been accomplished by devoted labor. William Johnson, who died in Sierra Leone, after seven years' work, left every trade, industry and profession interested, with a church of a capacity of 1,600, whereas at his coming more than twenty kinds of people were living with a miserable little sign language. In India in 1868 there was wrought the most magnificent work since the day of Pentecost. I tell you the Gospel is through traveling by stage coach. It goes by lightning. History gives glorious testimony to the spreading of the Word among men. At the opening of the 18th century the air was full of deism, atheism and lasciviousness. Louis XVI and Mme de Pompadour were at the head of France; with Frederick the Great under the influence of Voltaire. Germany was tumbling under an influx of rationalism and scepticism. Then God sent out the twelve modern apostles, with Whitefield and Wesley at their head. With the year 1737 opens the era of modern missions, when Jonathan Edwards sent out from Northampton a tract asking for the effusion of the spirit upon the habitable globe—a trumpet peal to the whole world. In 1757 occurred the battle of Plassy, when Lord Clive, sword in hand, gave England the entering wedge to India. In 1792 the first missionary society was organized. William Cary, the "consecrated cobbler," was sent out to India from England. In the fourteen years succeeding to the first, seven foreign missions were founded. Commodore Perry entered Japan in 1853; in 1857 occurred the Sepoy mutiny which gave new impulse to the Indian work, showing the natives what friends they had in the English. In 1858 England, France and America concluded the treaty with China which added 35,000,000 more to the missionary effort. The year 1868 was the annus mirabillis in evangelical work, no fewer than 10,000 people being baptized in one week, and 60,000 during the winter, while twenty individuals alone gave $4,000,000 for mission work. In 1873 Turkey joined the lands open to work. In 1873 Stanley, as a reporter of the New York Herald, went after Livingstone, finding him in 1877, fulfilling the prophecy in regard to Ethiopia. In 1,000 days after his return the Congo chain of lakes was compassed; in 1,000 more there was a chain of stations along them. In 1884, as a result of the Berlin conference, the Congo state was established, civil and religious liberty being assured, not only Protestant nations such as England, and Catholic such as Italy, but the Greek church of Russia, and the Moslem agreeing to the compact. Now let there go forth from this Northfield convention of 1885 a trumpet call such as rang out from Northampton in 1747. Let us issue a circular to the whole world asking for the assemblege at London, Rome, Jerusalem or anywhere an ecumenical council at which every Christian denomination shall be represented and at which workers from every mission field shall be present. Let them present the huge mass of facts about missions developed in the last half century. Then let the whole world field be mapped out and distributed among the evangelical denominations of Christianity. —Springfield Republican.

We find this beautiful incident related in the Baptist Weekly. It is well worth repeating as it furnishes an example worthy to be followed; or, rather, illustrates a principle worth practicing: The old prophecy that "Kings shall be nursing fathers" is having a remarkable fulfillment. Mr. Guinness reports that when he visited King Leopold he asked him, "What makes you so interested in Africa?" His answer was, "You know God took away from me my son, my only son, and then he laid Africa upon my heart. I am not spending the revenue of Belgium on it, but my own private resources, and I have made arrangements that when I die this civilizing and evangelizing work in Africa shall still go on." At the present time the king is expending $400,000 a year in Africa out of his private purse. Having lost his heir, he has made Africa his heir.

THE ANCIENT MYSTERIES.

[The following article from the Detroit Freemason of April 4, 1885, is worth a careful study for its account of ancient heathen abominations, which are here exalted so that the religion of Masonry and modern secretism which has taken their place may not seem repulsive.—ED.]

It is generally supposed that the religion of the natives of antiquity was nothing but gross idolatry, worshiping the sun, moon and stars as actual deities. Also in Egypt the worship of the bull was the religion of that great empire. Late discoveries, however, change the aspect as is usually understood, and establish the fact that the unity of God was taught in the ancient Egyptian Mysteries.

"The manifold forms of the Egyptian Pantheon," says E. Deutsch, "were but religious masks of the sublime doctrine or the unity of the Deity communicated to the initiated in the mysteries." The gods of the Pantheon being only manifestations of the One Being in various capacities.

Says J. Nenenman Hoare in a recent article: "The Egyptians tried to realize God by taking some natural object which should in itself convey to their minds some feature in God's nature. This became a necessity for the priests in the religious teaching of the people. Therefore in the sun they saw God manifest as the light of the world. The more they felt the infinite nature of God, the more would they seek in nature for symbols."

All the deities, it would seem, were regarded as manifestations of the great Creator, uncreated, the Father of the Universe. A close examination of these ancient forms of religious worship reveals the fact that in nearly all of them God is worshiped under the symbols of the sun.

The sun is the most splendid and glorious object in nature. The physical and magnetic source of all life and motion. Its light is a type of eternal truth; its warmth of universal benevolence. It is not strange therefore that man in all ages has selected the sun as the highest and most perfect emblem of God.

But in the course of time the symbols were confounded with the person or thing which they were intended to illustrate. We therefore find that most nations forgot the worship of the true God and began to adore the sun itself, which they thus deified and personified. The sun thus personified was made the theme of allegorical history emblematical of his yearly passage through the twelve constellations of the zodiac, in his apparent path among the stars. The sun thus became a bull in Taurus, the sign of the vernal equinox, and was worshiped by the Egyptians under the name of Apis and by the Assyrians as Bel or Baal. The fables of mythology are absurd if understood as real histories, but the allegorical key being given, many of them are found to contain profound and sublime astronomical truths.

This key was religiously kept secret by the priests and philosophers, and was only imparted to those who were initiated into the mysteries. The profane and vulgar crowds were kept in darkness, and believed in and worshiped a real Hercules or Jupiter, whom they thought actually lived and performed all the exploits of the mythology. The religion of the masses thus became one of gross idolatry, while that of the priests and philosophers was pure and exalted Keeping the people in ignorance the priests of Egypt were enabled to rule the people with a despotic power.

The science in which the Egyptian priesthood were most proficient, and which they most jealously guarded was astronomy. The masses of the people worshiped the sun, moon and stars as gods, and a knowledge of their true nature would have at once put an end to the influence of the priests who were believed by the ignorant multitude to be able to withhold or dispense by prayers and sacrifices the divine favor.

The priests of a pretended god, when once his god is exposed, stands before the world a convicted imposter.

To deny the divinity of the sun, moon and stars, or to permit science to disclose their true nature to the masses of the people was held by the priests as the highest of crimes.

The policy of secrecy by which all truth, whether religious or scientific was confined to the mysteries, was a State Policy long established and thought to be necessary for the well being of society. It certainly was for the well being of the few on whom it conferred honor and wealth. Of course a knowledge of astronomy diffused among the people would have been fatal to the pretentions of the priests who by their knowledge were enabled to predict eclipses of the sun and moon and the time of seed time and they were credited with the power of foretelling the future.

Science was thus for the most part orally transmitted from one Hierophant to another in their secret temples.

A knowledge of the true God was in the language of the Orphic hymn, The Secret of Secrets, to be only communicated when the aspirant was perfectly initiated, with doors carefully guarded and the profane excluded.

It was even then to those to whom it was thus communicated "a solemn and unexpected truth" which overturned all their preconceived opinions. The knowledge of the true God was then obtained under the strictest conditions of secrecy and kept from the masses, it being well known that a public profession of the great truth would be visited by the heavy hand of both the civil and religious authorities and their lives would be sacrificed to the superstitious rage of the ignorant multitude and the interested fury of the ministers of a false religion.

Thus all alike, from the most exalted hierophant to the humblest of the initiated were the slaves, and sometimes, the victims, of the system of state policy which they all upheld and defended. It is true, however, that in the progress of many centuries even the mysteries became corrupt and lost a knowledge of the true God. But in their origin they taught the truth concerning the Deity.

BACKBONE.

One thing which Christians, as well as others, need at the present day is backbone. Not a backbone like a ramrod, that cannot yield or bend, but a well articulated spinal column, which is strong enough to hold a man upright and keep him from being crushed beneath the burdens that press upon him. These are days of easy-going piety; and men are too often ruled by compromise rather than conscience.

Says Mr. Spurgeon: Oak has given place to willow. Everybody has grown limp. Out of the generality of limpness has come an admiration for it. A man cannot speak a plain word without being accused of bitterness, and if he denounces error he is narrow-minded; for all must join the universal-admiration society, or be placed under a ban and be howled down.

Now in such a condition of things as this there is special call, not for stubbornness and crustiness, but for a gentle, patient, unyielding conscientiousness and firmness, which anchors the soul to the everlasting Rock, and causes the heart to rest on him who is the Way, the Truth and the Life, and who will never leave nor forsake us.—Christian.

The Whig party died without the least injury to the country resulting, but on the contrary with much benefit, for a better party succeeded it. If both the present great parties should be utterly disbanded no harm would come to the nation. Neither of them inteuds to improve the country, or to do anything but secure or retain its own supremacy and the spoils and salaries. We want a party that will serve the country and do right.

A political party that does otherwise is a positive curse to the nation. We might as well try to wear a pair of boots or a suit of clothes for life as to preserve a party indefinitely that will not mend matters nor allow them to be mended. An old party that has worn out its honesty and respectibility is of no more value than an old, worn out pair of brogans. The fact that another old pair of brogans are worse and more rotten goes for nothing. As well talk of the good record of these old boots twenty-five years ago as to demand the perpetuation of a cracked and tattered old party that was good a long time ago.—Censor, Los Angeles, Cal.

The fight over the so-called Freedom of Worship bill is almost certain to be renewed at Albany next winter, with greater energy than ever. It is the entering wedge of Roman Catholic rule, not in their own Protectory, aided by government—they have that already,—not of government institutions for corrections and charities. They have their altars and images there already; but in charitable institutions founded and sustained by Protestants if they get any government aid at all. There must these Protestant philanthropists build the altars of Rome, and be subject to the dictation of her priests. The advocates of the bill are thoroughly in earnest and well organized; and unless those who are opposed to it look after the primaries and see that men of the right stamp are nominated, it will probably be passed next session. Those who fail to do their duty now will have small ground of complaint if it does pass. Let honest men of all parties be found faithful in this matter by attending the primaries and nominating honest candidates.—New York Witness.

BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS:

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E. E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER XXXII. (concluded.)

"Hold on a minute!" he shouted, thinking it was one of the men at the works who had some matter about which he wished to speak to him.

A suspicion crossed his mind on a nearer approach that he might be mistaken in the identity of the individual addressing him, and to clear up his doubts he said, inquiringly:

"It is you, Mike?"

In the darkness he failed to notice the other figures lurking behind. An oath answered him, and three clubs, wielded by the three stout arms that had been hired by the saloon and urged on by lodge vengeance, descended on Nelson's head and shoulders.

He had separated from Martin Treworthy, though the latter had not gone on but was quietly waiting at a short distance, and when he heard the execration and the dull thud of the falling blows, he sprang forward and bursting into the ring which surrounded Nelson received himself the brutal rain of blows and kicks. Martin had once possessed a strong right arm of his own, and did not fully realize how his rough experience on Kansas plains and Southern battle fields had robbed it of its early vigor, but the diversion gave Nelson a chance to grapple with his assailants and hold his own till help arrived from an unexpected source.

The assault took place in the outskirts of the city, where there were few passers-by who dared to interfere Only one tall, broad-shouldered, muscular stranger seemed to have no notion of waiting the tardy movements of the police, but pitched at once into the melee all unarmed as he was, and with a few skillful blows that showed pugilistic training knocked two of Nelson's antagonists hors du combat, and held the other with firm grip till the officers of the law came up and relieved him of his prisoner.

It was Peter Snyder, who was now in Jacksonville engaged in the double errand of looking out for some stray sheep that within sound of a dozen church bells still persisted in straying, while nobody except a few such self-appointed evangelists as he seemed to regard it as particularly their business; and negotiating for the lease of his old saloon which it had occurred to him was in a convenient locality for a mission that he proposed starting. He had left the Salvation Army. Even there he found the same difficulty in speaking against lodgery that besets the regularly-ordained minister of the Gospel who can preach against rum and tobacco, or lying or cheating, and everything be as calm as a summer sea, while the least adverse allusion to secretism stirs up a perfect seething whirlpool of angry commotion; and he had finally made up his mind, as he expressed it, "to serve the Lord on his own hook."

Nelson, who was not seriously hurt though somewhat bruised and battered, felt too great an anxiety for Martin, who lay insensible, to show the surprise he might have otherwise felt when we recognized the Gideon who had so providentially appeared for his rescue.

"I guess he'll come to in a minute," said Peter, as he made rough efforts for his restoration. "But them were hard knocks for a man of his age to take."

Nelson groaned as he hung over the prostrate form. But before long Martin Treworthy opened his eyes and managed to stagger to his feet, and together, as tenderly as two sons might a beloved father, they assisted him to his own domicile, but he fainted away when they reached the threshold.

* * * * * * * * * *

"I am all right, Martha. It's Mr. Treworthy that's got the worst of it. We must see to him now. He has fairly given his life for mine."

And Martha, to whom the tidings had come that Nelson had been struck down by saloon ruffians and nearly killed—and to whom for an instant that took in a whole lifetime of buried hopes and sweet womanly joys which might never come to the blossoming, everything had seemed to spin around in one dizzy vortex of anguish—knelt down by Martin's bedside and kissed his rough hand with sobs.

"Oh, Mr. Treworthy, you must get well for our sakes."

Martin smiled.

"Supposing Nelson had been killed, had you ruther—now think well—would you ruther he'd been indifferent to the rum business, as so many folks are, and so saved his life?"

"No," said Martha, with white lips. "If the martyr's crown was waiting for him I wouldn't be the woman to keep him from it."

"Then look here a bit. I reckon the woman I should have married, if she'd lived, and that I have been married to in my soul these twenty-five years, would have said the same thing."

"I think she would," responded Martha. She bent her head and kissed his hand again, and this time there came over her a strange feeling as if for the moment there had been a sense of spiritual kinship and communion between her and Martin Treworthy's early love—the fair-haired girl who had slept so quietly for a quarter of a century under her low prairie mound.

But there was another to whom the tidings came in an exaggerated form, and that was Dora Deming.

She had not quite forgotten her brother Nelson—how tender and careful he used to be of his little sister in the years of his over-grave boyhood. And besides a very perceptible change had passed over Dora since that summer day with its awful experience. Of course Daeey's death by the tornado, the way in which he had swindled the grange, and its utter and hopeless collapse in consequence, together with many unsavory details of his former career now brought to the light, had been the talk for days in circles wider than their immediate neighborhood; but no one dreamed of the brink of ruin on which Dora had so carelessly sported. It was all a secret between herself and God. Perhaps in the years to come, with her grandchildren about her knees, when the wonder and terror had faded out of her life and left her only the memory of the deliverance, she might tell them the story for a warning. But now the very thought of it made her shudder with a kind of nightmare horror as one might shudder remembering an incautious footfall on the sheer edge of some bottomless abyss.

"Mother," she said, after sitting a moment in silence with white cheeks and a great yearning at her heart, "I wish I could see him—just once."

"Well, child; I don't know why you shouldn't want to," returned Mrs. Deming. "He is your own brother."

And so the very thing came about in the most natural way in the world for which Martha had longed and sometimes even prayed—that she might see Nelson's sister—she had none of her own—and get acquainted with her.

Martha, like most plain women, loved beauty, and her heart went out at once to the sweet girlish face that looked up at her with such beseeching entreaty.

"Tell me!" gasped Dora. "Is he dead, my brother Nelson?"

"No; he is alive and well. You were told wrong. It was Mr. Treworthy, an old friend of his, that was badly hurt in trying to defend him. I have often heard Nelson speak of his sister Dora. He will be glad to see you."

"I heard of it only this morning," said Dora, with quivering lip. "It seems so dreadful."

"It is dreadful," answered Martha, taking Dora's little, soft, clinging hand in her's. Martha's hands were not very small, but there was power and character in every fibre. They were the kind that Joan of Arc might have had, or any of those heroic women of our early history who could rock a cradle or shoulder a musket. "It is the same dreadful thing that has been going on so long. Only now it has come a little nearer. We grow callous. We read of rum's doings in every paper we take up till it gets to be an old story. We women who lead such peaceful happy lives need to have it brought home to us once in a while so that we may feel as we ought for other women. Don't you think so?"

Dora knew vaguely that her father had been a drinking man, and they had all been very poor and wretched in consequence, but she was too young at the time to retain any bitter personal recollections. She had not meant to be hard and unfeeling when in her bright, careless way she had protested that "such things didn't concern her anyway;" she had only been a butterfly happy in her painted wings and caring nothing for the worm crushed under foot. Something in Martha's face impelled her to be frank.

"I have not been interested in temperance—much. I have been selfish, I am afraid, but I wish I could help put down this dreadful drinking."

Acting on a sudden impulse Martha took off the bow of white ribbon that she wore and pinned it to Dora's dress.

"Then we are doubly sisters, for now you belong to the white ribbon ranks as well as I," she said. "We will work and pray together, can we not? And oh, Dora! can't you love me just a little? I have always wanted a sister so."

Dora's cheeks flushed, and then with a little cry she put her arms around Martha's neck, and clasped together in that close embrace Nelson found them.

* * * * * * * * * *

Though there were a few days in which it seemed as if Martin Treworthy's natural vigor of constitution might re-assert itself, he had no such thought.

One night when Nelson was watching by his side, Martin seemed to rouse suddenly from a kind of stupor and spoke his name with sudden, eager earnestness.

"Nelson, in my tin box on the shelf you'll find a paper that'll tell you what I want done with what I leave behind. And there's one thing—two things you must promise me."

"Anything within the bounds of possibility, my dear old friend," said Nelson, with a choking voice.

Martin raised himself up and his eyes gleamed with the fire of other days.

"You said a year ago you could see no hurt in the lodge. Do you see any now?"

"I see a world of Satanic mischief," responded Nelson, emphatically. "Fighting slavery taught you to hate it. Fighting rum has taught me."

"Then take my place when I step out of the ranks. My life has been a rough one, but I can't say I hain't enjoyed it. I come of fighting stock. There was a Treworthy fell with Wolfe on the plains of Abraham; but my battle for the slave was a grander one than his. God grant that your's may be a grander one than mine. For I'm going, my boy, and you mustn't mourn for me nor feel bad—you nor Martha. There's only one thing more. When I am gone lay me by the side of her."

He said no more for a long time. Suddenly he raised his head and exclaimed joyfully, "I see Him—the Leader on the white horse." And with his eyes riveted on that wondrous vision, the man whose greatest earthly pride was that he had once fought under John Brown went to join his captain.

REPUBLICAN PROHIBITION IOWA.

The temperance plank (?) in the platform of the Republican party of Iowa is surely one of the finest straddles imaginable. The Inter Ocean in its report of the convention tells us that the license men of the convention were satisfied, "feeling that their grievances will have attention as soon as possible." How will their grievances be redressed except by an "unconditional surrender" of the prohibition law? The plank in the platform referred to is a complete disavowal of all responsibility upon the part of the Republican party for the enactment of the prohibition law, they simply having acceeded to the demands of the people as expressed by a "non-partisan election," "ordered from an unquestioned majority that came alike from the votes of Republicans and Democrats." As much as to say, You whiskey men do not need to blame us for the prohibition law. As a party we did nothing but grant the demands of the people. You must blame the people. The platform says this when it says that it has never "made the support of prohibition a test of party fealty." These statements taken in connection with the statements of the Inter Ocean that "an indorsement of prohibition and a proposition to compel the Republican party to enforce it would have been defeated or caused a rupture," tell us as plainly as words can tell, that the friends of prohibition have no reason to look to the Republican party for sympathy in their struggle. Some of us who were for a time almost ostracised for voting the prohibition ticket a year ago, remember how much we were told that we could only hope to have prohibition through the Republican party. And now in the very State where that party took most of credit for the enactment of the prohibition law, we find the same party in so short a time, not only refuse to pledge itself to the enforcement of the law, but absolutely disavows any responsibility for its enactment.

Iowa presents a novel picture. A prohibition law on its statute books for the enactment of which so much effort was put forth, declared constitutional by the Supreme Court, a fine success wherever enforced, but so soon deserted and disowned by the very party who boasted so much over its enactment. Is there not need for a third party? C. H. KEPHART.

TESTIMONY FROM KANSAS.

The report of the committee appointed by the West Kansas conference of the Free Methodist church on secret societies: We quote our book on discipline: "Voluntary associations are not necessarily sinful because they are secret. But secrecy is always a ground for suspicion. Evil works instinctively incline to darkness. Good works grow up in the light. God commands us to let our light shine. Even a good cause under the shadow of secrecy invalidates its claim to the confidence of open and honest men. Grace and guile can have no affinity. All secrets necessary to be kept can be kept without an oath. A bad institution ought not and a good one need not be secret."

One of the dangerous characteristics of secret societies is the unwillingness of the members to have their claims examined and discussed. This alone should keep those who desire a clear conscience before God from entering their door.

Another is the prevarication, subterfuge, and falsehood resorted to by adherents to keep those outside ignorant of their character. This is true to an extent that indicates that demoralization and debauchery of conscience are incident to such associations. The war against secret societies is by no means ended. The enemy has neither surrendered nor lost the virus of his disposition. Christian men should be on the alert and girded for conflict. The life and strength of secretism is in Freemasonry. This defeated, most other orders would naturally succumb.

We indict Freemasonry as un-American and anti-Christian. Its government, its titles, its style, are all undemocratic, calculated to foster the aristocracy of a class and the subjection and enslavement of the multitude.

Its principles are corrupt, its oaths unscriptural and demoralizing, its penalties blood-curdling.

The assumptions of Freemasonry to antiquity, morality and beneficence are egotistical, absurd and hypocritical.

The light of day is shining in upon its darkness—if men will read they may understand. We advise our people to be one mind in withstanding, exposing and removing this enemy of the kingdom of Christ.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TEMPERANCE CONVOCATION AT LAKE BLUFF.

Lake Bluff, Ill., Aug. 31. 1885.

Dear Cynosure:—In spite of the rain and cold we have spent a delightful week at this place. The principal drawback to our complete satisfaction was what was left of the first day after our arrival at noon. It was Good Templar's day and we failed to hear the great speech of the occasion by the pope of the order, John B. Finch. I use the term "pope" because it was put into my mouth by that patriarch and worshiper of the order, Hon. Samuel Hastings of Wisconsin. He said that he himself had for some years filled the same position and that there was but one man in the whole world who held a like position and that was the pope of Rome. The head of the Freemasons was nowhere compared with the head of this mighty order. If you leave out the last speech of the evening by Capt. Linscott, the most of what we heard during the afternoon and evening was a glorification of the order by its great lights, Gen. Green Clay Smith of Kentucky, John B. Finch and Hon. S. Hastings and others.

The claims of the order as set forth contradicted my distinct recollection of facts. We were given to understand that the fundamental principles of the order were total abstinence for the individual and prohibition for the State. How this accords with the fact that there are lodges, and so far as I can learn a large number of them, in which almost none of the members vote for prohibition and members go through the ceremonies so drunk that they cannot stand erect without leaning on others, I cannot quite understand.

In Medusa, N. Y., we found a lodge of 150 members which contained but a single prohibition voter last fall, and when he recently introduced the question into a Good Templar's convention for Albany county it created such a commotion that it had to be withdrawn or they said the discussion of it would blow up the order. Some of the best Christian men of Medusa, one of whom had been a charter member of the lodge and paid $40 towards its hall, told me that their meetings held till late at night and after they were out some of the most immoral men in that region were in the habit of strolling up a dark and lonely dell that lay close to the village, with young girls and other men's wives.

Dr. Charles Jewett, the first and one of the oldest temperance lecturers in this country, not of choice, but because the secret had destroyed the open societies, himself for several years a lecturer in the secret orders, says in his book "Forty Years Fight with the Drink Demon," that the temperance cause was farther advanced after the first fifteen years of open warfare than it was twenty-five years afterward, during which time the secret orders had been the only temperance societies.

Another distinguished lecturer in the secret orders said that these orders drew the temperance cause up into upper rooms away from the masses and choked it to death. I can testify of my own knowledge that the statements of these men are and were perfectly true of the region where I lived. When professed temperance men now make statements contrary to these I charitably hope they are not acquainted with the recorded facts. Such statements were common and unquestioned.

W. C. T. U. day was one of great profit. The addresses of Miss Willard, Mrs. Clara Hoffman of Missouri, Mrs. Mary B. Lathrop of Michigan and Mrs. Sallie Chapin of South Carolina, and others, were very able and full of inspiration.

The conference of the succeeding days interspersed with stated addresses by master minds cannot help doing much good. Of the addresses one was by John B. Finch on non-partisan prohibition. The address was very able and convincing. Another was by Dr. Brooks, the late prohibition candidate for governor of Missouri. On the platform the Dr. is master of the situation. He showed how all the Prohibitionists are not from the Republicans. Dr. Leonard, the Prohibition candidate for governor of Ohio, made a telling speech, giving the entire history of the prohibition cause in Ohio. He showed from their platforms that the Democrats are asking honestly for license which cannot be had without a change in the constitution of the State; that the Republicans are asking for legislation and taxation which have been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the State. The Dr. had challenged the Republican nominee to a public discussion of the question of regulation and taxation, and after some time received the answer from the chairman of the Republican State Committee that those questions were not at issue in the campaign.

Rev. C. H. Mead, of New York, Southern missionary of the National Temperance society, who had been among the most able speakers in the conference, preached on Sabbath morning such a unique and wonderful sermon as only he can preach. In the afternoon Mrs. Lathrop gave, to a large audience, an address, the keen logic and persuasive eloquence and power of which I am sure no Christian man could have heard and gone away and voted other than a prohibition ticket.

In the evening were addresses by Mrs. Palmer, Mr. Mead and Mrs. Lathrop. The gentle arraignment by the latter, of ministers, Christians, careless mothers who permit their boys and girls to run about nights, go to dances, and often to beer gardens where they get their first glass, was something terrible.

THE POWER THAT PREVAILS.

FROM A NOBLE MOTHER.

Avalon, Mo.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—I have been a reader of your paper ever since it was first started, yet I do not remember ever telling you how much I appreciate it, nor how often I have been helped to stand firm for the right and truth by its teachings. How it helped me to teach my children to ever stand up for the right, even though they had to sacrifice prospects of worldly gain and remunerative positions, and loss of friends and many other things one has to give up, if they live the principles taught in the Cynosure. It encouraged me to say to my boy, "Adopt these principles. Go out and teach them to the world, even though you have to meet poverty, scorn, and contempt. Face the mob clamoring for the life of one who dared to expose and warn the youth of our land to shun such associations.' For I felt that He who said, "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them," would be his God and guide.

I was glad to see in your paper this week a call for a convention of all the churches opposed to these organizations, and a day of fasting and prayer appointed for the success of this great work. It made my heart rejoice. I felt that we were reaching to grasp the hand that moves the world. That is the only point from which we can reach that strong and mighty arm. Jesus said, "This kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting." It called to mind an instance that happened several years ago, which I shall never forget.

A minister moved into our town who claimed he was not a Mason, but undertook to defend the lodge as being a good institution, assailed our minister, college professors, anti-secrecy lecturers, and anti-secrecy church members in particular, bringing many false accusations and publicly charging them with things hard to bear, from which they were clear. He succeeded in getting the majority of the community in his favor. He threatened that he would sink the anti-church and school. About this time there was a call made in the Cynosure for a day of fasting and prayer for the success of the anti-secrecy cause. One sister resolved that she would observe it in the name and spirit of the Master. While praying her mind was drawn out to the condition of her own immediate neighborhood; that God would deliver the people from the power of this minister, would help them bear all for his name's sake; that he would give his people a forgiving spirit, and help them not to do evil for evil but remember that it was written, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord;" and that he would show this man his errors, or else deliver men from his power. She felt willing that God's will, not her own, be done in this matter, and the spirit of love and peace filled her whole being, and she felt that all would be well.

But for all of her assurance she was surprised greatly in a few days at hearing that this minister had had the grossest charges preferred against him by members of his own household and own church, and he soon left in disgrace, and has never returned.

This circumstance convinced me that it is not by might nor power, but by God's Spirit that the work is to be accomplished. God wants us to work, but wants us to work in the deepest humility, giving him the glory. Let every soul that desires to see these false worships overthrown adopt the Saviour's plan to cast out these evil spirits. If there had been a better plan he would have told us. Organization, voting, all have their place in this work, but none of these can take the place of prayer and fasting.

Mrs. A. Butler.

GOOD ADVICE FROM THE SOUTH.

Columbus, Miss., Aug. 26, 1885.

Editor Cynosure:—The Mount Moriah Association of the Missionary Baptist church which convened last week at Cedar Grove church, near Columbus, Miss., passed the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas, Secret societies are enemies to the church and religion of Jesus Christ, and

Whereas, They are opposed to the just exercise of discipline in the church of God and are protectors of lawless crime in the land, and

Whereas, They withhold from the church the time, the love, the money, and the labor which are its due, Therefore,

Resolved, That we, the Mount Moriah Association of the Missionary Baptist church, do denounce the whole system of organized secretism as wicked, spreading a secret idolatry which is a false and Christless religion.

Resolved, That we will not fellowship in our Association the members of any secret order.

Resolved, That we do affectionately and earnestly recommend to all our churches to enact laws which will prevent all members of the Baptist church from being members of any secret society.

Let us thank God that so many ministers and churches among the colored people are coming bravely to the front to withstand the lodge idolatry which has entangled such numbers of them, and let us do all in our power for their freedom in Christ. Let us pray that many ecclesiastical bodies which are now suffering their members to be, without warning, entrapped by the lodge may follow the good example of this Association. M. A. F. Tapley.

HAVE CHARITY.

Chicago, Sept. 1, 1885.

Editor Cynosure: Some months ago I was pained to read a letter in the Cynosure from a lady traveling in Michigan, in which she seemed to exult over the fact that she had succeeded in setting a young husband and wife by the ears on the subject of Masonry, as well as making everybody else in the car uncomfortable. Those engaged in a good cause are too apt to be uncharitable toward their opponents and too ready to take an unfair advantage. They should remember that it is impossible for all to see alike.

One of the topics of President Blanchard's address before the lecturers' convention at Wheaton was this: "There must be real love for men—all men (1 Pet. 2: 17.) This bars such names as wretches, scoundrels, liars, etc. We must avoid unnecessary, ill-timed and ill-natured assaults on men's opinions."

This gives the thought in a nut-shell. If we meet a man who is a Mason or member of other secret order, is it necessary or right that we set all the bristles of our nature, hedgehog-like, and repel him? I think not. He is probably very like ourselves and desires to do as near right as he knows how. We should naturally expect that he would defend his order. Perhaps his father was a Mason and has imbibed the idea from his youth that it is a very benefi-cent institution; or he may have been led into it by some friend in whom he has great confidence. In either case it will require mild and careful effort to convince him of the error. Heroic treatment at the outset would only embitter him against our cause. Listen respectfully to what he has to say, but do not yield assent. Refute his arguments by plain, fair statements. A righteous cause can always afford to be entirely fair with its opponents. It will perhaps not be necessary to refer to the murder of Morgan. They know about that, and I believe, individually, if not as an order, they are thoroughly sorry it ever happened. If he becomes angry and abuses you, that will be evidence to disinterested hearers of the weakness of his cause. Be careful not to retort in like manner. It will probably be better to change the subject; at least part "on the square" if possible. By such cool and manly action you will gain his respect at least and at another time perhaps you can talk against Masonry without greatly offending him.

Masonry is a wrong and mistaken system, contrary to free government and the best interests of humanity. I believe there is no man who cannot be made to see and acknowledge its error if the proper arguments or influences are brought to bear in the proper manner. It may be that in some cases a higher power than any man can command will be necessary. The proper influence in any case cannot be ridicule, misrepresentation or anger. Different natures will require different methods. Almost every man has had the invitation or temptation, at some time or other to join a secret society. A very little thing may have turned him away from or into the lodge, as the case may be. The fact that we were led away and are able now to see clearly the harm that is in it, should not lessen our charity for the brother who fell into the snare.

There are many good men in these lodges. They would not sanction any open wrong. They stay in because they are made to believe it is a good thing. They reason falsely and the small benefits are magnified to them and they are hoodwinked to the evils. A little tact and effort would win such men away leaving the lodges only their baser element, and they would soon die for want of moral support; or, committing offense against common decency, they would have to be put down by force of law or arms. But if you begin by attacking them savagely for being Masons, etc., you make enemies of them at the outset and lose all influence with them. You put them on the defensive and make them rabid champions of Masonry, whereas before they were perhaps only lukewarm adherents of the order. "Men will not appreciate the truth presented when they are repelled by the spirit in which it is presented," says Dr. Rabb in a little article which recently appeared in your columns. "Speak the truth in love." That will make converts to the anti-secrecy cause when harsh words will make enemies.

It is not well to charge Masonry with every crime in the decalogue. Give her but her just dues and she has enough to answer for. If you charge too much you will not be believed even in part. It is unfair to assume that Masonry is responsible for all the outrages of strikers in every part of the United States and the British possessions, for if she took a hand at all it would most likely be against the laborer. It is unfair to charge Masonry with all the dynamite plots and other horrors that have of late years startled the world. In a sense, perhaps, she is responsible, as being the alma mater, as it were, of all organized secrecy. But surely we shall find enough to "expose, withstand and remove" the evils of which she is the avoved champion.

In the first place, as he is a religious being, every man must have some religion. If it is not the true Christian religion, it is some brazen-calf worship that claims him. Masonry, and other secret orders in less degree, are some of the false religions, and every Christian man and woman should endeavor to win souls from these false gods.

In the second place, no good thing should be kept secret. If Masonry and Odd-fellowship are such blessed institutions why hide them by night in the top stories of buildings, with the blinds closed and only a peep-hole in the door? What can be more like putting a candle under a bushel? This is a point that has never been satisfactorily answered by adherents of secrecy. There is nothing good in any lodge that would not be better if conducted with open doors.

In the third place, all these secret orders are responsible for an awful waste of time and money—time and money that would make mankind infinitely better and happier if spent on the home and church, two God-ordained institutions, or in personal benevolence. How many homes that ought to be the most sacred and happy places of earth, have been robbed of all comfort and joy by the lodge! How many churches impoverished by those who ought to to be their pillars going "whoring after these false gods!"

These are some of the legitimate and vulnerable points of attack upon the lodge. There are many others, as Masonic hostility to woman; the silly tomfoolery of the lodge; their horrid and senseless oaths; their tendency to lead men into convivial and licentious habits; associating the best men and worst men on a common level and making the former responsible for the acts of the latter.

If our opponents laud Odd-fellowship and Masonry, comparing them to the church, we can ask if they have divine sanction, and whether they better fit man for this life or the life beyond. They cannot show that they do. In most cases men go into the lodge with a selfish purpose. They hope to get the advantage of somebody and think the lodge will help them. Every man should stand on his own merits which he cannot do in the lodge. As benevolent institutions Masonry and Odd-fellowship are shams because two dollars are spent upon themselves where one is given in charity.

Finally, let me say that all who are interested in seeing secret organizations done away with, should remember in lecturing, writing, arguing. or simply conversing on this subject, that it is not men, but their secret systems that we are opposing. Be careful not to condemn individuals. We can have all charity for the deluded adherent of Masonry, Odd-fellowship, Good Templarism, etc., and yet condemn the order. In many cases it will be well to make this very plain, giving your opponent to understand that you have no ill-feeling for him, but must denounce these secret systems. J. T. SUROR.

PITH AND POINT.

WE NEED AN ELIJAH.

That the condition of our Christianity, indifferent to evils and impending calamities, is one of infinite concern to those who care for the future of our beloved land is apparent, but these latter are very few in number—the ministry are but dumb dogs barking only at the moon, which, in its complacency, lets them keep on at their futile attempts. Wickedness is aggressive and truth and love should be to combat it, but how few care to let these things interfere in their greed for gain! The future of their children may be hazarded in the midst of innumerable evil influences, having sway in our land rather than love the prospect of national advancement. So saloons, lodges, papal superstitions and infidel license run riot in the land.—IRA TODD, LaSalle, Ill.

THE BOOKS ARE READ.

I am furnishing all the literature against secretism that is read in these parts for miles around. My books are getting badly worn. Masons are more interested now than the antis. The Masons often acknowledge that they are much behind their opposers in every way. I am often acknowledged to be a much brighter Mason than they; and when I tell them that I never was in a lodge in my life they think I am lying and say so. They call me by all sorts of hard names, but when I draw a book on them it never fails to silence their batteries.—S. C. TAYLOR, Pactolus, Ark.

A NATION OF IDOLATORS.

The first and greatest commandment is one with which God has had the most difficulty with the human family; for man will not be in subjection to the divine mind, but rather make unto himself a God of his own likeness. It is astonishing how wildly our own American nation is dashing into idolatry. One needs only to have read the secular papers for the last few years to see the terrible whirlpool. I fear that our nation is on its last round and that there is no hope of recovery. Where are God's standard bearers? How many of God's faithful witnesses are maltreated and with scarcely passing notice! Truly God will be avenged of such a nation as this.—H. W. FOWLER, Grundy Center, Iowa.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS.

LESSON XII. Sept. 20, 1885.—Naaman the Syrian.—2 Kings 5: 1-16.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Wash me and I shall be whiter than snow. Ps. 51: 7.

[Open the Bible and read the lesson.]

COMMENTS ON THE LESSON BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. No lot in life is one of perfect happiness. vs. 1. Naaman was the king's chosen friend, next to him in greatness, and commander in chief of the Syrian army. And best of all his position was not inherited; he was no unworthy favorite elevated by royal caprice to situations for which he was unfitted. His advancement had been all through personal merit. By his valor and military skill he had once saved his country, and in the grateful esteem of monarch and people held a place perhaps analagous to that occupied by our own Grant. But he was a leper. Doubtless he would gladly have changed places with the poorest man in Syria to be rid of his dread affliction. Envy of another is foolish as well as wicked. A wise Providence portions out our crosses, fits them to our strength; and there could be far more happiness in the world than there is if we had the power to interfere with its gracious ruling by any exchanging of our individual lot with another that we fancy to be more favored.

2. The humblest and weakest can do great things for God and humanity if they will but seize their opportunity. vs. 2–6. This little Hebrew slave girl does not plead her lowly condition as a reason for silence, yet how many of us from false humility refrain from doing the good that we might. It is evident that she had been religiously trained and kept her faith in Jehovah under sore temptations. The prevailing idolatry around her, the thought that she was a slave among a strange people, seemingly forgotten of God must have pressed hard at times; yet those early lessons triumphed. Home training though never so neglected was never so important as now when the constant tide of imigration is continual by scattering American households. In the godless mining towns and churchless wilds of our western frontiers what will become of the boy who has never been trained in a Christian home?

3. We must be saved, if saved at all, in God's way. 7–16. The king seems not to have had the least idea that he had a mighty prophet in his realm the fame of whose miracles had penetrated to heathen lands. So to-day the men who are the real strength and glory of a nation are unknown to its rulers. The politicians of both parties ignore the Elishas of moral and religious reform—the men of faith and prayer who alone can save our nation from the tremendous evils that threaten it. Naaman was like all sinners, willing to pay for his cure, willing to do anything to earn it but not willing to be cured in God's way. But Naaman repentant and cured, shows the two strongest feelings in the breast of the forgiven sinner—humility and gratitude coupled with genuine belief—that belief which though it has not seen God has felt his healing, redeeming, forgiving, power. No one who has not so felt the Lord has really "believed on him."

LIGHT FROM THE WORD.

What proverb shows the folly of envying another? Prov. 14: 10. Of what saying of Christ's does the king's ignorance of Elisha remind us? Mark 6: 4.

The successive defeats of Benhadad by Ahab and by the Assyrian king had so weakened Syria that the chronic war with Israel had dwindled into fierce marauding expeditions over the border, to plunder and carry off slaves. One of the most famous leaders of these forays was Naaman,—"the good fellow,"—a dashing officer, but, unfortunately for himself, a leper.—Geikie.

"Waited on Naaman's Wife." Like Joseph in Egypt and Daniel in Babylon, this captive girl becomes the instrument of making Jehovah known among the heathen.—Whedon.

"The king of Syria." Benhadad (son or worshiper of the Syrian god Hadad). Probably an official name like Pharaoh.

"I will send thee a letter." An autograph letter. The king, not knowing anything about Elisha, naturally thought that the shortest way to find him would be through the king of Israel, at whose court he naturally expected to find such a prophet. A godless man would suppose that even a divine gift might be bought, and a despotic king that even a prophet of God must obey a human command.

"Was not Elisha a little disrespectful, rather bluff, and deficient in true Christian politeness?' We do not know how fully Elisha was led by a devine monition within, but judging from the result, we may infer that his bearing was not displeasing to God. As a prophet, it was his business to rebuke sin of every sort, and it was necessary to teach this haughty heathen that "whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child shall not enter therein." It often requires far more self denial to resist the great than to yield to them; not all is pride which seems to the world to be such. That which Naaman believed to be contempt and rudeness, really proceeded, in the case of Elisha, from genuine love to him, and humility and obedience to God.—Bahr.

"He went away in a rage." Men invent a God in their own minds and go to the Bible to see if they find the same God there; if not, they reject him. If their a priori notions of Christ and the way of salvation are not satisfied, they turn away angry. If the diseases of their souls cannot be healed as they have made up their minds that they ought to be healed, then they will not have them healed at all.—Shedd.

"He urged him to take it, but he refused." Naaman's cure, effected by his meeting the condition of the word of the Lord through Elisha, is a standing type of salvation from sin by the Gospel. Our Lord uses the story as an illustration of the sovereignty of God (Luke 4. 27). He does not mean, however, that God exercises his sovereignty capriciously and unreasonably, but only that we must refer to the sovereign pleasure of God those events whose meaning and reason we cannot yet discover.—Todd.

A Wonderful Woman, A Wonderful Life, AND A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Flizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religious democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

THE CHURCHES VS. LODGERY.

The following denominations are committed by vote of their legislative assemblies or by constitution to a separation from secret lodge worship:

Adventists (Seventh-day.)
Baptists—Primitive, Seventh-day and Scandinavian.
Brethren (Dunkers or German Baptists.)
Christian Reformed Church.
Church of God (Northern Indiana Eldership.)
Congregational—The State Associations of Illinois and Iowa have adopted resolutions against the lodge.
Disciples (in part.)
Friends.
Lutherans—Norwegian, Danish, Swedish and Synodical Conferences.
Mennonites.
Methodists—Free and Wesleyan.
Methodist Protestant (Minnesota Conference.)
Moravians.
Plymouth Brethren.
Presbyterian—Associate, Reformed and United.
Reformed Church (Holland Branch.)
United Brethren in Christ.

Individual churches in some of these denominations should be excepted, in part of them even a considerable portion.

The following local churches have, as a pledge to disfellowship and oppose lodge worship, given their names to the following list as

THE ASSOCIATED CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

New Ruhamah Cong. Hamilton, Miss.
Pleasant Ridge Cong. Sandford Co. Ala.

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1885.

THE WHITE RIVER U. B. CONFERENCE has elected seven ministers and three laymen delegates to the General Convention of anti-secrecy churches. Let us hear from the German and Swedish anti-secrecy Synods, as also from the anti-seerecy Presbyterians, Wesleyans, etc., etc. Will Rev. Halleck Floyd of the Christian Conservator with Dr. Davis and Mr. Mc New have this matter in special charge; keep a list of delegates appointed, and some of us will visit them and consult on the time, programme, etc.

AT THE LAKE BLUFF meeting Edward Evans read an able paper which was discussed by Messrs. Hastings, Waters, Green Clay Smith, Miss Willard and others. Mr. Evans says: "What would you think of a Liberty, Abolition, or Free Soil party after slavery had fallen?" And he argues that the name Prohibition party should be dropped, and "National Reform party" substituted. This name is liable to the same objection. Success, the accomplishment of the reform, would make the name meaningless and kill the party. The name "AMERICAN PARTY," means "the Christian Commonwealth," which Charles Francis Adams, at Buffalo, 1848, called, "That grand conception of our fathers."

The Memphis Ku-Klux raid on Bro. Countee for disfellowshipping and "reproving" "the unfruitful works of darkness" is still stirring the colored population. Letters of sympathy from Nacogdoches, Texas; from Newport, R. I., are given in the Living Way, by Brinkley and Countee. It would be well if some of our friends would take that paper. It gives an insight into the status of the colored people of the South.

THE SCOTTISH REFORMATION SOCIETY states that Romanists are one-seventh of the population of Scotland, of whom one in six are prisoners, while of the rest of the population of all sorts, the prisoners are only one in one hundred and twenty two.

Men work in rings or circles. No one mind can do all that which society needs. Society is like an individual mind. Imagination leads, reason follows, and judgment, like a good general, brings up the rear. So in society—

> Reformer minds are always far before,
> They scold, they fret, they study, they explore,
> Calm Reason follows, and with cautious eye,
> Scans every cloud that flits along the sky;
> Last follows Judgment, and with brow serene,
> Walks calmly where more daring feet have been.

THE CYNOSURE EDITOR asked Hon. Fred Douglass, in his office in the City Hall, Washington, D. C.,—"Mr. Douglass, are you a Mason?" "No," said he, "I never would join a secret society: not even that military concern." If Mr. Douglass is candidate for Vice President in 1888, it will be the first Federal ticket with colored blood in it ever presented to the American people. And if the colored vote can be united on it, it will be elected.

THE COLORED PASTORS OF WASHINGTON, D. C., though some have been Masons, are a unit against the lodge. If the Memphis colored Ku-Klux, with white masks, send up "a little cloud like a man's hand," and Brinkley and Countee telephone to Washington, the whole heavens may soon send showers. Hatred of Peter's Pence made England and Germany Protestant. Hatred of lodge ducs may save the black population from the grip of the lodge, and lift up justice and truth from under its war hoofs.

THE EDICT OF NANTES, so famous in French history, was issued by Henry IV. of France, in 1598, and gave Protestants the free exercise of their religion. Its revocation, Oct. 22d, 1685, left Huguenots at the mercy of the cut-throat priests, and covered France with blood. Huguenots fled to all lands. Dr. Lemoyne, of Pennsylvania, and Judge Grimke, of South Carolina, were their descendants. Protestants will celebrate the Revocation, Oct. 22d, next, the 200th anniversary.

MANY PROHIBITIONISTS of large intelligence and high standing unreservedly censure some of the leaders of the secret lodge wing of the Prohibition party, as guilty of base immoralities. These censures should be justified or withdrawn. If any prominent Prohibitionist has been guilty of abusing the confidence of young women by attempted bigamy, his infamy is worse than any imputed to candidates in last fall's election; and Prohibition should drop him. If such bigamous facts exist they can and ought to be proved and published.

MR. MOODY SAYS in his Northfield speech: "We are hearing a good deal about reform; but what we want is regeneration." There are 39 books in the Old Testament and 27 in the New. The entire books of Ezra and Nehemiah, and the histories of the reformer kings, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, Asa, etc., with a considerable portion of the Acts are narratives of reform; while the chief burden of the prophets is made of denunciation of the lodge-religions of their day, gotten up by cunning and superstition combined without a Messiah or a decalogue and so destitute of pardon and ideas of right and wrong. Sparsely scattered through these are commands to "wash" and make themselves new hearts, and prayers for "clean hearts" and "right spirits," and the Saviour told Nichodemus in direct terms, that without being "born again," regenerated, a man could not see heaven. Mr. Moody needs to be preceded by reform, as Christ by John the Baptist's call to "repent." If he goes to New Orleans, as he proposes, preaching "regeneration" without "reform," he will sow wheat among thorns; and the goodness produced will be as the morning cloud and as the early dew, (Hos. 6: 4,) as it was with his labors on the Pacific coast. In New Orleans as at San Jose and San Francisco, the popular mind is saturated by secret worships, without Christ, and eternal veritics flit over their minds like the pageants of their Mardi gras.

ST. JOHN AND DANIEL deny all privity, co-operation or connection with the New York Tribune letter attributed to ex-Senator Pomeroy, applying to President Cleveland for office. Surely, as in Jack Falstaff's day, "This world is given to lying." We have reason to rejoice that St. John and Daniel, for whom the Americans voted last fall, have an unsmirched record; and thus far we are not ashamed of our vote. But the Cynosure supported St. John only because our candidate expressed his wish to withdraw, and we supported him as a violent exception to the obnoxious rule that candidates must not only accept their platform, personally and in private, but publicly and before the world. St. John is now a lecturer, as was Wendell Phillips, and he has a right to refuse to accept other duties which will clash with his business. As a citizen, he has fully declared himself to be with us. A national convention of the anti-secret denominations, with a lecture from Joseph Cook, will make it possible for him to accept as our candidate in 1888, without losing his bread. Shall we have these two things?

THE GOSPEL IN ALL LANDS.

The Cynosure ought to claim a place, and an honorable one, among the missionary papers. The most stupendous, and also most noble and glorious work ever deputed to mankind, is the evangelizaion of the world. In that portion of this work which assails the idolatrous systems, the false worships of earth, we regard the claim as just that the Cynosure deserves a foremost place; because, while most other religious journals are free to attack devil-worship in China or Greenland, Rome or Utah, they fear to combat and attempt its overthrow in Chicago or New York. No apology is therefore needed for devoting some space in the present number to the work of salvation from other forms of paganism than the lodge, which makes boast of the "Ancient Mysteries," while we derive light and hope from the Gospel, "the glorious Gospel of the Son of God," by whom alone we have access to the Father and forgiveness of our sins.

While we are grieved to confess that most of our churches are neglecting testimony, reproof and instruction respecting false worships in our own midst, it is also undoubtedly true that they are unwisely neglecting the best means of promoting the work abroad. The faith missions and independent missions, training schools, the testimony of such men as Dr. Pierson, of Philadelphia, the work of others like Bro. Ward in India, Bro. Hazenburg in South Africa, the Chinese Inland Mission, etc., is proof that the churches are awakening to a new day of power and victory for the Word. To such an end are the suggestions below written by Rev. E. W. Hicks, now pastor of the Baptist church in Toulon, Ill.:

ELECTIVE MISSIONS.

By this we mean the plan of churches and associations having their own missions, or missionaries, and instead of sending their money to a central agency, they would send it direct to the field. This method is advocated by able brethren, and their arguments are worth considering.

1. It would bring the churches and their missions together. Letters from missionaries would come direct to the churches instead of being filtered through official "Rooms." True benevolence is done as nearly as possible, at the point of personal contact, as Christ healed.

2. It would save the cost of agencies. The offices of secretaries and treasurer, alone, costs $15,000 annually, and yet, the offices are, without doubt, economically administered. Our district or collecting agencies, might be retained.

3. It would, by giving each church an ownership in a particular field, very much increase the interest in foreign missions. And, therefore—

4. It would result in an increase of funds, by just so much as churches or men will give more for their own work than the work of another.

5. This method is already in use, where single churches are maintaining native preachers or students; and are urged to do so, by our missionary authorities, as a means of increasing their contributions.

6. It would lessen the danger of centralized power; and it is a real danger. It has been the chief trouble in our missions for forty years, and it is the chief trouble to-day. It is the chief trouble in the mission work of the Congregational denomination. It is a chief trouble everywhere, but it is most felt in those denominations which have no hierarchical church government, and are therefore unaccustomed to being ruled by man. Authority was lodged by Christ in the local church alone, and wherever it is delegated continuously to another organization it brings trouble.

7. It is no small argument for this method, therefore, that it would remove the chief source of trouble, and leave our missions in comparative peace.

8. It would allow for that divine "variety in unity" in the operations of the Spirit, which is impossible when everything is molded after the views of one man, or a few men. The best results, we may be sure, are secured where the Spirit is free to work as he pleases.

9. The existence and success of independent missions are evidences of the tendency of the Spirit to break over the restraints of governing boards. There are in Asia a number of such missions, carried on by men and women whom God sent forth, and whom he supports, without the intervention of any human machinery. What vast good the independent missionary, Wm. Taylor, was doing at the very moment when the official board cast him off. Now they have made him a bishop, but he will find perhaps that his new Saul's armor is not as effective as his old shepherd's sling.

10. This is the Bible method, though, it is strange enough to put this last, for Baptist readers. Paul sent brethren to stir up the benevolence of the churches, but they were not constituted a standing committee to direct his movements. What a time it would have been, if the executive committee in Syria had ordered him to Bythinia, while "the Spirit suffered him not," but was leading him over into Macedonia! And were not the brethren at Antioch as competent to direct, as are the brethren at Boston?

Last Sabbath the streets of Chicago were filled with uproar from the parade of the anarchist societies, which not long since had a picnic on the Sabbath indifferent either to the laws of God or man or to a decent respect for their fellow mortals. But they must have another now because the workingmens' societies celebrate the first Monday in September and had refused the red flag revolutionists any place or recognition. The latter boasted they would parade 10,000 men, their real number was about one-fifth as many. The disloyal and turbulent banners of the former occasion were brought into use, but there was no speech-making, only dancing and beer. The labor societies made a fine parade Monday with a force of some 10,000 men. The line was composed entirely of secret labor societies, which was unfair to a number of more honorable and equally useful open societies. They, however, strongly denounced the fiery agitators of the day before and show therein a good sense which we hope may never forsake them. With the sentiments displayed along the line of march we can heartily sympathize, but in the secret methods for the promotion of these ideas the laboring men of Chicago are making a great mistake.

REFORM NEWS.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

CAMERON, Mo., Aug. 31, 1885.

At Washington, Iowa, on Friday last, I met on the platform a Masonic friend whom I had known in Chicago. He is in the employment of the C. & R. I. R. R., and we were booked for an hour's ride together. The conversation soon turned on my "pet theme," as he called it, and others became interested. The news agent gave marked attention, expressing his purpose to unite with the Masonic order, and a desire for information on the subject. I presented a chart illustrating several degrees and elaborated the system and expounded its mystic rites until, nearing Fairfield, where I stopped, I turned him over to Bro. Loggan, who, as I learned to-day, took him onward and downward in the bottomless pit of folly and blasphemy, and left with him the first three degrees of Masonic sin and shame as renounced and exposed by Doesburg and Pres. J. Blanchard. This little episode created quite a flutter and brought out the fact that the conductor not only, but a number of the ordinary looking mortals in the company, were "Sublime Princes of the Royal Secret."

WILLIS, KAS., SEPT. 1st.—Entering the car at Fairfield yesterday, I found my Masonic friend, the same conductor and news-agent who were in charge on Friday. Taking my seat I was soon accosted by the porter who invited me to a seat in the chair-car, which I thankfully accepted, and soon learned the occasion of his special interest. His friend, Mr. Jones, listened to a part of Friday's conversation, and returning to Chicago gave an account of what he had heard and advised this friend to be on the lookout for me. Mr. Harrison recognized me readily from the description, and was very desirous to obtain further light, which I was equally anxious to impart. There were present several "Princes" and my colored friend was a trifle timid at first, but soon became confident, and we passed the time on the square without interruption. I had a faithful talk with the young man to whom Bro. Loggon sold the exposc, and learned that he had read it through and was especially impressed with the oaths and penalties. His impressions had evidently undergone a change and he will, I hope, be saved from the lodge. This confirms me in the conviction that we should sow beside all waters, for we know not whether shall prosper, this or that, or whether both alike are good.

Stepping from the train at Atchison, Bro. Milligan accosted me and after a brief delay we came together to Willis, reaching a dark and silent depot in the midst of a fierce thunder storm, at 12:15, this A. M. Delaying a little for a "flash" to reveal a way to better quarters, we heard footsteps approaching and were accosted by Bro. G. H. Hemmingway, who escorted us to the parsonage where our every want received prompt attention.

Brethren Thompson, Houlette, and Loggan are already on hand, and large delegations are expected by train and private conveyance in time for the opening session at 2 o'clock, P. M.

SEPTEMBER 3d.—This is the last day of the State convention which has been a pronounced success up to this date. Bros. Richards, McMillan, Milligan, Thompson, Loggan, Williamson, Stone, and Houlette head the list of resident members; while Bro. Needles and wife and Eld. R. Smith from Missouri, and Rev. M. A. Gault from Iowa, have been active and very helpful members of the body. The spirit has been preeminently devotional, the councils harmonious, the attendance fair, and the addresses earnest and well received. Bros. Smith and Gault left this morning for Humbolt, Neb., and the convention will adjourn after this evening's session.

The convention has assigned to me the evening and the closing speech. Bro. Loggan was unanimously chosen agent for the State, and a plan for county organization adopted. All are in good heart and return with new courage to their respective fields. I go to Humbolt, Neb., to morrow morning.

HUMBOLDT, Neb., Sept. 4, 1885.—I left Willis at 12:15 and reached this place about 2: 30 this morning in response to a telegram from Bro. M. A. Gault. I was a trifle weary after speaking but met with opportunities by the way that even a drowsy man might improve. At Falls City I was detained twenty minutes for a train over the B. and M. road. There was a fine-looking gentleman among others waiting for passage, but unfortunately going in the direction opposite to that I was traveling. As a stranger, I accosted him with some general remarks, and he soon inquired, apologetically, my business. This I was not unwilling to give, and to facilitate matters I unrolled my charts and explained. All present were soon interested, and I trust some seed may bear fruit. I then asked my friend his name and whereabouts, which he gave as Elder T. J. Williamson of Iowa Point, Kansas. He added, "I was once an Odd-fellow, but I consider these secret societies the greatest evil of our time, and especially dangerous to the family." I gave him a copy of the Cynosure and explained to him the nature of our work, and promised, at his request, to write him further in the matter. I am told that he is pastor of the largest, most wealthy and influential church known as Christian in Kansas.

On the train I fell in with a plainly dressed man who supported the square and compass on his watch-guard. He had taken a severe cold which he was diligently striving to drown out with the contents of a quart bottle, which he drew from his "grip" at three different times during the half hour we were seat-mates. Either the cold or the potations so affected the brain and thickened the tongue of this subject of Masonic salvation that I could get little satisfaction out of him and felt a sense of relief in getting away from this specimen of the work of the craft, fairly pickled in whiskey. Bro. Bissell met me at the depot and at three o'clock I was oblivious alike to Masons and "antis" in the guest chamber of "mine host."

Bros. Gault and Smith called this morning and "dodgers" are out for me to speak in the "People's church" this evening. It required some self-denial to turn westward from Willis rather than homeward to my dear children, but I have learned that safety and happiness are found only in the path of duty, and so trusting myself and mine in the care of God, I am content and happy. J. P. STODDARD.

THE IOWA CONVENTION.

So many ageuts and lecturers attended the meeting of the Iowa Christian Association at West Branch that we shall probably fail of any extended report; had there been one it would have come soon to accompany the address of Pres. C. A. Blanchard which appears elsewhere. From the report of the Birmingham Free Press we copy these interesting particulars:

The Iowa Christian Association opposed to secret societies met in West Branch last week in the Friends meeting house. Lawrie Tatum gave an address of welcome and this was responded to by the president of the association. Rev. C. D. Trumbull, or Morning Sun, gave an excellent address. The Revs. R. Loggan, of Kansas, and C. F. Hawley, of Wheaton, gave excellent addresses. The powerful address of the convention was made by Rev. C. A. Blanchard, President of Wheaton College. The main points of his argument will be given, the address could not be reproduced on paper. Rev. J. P. Stoddard threw a great deal of light on the Secret Empire by his illustrated charts. These speakers seemed to bring over from Wheaton some of the inspiration of that great meeting. The last address of the convention was by Rev. J. Travis, editor of the Free Methodist, and as he had been a Royal Arch Mason, and had withdrawn, he was able to say much from his own individual experience.

The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, Rev. G. Warrington; Vice-president, Dr. J. C. Maughlin; Rec. Secretary, Rev. J. W. Dill; Cor. Sec., Rev. C. D. Trumbull; Treasurer, J. A. Laird; Lecture Committee, John Dorcas, G. Warrington, and C. D. Trumbull. The hearty thanks of the Association were voted the Friends of West Branch for the use of the meeting house, and for the kindly courtesy and entertainment extended by the families of the village.

The general feeling was that the place of the next meeting should be arranged early, and that it would perhaps be either in Page county or in Des Moines.

There was not as much interest taken in the convention by the State in general, and this may have arisen from the lack of a State lecturer. Rev. C. F. Hawley has now been engaged for the work in this State, and he will continue the whole year, should proper interest be manifested and money contributed.

[After the convention on his way to Kansas, Secretary Stoddard spoke at Birmingham, and the Free Press thus warmly commends the address.]

"The General Agent of the National Christian Association, the Rev. J. P. Stoddard, stopped at Birmingham on his way to the Kansas State meeting. He gave a good strong lecture on Saturday evening, and preached three times on the Sabbath to large and attentive audiences. He bestowed the most attention on the lower degrees of Freemasonry, but not without a few words in regard to the Holy Royal Arch, the Commandery, the Supreme Council of Sovereign Inspectors General, and the rite of Memphis. This last is quite a bone of contention iu the order, inasmuch as those, whose ambition has not been satisfied by the Scottish Rite and are desirous of something far more intricate, are pushing its claims on the order. The rite of Memphis has 93 degrees above the blue lodge. The personal reminisences of the lecturer and his experiences with the various members of the order with whom he came in contact gave added interest to the lecture and sermons.

WISCONSIN CONVENTION.

NOTICE AND SUGGESTIONS FROM THE STATE LECTURER.

WAUKESHA, Sept. 4, 1885.

EDITORS CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—The Wisconsin State Christian Association will hold its annual meeting for this year, at Waukesha, Waukesha county, Wisconsin, November 17, 18, and 19, commencing Tuesday evening 7:30 P. M., and closing Thursday evening, subject to the approval of J. W. Wood, president, W. W. Ames, secretary.

Now, friends in Wisconsin, please begin to plan to attend this meeting, for the business of organizing the State so as to have a society in every county and town will be brought before us and we shall need the advice and couns el of every friend of the cause. If you cannot come yourself, send a good man or woman to represent you, and write the president, G. W. Wood, of Baraboo, just what you think ought to be done, and how to do it, and how much you will do, and then go to work and do your part right off. But for fear you may not think of all the ways God has put in your reach to do work, let me suggest a few: 1st. Funds. 2d. Prayers. 3d. Talk to every one you can about our work, and get him or her to engage in it with you and help you go to the school houses and churches and get up meetings. If you cannot talk to the people, get some else to do it for you. Hold such meetings often, so as to keep it before the people. If you are not prepared to do this work, send to 221 West Madison street, Chicago, Ill., for "Seven Degrees of Freemasonry Illustrated," and study that book well and that alone will give you the means to make a good lecturer; but if you want more send to the same place for it.

4th. Send to same place for tracts, 1,000 pages for 50 cents, scatter them a foot deep over the neighborhood, village, town, county, and State in which you live, and God will bless us and save these lost ones, and pull down these strongholds of Satan. God only can do it, so we must all go to him for help and aid and we shall surely get it in full measure.

Waukesha is a hard place, only oue church that is free from secret societies, that is the German Evangelical. I do not know whether we can get the delegates entertained free or not, but think we can. I can get a hall for $9, so I think we will have fair sailing, and am sure God will be with us.

ISAAC BANCROFT.

LECTURES AT BUCKINGHAM, ILL.

On Wednesday the 2d ult. Elder J. F. Browne arrived at this village. Arrangements had been made for lectures that eveniug and evening following. In the first lecture the speaker proceeded to show "How we may know" the nature, laws and influence of Freemasonry. These points were clearly shown. Some members of the craft were present and gave close, respectful attention.

On the second evening the audience was larger, and the speaker, after reviewing some of the points of the previous lecture, arrayed, in proving that loyalty as citizens conflicts with the claims of Freemasonry, some very significant facts, as disclosed by highest Masonic authorities. He next proceeded to dismantle and to show the moral figure of the religion of Masonry. All propositions laid down were substantiated by quotations from leading Masonic authors.

The lectures were delivered in a good spirit, were clear and convincing. On Friday afternoon we bade Bro. Browne adieu as he took the train en route for Berea, Ky. We hope this section may receive other lectures, that the staff of truth's banner may be so deeply planted in this prairie soil that neither the cyclones of Masonic vengeance nor the blizzards of prejudice will be able to tear down the standard, but will by their greatest fury only stretch every fold of the banner so that the full lettered truth can be read by all.

We intended to see what could be done in Kankakee City, as we have learned that there are friends of the cause of reform there who would be pleased to have lectures, but our right-hand man being absent from home it was left for others. We hope it will not be neglected. CHAS. R. HUNT.

THE HOME.

AFTER MANY DAYS.

Go, bear thy precious seed a-field,
Go, sow in tears, with toil and pain;
Far in the future lie concealed
The treasures of the golden grain,
The joys that harvest-time shall yield
When thou with sheaves shalt come again.

Bear all the burden of the day,
Leave faithless souls to fret at fate.
Though thorns of sorrow strew the way,
And comforts seem to come too late,
Trust on. The promise may delay,
But it shall come to those who wait.

Those Baltic pines that shed their tears,
And wept afresh at every wound,
Dreamed not that down the distant years
Their grief transmuted would be found
Rising, in sunny, crystal spheres
Of radiant amber, from the ground.

Thou knowest not what joy shall be
When thou, one day, with glad surprise,
Thy tears transmuted too shalt see,
Those tears that now bedim thine eyes,
Changed all, by heaven's own alchemy,
To priceless pearls of paradise.

HEATHEN WOMEN'S WOES.

Mrs. Lucy S. Bainbridge, of Brooklyn, N. Y., who with her husband spent two years in a tour of observation around the world, delivered a very interesting address at a special meeting in one of the churches of Cleveland some days ago, a synopsis of which is as follows:

After a few introductory statements, Mrs. Bainbridge said: "Dr. Jessup has said that if only the men and boys of Syria were converted to Christianity, the country would again become Mohammadan within a few generations. This has been the trouble in most of the heathen nations of the East. The women have been unapproachable by the missionaries, and the fountainhead was not reached. I want to tell you how dark are the lives of these women, and how they can be helped. In Japan the mother teaches her infant as soon as it can understand anything to obey the rules of Buddhism. The little one is given the picture of a god, and he is required to daily sacrifice to it something which he will feel the loss of.

"I was in Tokio at the annual airing of a god. The image was taken through the streets, men rushing eagerly to bear it on their shoulder, while the women lined the roadways encouraging their husbands and brothers. On the road connecting the great religious and commercial cities of Japan scores of women are seen daily on the pilgrimages to the shrine of some god. The women missionaries work among these women, at the tea houses where girls are employed, at the temples and in other places. When we went into Northern China at every house we reached the women would ascertain whether or not a gentleman was in the party before venturing out. To be seen talking with a man in the street means a ruined reputation to a heathen China woman. Hence it is necessary, to reach them, to use only women missionaries. We went into a house surrounded by great white walls. First we came to the tablet room. Little tablets engraved with the names of dead relatives stood on little stands, and before them burned candles and incense.

"The Chinese believe that a man has three souls and that one of them resides, after death, in his tablet. We saw the kitchen god and other gods. A little girl lay in a bed suffering severely. Her feet were bound, and the work of preventing their growth had proceeded only two weeks. An infant had just died, and we learned that the body had been wrapped in a mat and taken to some far off place and thrown away. Then a sharp knife had been drawn across the threshold, to sever all ties that might connect the house with the little one, for they believed that the soul of the baby was an evil spirit. We saw a coffin in an unused room. The chickens were running over it. The priests, receiving salaries from the family, were searching for a lucky spot and moment for the burial. The body was that of the father of eight sons who lived in the house, and the priests had been engaged in their search for two years. As the family were rich there was every prospect that the burial would not take place immediately. The widow and mother-in-law of the Sons' wives was absolute monarch of the house. She had been born and reared, like the other women, in drudgery and slavery, yet she was now the absolute ruler of the household. She was in the kitchen making 'spirit money' for the benefit of the soul of her dead husband. The priests had probably notified her that his heavenly account was getting low. Daughter-in-law number five was dying of consumption. He went to her, and saw her counting her beads, and saying, 'O Buddah, Buddah, we take refuge in thee.' A bag of incense ashes hung about her neck. She was looking forward to transmigration, and she told us that she was in fear lest she should next appear on earth as a cat or dog. She hadn't her passport ready. The passport is a piece of paper which has been prayed over by the priests, and which is supposed to insure her happiness after death. I asked her, through the interpreter, how the future looked as she neared eternity. Turning her large eyes on me with a troubled look in them, she answered, 'Dark, dark, dark.' This is the Buddhist religion, 'The Light of Asia.' The mother-in-law refused to allow one of the missionaries to vist her. In another quarter of China we came at nightfall upon a small residence. The husband and wife sat in the door singing a hymn. Their child, its feet free from bandages, was asleep. An algebra and an album lay on the center-table, the former being used by the wife, as she wished to keep pace with the intellectual advancement of her husband. This was the result of woman's work."

Mrs. Bainbridge then described a woman's prayer meeting that was held on her leaving China. One of the women was permanently afflicted with a disease of the eye. She had had five daughters, and they had been cruelly killed by drowning. Her eyes were ruined by weeping. I noticed a little dried up woman, whose face looked as though she had gone through all kinds of grief. Her tongue was split in twain. This was done while she was a leader of a fanatical religious sect. We took the steamer from China by boat from the land. While we were at dinner in the cabin, one man asked, "Who were those people that just came on board?" "Only missionaries," came the answer in contemptuous tones. "What are they doing here?" "Oh, he's drawing a big salary and deceiving the American people, and she's out here looking for a husband. Neither they nor any one else can convert a chinaman."

In Siam I saw a well twenty-five feet deep and six feet across, dug by a woman with her fingers. She did this to store up merits, so that when she died and was transmigrated to earth she would become a man. She was reached by a woman and converted. It is beginning to be understood that the education of the women has become the great necessity in Hindoostan. Go into the houses and you will find in the centre, excluded almost from light and air, the zenanas where they live. The walls and floors are bare, and the plainest and scantiest of furniture have to suffice them. I have seen the child-widows, little girls nine and ten years old, with unbound hair and clad in coarse garments. They must always live so, even though they never saw their boy-husbands. They are careful not to let even their shadow fall on food, for it would thereby become contaminated. Their lives are spent in misery and degradation. There are 25,000 of these child-widows in India. Here is the grandest possible work for women. The Indian zenanas are open to women but not to men. American girls are wanted for the work. The climate is good, and the salaries remunerative. Four such young women are wanted now for four zenanas where the little Indian women are actually begging to be taught.

In Syria we found whole families sleeping in one room, in the utmost degradation. Boys were dressed as girls, and called by girl's names, because they had come under the influence of the "evil eye." Mrs. Bainbridge followed with the description of a Christian home in Syria, and after dwelling on the effects of the work done by the women missionaries, she closed by saying: "On the Brooklyn side of the great bridge at New York, over the East River, are a number of little dynamos, gathering in energy and sending it quietly along the proper avenues to burst forth into light. Thus with the women's work. It may be obscure, but its results are sure and brilliant."—Sel.

THE CHURCH AND MISSIONS.

The church of the present day professes to believe certain truths, and to assume certain responsibilities, among which is the duty of carrying the Gospel into all the world. But do they as a body believe what they profess, or perform what they undertake? Said the dying Cherokee girl to one who had told her the news of salvation:

"How long have you known these things, that Jesus loves us, and died to save us?"

"Oh," answered the lady, "a great many years—always."

The tearful child looked reproachfully on her and answered:

"And you never told us. My mother and my grandmother died without knowing Jesus. Why did you not come before, and tell us this great thing, that we too could have known the way of life?"

Who can answer this question? The Parish Visitor undertakes to answer it by the following account, related by a minister in Minnesota:

"A few months since," says a presiding missionary of Minnesota, "one who had been a heathen red man came 600 miles to visit me in my home. As he came into the door he knelt at my feet. He said to me, 'I kneel to tell you of my gratitude, that you pitied the red man.'

"He then told me his simple, artless story: 'I was a wild man, living beyond the Turtle Mountain. I knew that my people were perishing. I never looked in the face of my child that my heart was not sick. My fathers told me there was a Great Spirit, and I have often gone to the woods and tried to ask him for help.'

"Then he looked in my face in that artless way, and said, 'You don't know what I mean. You never stood in the dark and reached out your hand and took hold of nothing. One day an Indian came to my wigwam. He said to me he had heard you tell a wonderful story at Red Lake; that the reason why the white man was so much more blessed than the red man was because he had the true religion of the Son of the Great Spirit; and I said, I must see that man.

"'They told me you would be at the Red Lake crossing. I came 200 miles; I asked for you, and they said you were sick. Then I said, Where can I see a missionary? I came 150 miles more, and I found that the missionary was a red man like myself. My father, I have been with him three moons. I have the story in my heart. It is no longer dark. It laughs all the while.' And he turned to me and said, 'Will you not give me a missionary?' Shame on us who profess to be the primitive church, that I had to say to him, 'we have not the man, and we have not the means!' "

"There was a "primitive church," the members of which went everywhere preaching the word. There was a "primitive church" whose ministers did not wait for calls, or salaries, or societies, but who for Christ's sake "went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles." There was a "primitive church" whose members took joyfully the spoiling of their goods, and counted not their lives as dear to themselves, that they might finish their course with joy. There was a "primitive church" whose members resisted unto blood, striving against sin; and who labored and suffered reproach because they trusted in the living God, who was the savior of all men, especial-of all those who believe. A "primitive church" that stacks up its wealth by millions in stately edifices, or expends it in gaudy pomp and show; which draws princely revenues from landed estates and rumshop rentals; which wastes more money every day than Annanias and Sapphira ever dreamed of, and then says, "We have no means to send the Gospel to the heathen and no men to carry it," is evidently a different kind of a "primitive church" from that of which we read in the New Testiment, for that church had both men and means.—The Armory.

GIRL LIFE IN INDIA.

On the day of her marriage she is put into a palanquin, shut up tight, and carried to her husband's house. Hitherto she has been the spoiled pet of her mother; now she is to be the little slave of her mother-in law, upon whom she is to wait, whose commands she is implicitly to obey, and who teaches her what she is to do to please her husband; what dishes he likes best, and how to cook them. If the mother-in-law is kind, she will let the girl go home occasionally to visit her mother.

Of her husband she sees little or nothing. She is of no more account to him than a little cat or dog would be. There is seldom or never any love between them; and, no matter how cruelly she may be treated, she can never complain to her husband of anything his mother may do, for he would never take his wife's part. Her husband sends to her daily the portion of food that is to be cooked for her, himself and the children. When it is prepared, she places it in one large brass platter, and it is sent to her husband's room. He eats what he wishes, and then the platter is sent back, with what is left, for her and her children. They sit together on the ground and eat the remainder, having neither knives, forks nor spoons. While she is young she is never allowed to go anywhere.

The little girls are married as young as three years of age, and should the boy to whom such a child is married die the next day, she is called a widow, and is henceforth doomed to perpetual widowhood—she can never marry again. As a widow she must never wear jewelry, never dress her hair, never sleep on a bed; nothing but a piece of matting spread on the hard brick floor, and sometimes, in fact, not even that between her and the cold bricks; and no matter how cold the night may be, she must have no other covering than the thin garment she has worn in the day.

She must eat but one meal of food a day, and that of the coarsest kind; and once in two weeks she must fast twenty-four hours. Then not a bit of food, not a drop of water or medicine must pass her lips—not even if she were dying. She must never sit down or speak in the presence of her mother-in-law, uuless they command her to do so. Her food must be cooked and eaten apart from the other women's. She is a disgraced, a degraded woman. She may never even look on at any of the marriage ceremonies or festivals. It would be an evil omen for her to do so. She may have been a high-caste Brahminic woman; but on her becoming a widow, any, even the lowest servant may order her to do what they do not like to do. No woman iu the house must even speak one word of love or pity to her; for it is supposed that if a woman shows the slightest commiseration to a widow she will immediately become one.

It is estimated that there are 80,000 widows in India under six years of age. The prevalence of suicide among young females is so great that it has been brought to the attention of the courts. This can be traced to the oppressive control exercised by the mother-in-law in household matters over the daughter-in-law, independently of and unchecked by the interference of the husband. The son is expected to take the part of the mother against the wife.—Selected.

THE CHILDREN'S MITE.

Little hands, be free in giving;
Little hearts be glad to serve;
Each unselfish act of living
God fails never to observe.

Give not only gold and treasure,
Give your sympathy and care,
Love that knew not stint or measure
Jesus scattered everywhere.

All the goods your hands can carry
When you go to God on high,
Are your blessings to the weary,
To the sick and poor who sigh.

Angels garner up in heaven
Every gentle word and deed,
All the joy your lives have given
To God's little ones in need.

Sing your praises to the Maker,
Love and serve your kind the while,
Of each gift you are partaker,
God rewards you with his smile.

THINK OF MOTHER.

Young man, stop a moment. Ten years ago you left your old home. You thought you knew more than any man in the township. Your old white-haired mother wanted you to stay on the farm, but you wouldn't do it. Your old mother knew nothing about the ways of the world anyway. So she gave you a $10 bill, some new shirts, and her fondest blessing. You came to the city. You spent your $10. You ran in debt for your board. Then you secured employment in a dry-goods store at $8 per week. You have held the same position for ten years. To-day you receive $7 per week. You pay $4 a week for board, $1 for laundry work, $1 for cigars, and the other dollar for theatre tickets. You have no bank account.

You never lay by a cent for a rainy day. Every New Year morning you look for a box from your old home. There are more new shirts, a necktie, half a dozen pairs of warm woollen stockings, the work of your old, gray-haired mother's hands. She toiled night and day to make these presents for her dear boy. You were glad to get them. Sometimes you dropped her a postal card in which you offered your feeble thanks. Very often you forgot to acknowledge these presents at all. Look here a moment. Have you ever sent your poor old mother a nice present? No! Well, why haven't you? Just stop long enough to think how mean you are; what a selfish, hard-hearted wretch you are becoming. Are you not ashamed of yourself? Yes. Well, what do you think about it? Suppose you take a quarter or half a dollar and buy your old mother some little trinket, say a lace handkerchief for her neck.

You won't see the wrinkled hands open that package. You can't see the tears in those poor old eyes as she gazes upon that little offering, or see her lips kiss the little present as she murmurs: "God bless him, dear boy." You can't see all this my dear fellow, but you feel it. You will be happier. Life will look more rosy, your future more brilliant. Don't forget the poor old mother. Send her a beam of sunshine, my boy, even if it is only a little beam. Don't forget that dear old mother, with her wrinkled hands, her silvery hair, and feeble step. Drive away your thoughts of worldly life, my boy, and for once in many years remember your mother as God would have you. You will be happier, and so will your dear old mother.—Selected.

ROBERT MOFFAT'S MOTHER.

Robert Moffat, the aged missionary to Africa, speaking of his conversion and the devotion of his life to missionary work, said:

"I will tell you how it was: When I was leaving home for Warrington, where I was going to work as a gardener, my mother asked me to give her a promise. I wanted to know what I was to promise, but she would not tell me and still urged that I should promise. I was quite loth to give my word to do a thing which I did not know about, but I loved and trusted my mother, and so at length gave the promise she wished.

"'Well,' said she, 'I want you to read a portion of the New Testament every day, and wherever you may be!'

"I kept my promise to my mother, and it was some time after that, that I was brought to the knowledge of Christ."

"And did you then devote yourself to the missionary work?" some one asked.

"No," he replied; "that was later; I had gone in from the place where I was working to the town of Warrington on a Saturday night to buy a book, when I saw a placard about a missionary meeting. It was an old placard, and the meeting was passed, but it fixed my thoughts on the subject; and so I went to the minister whose name was on the placard, and after I had knocked at his door I would gladly have run away, but it was too late. So I saw him and talked with him, and afterward he introduced me to the London Missionary Society, by which, two years later, in 1822, I was sent out to Africa."

1822, and 1883! What wonderful changes have taken place in Africa between those two dates! Changes that have been brought about also by the work of that faithful missionary—Robert Moffat! Over the harvests that have been gathered from the deserts of Africa that godly mother will rejoice too, who trained her boy in the fear of the Lord and made him promise to read the New Testament every day.

TEMPERANCE.

A LAND FLOWING WITH WINE AND THE PEOPLE ALL DRUNKARDS.

Among the new missionary stations established by the American Board is that of Inhambaue, on the east coast of Africa, situated in about latitude 24 degrees, and about 200 miles northeast of Delagoa Bay. The missionary at this station, the Rev. Dr. Richards, lately made an inland tour of 150 miles from the coast, to see what he could see, and in a recent number of the Missionary Herald is given a very interesting account of this journey, from which we abstract the following:

On the third day out the explorers came upon the Amakwakwa tribe, of whom Mr. Richards says: "They have no gardens at all. They are so frequently robbed by Umzila's impis (soldiers) that they have become quite discouraged. Another reason is that the native fruit is capable of sustaining life, and is abundant; and, again, the palm wine flows freely all over the country. This palm tree is usually four or five feet high, seldom ten feet. It manifests little life, save at the top, where a few leaves appear, looking like a flower pot on a stump. These leaves are all cut off, and from the cut each tree yields daily about a pint of delicious juice, but highly intoxicating when allowed to stand for a few hours. There seems to be no limit to these trees, and we were surrounded on every hand by druuken men and women. Even little children were staggering about as ingloriously as their parents. It was difficult to avoid trouble with these people, yet our guns were respected, aud a ball fired carelessly at a near tree would produce quiet for half an hour. They were coarse, rough, drunkeu fellows, often plunderiug, often plundered, and accustomed to quarrels and fights uot altogether bloodless. One could scarce expect to find pleasure in passing among them."—Scientific American.

AN APPALING ARRAY OF STATISTICS.

"Once more an appaling array of statistics bids us pause and contemplate with horror the growing empire of the demon Drink. This time it is Continental Europe that is presented as the scene of his conquests in a series of reports issued at the instigation of Lord Granville by the Queen's Consular officers abroad. We can now compare ourselves as drinkers with our neighbors; and the comparison shows that Englishmen are the beer drinkers, Frenchmen the wine drinkers, and Germans the spirit drinkers of Europe. In one or two countries there is a slight change for the better. In Norway and Sweden the consumption of spirits has been growing less for some years. In Holland, where in 1878 there was a drink shop for every ninety inhabitants, legislation has diminished their numbers; and in France, likewise, legal repressiou brought down the number of punishments for open drunkenness from 98,000 in 1875 to 60,000 in 1880. In Switzerland the public houses are increasing in numbers three times as fast as the population. In Austria they are doing pretty much the same, Vienna alone, in 1880, containing 1,624 drink shops. In Denmark spirit drinking is responsible for an enormous increase in the number of suicidal drunkards and drunken criminals. Belgium affords the worst statistics of all. In that small country, in fifty years the population, though it has not nearly doubled its numbers, has come to consume three times the quantity of spirits formerly used; and in 1880 the drink shops numbered 125,000 and furnished an average of one for every dozen men in the land. Perhaps, however, the liquor statistics of the powerful empire of Germany, the headquarters of martial Europe, and the birthplace of scientific discoveries, will rivet attentiou more firmly than any others. Germany, then, is the land of the spirit drinker, and it is the habit of the working-classes that stamps it with that character. The yearly average of spirit drinking in North Germany is five times what it is in England. In the distilleries of the empire in 1875 and 1876 there was made sufficient pure alcohol for consumption to supply over ten pints of it to every member of the entire population. It is roughly reckoned that the North German workman takes his six glasses of schnaps a day; and schnaps, be it remembered, is two-fifths pure alcohol. In 1880 there were 93,000 houses in Prussia where spirits were sold, and 13,000,000 sterling are annually spent there on spirits. The results of this are traceable in more than 5,000 victims annually of dipsomania, delirium tremens, lunacy and suicide. For the causes of this dram drinking, and the means of stopping it, Consul General Oppenheimer of Frankfort, who has sent the report, looks, not to legislation, but to moral influences, such as abound here, but appear to be altogether wanting in Germany; and to physical antidotes in the form of better and more varied food, and more elevating kinds of public recreation."—London Christian World.

MORE OF THE SAME SORT.

The consumption of spirits in North Germany is very great; and out of a yearly average of 4,450 suicides in Prussia in five years, 508 have been due to dipsomania and delirium tremens. "The percentage of suicides among males due to alcohol was 13.40, whereas among females it was only 2. With regard to fatal accidents also, a large number of them were attributable to drunkenness. Similar statistics were furnished in connection with the lunatic asylums. Taking 3,106 cases yearly treated in the general hospital for dipsomania, 690 cases of delirium tremens in the lunatic asylums, 597 private dipsomaniacs, 508 suicides, and 311 drunkards accidentally killed, there is a total of 5,212 cases yearly of alcoholism in a fatal form. The Prussian States alone showed 1,921 men and 95 women treated yearly for delirium tremens. It appears that seven-tenths of those suffering from alcohol were in the prime of life—that is, between twenty aud fifty years of age. In the kingdom of Prussia in 1882, the estimated expenditure on spirits alone was about $65,000,000, while all the direct State taxes for the same period produced but $37,500,000. Taking the whole expenditure upon beer, wiue, and spirits, it amounted to $231,000,000, or more than double the amount realized by the Prussian exchequer for its taxes and stamp duties, etc.

In Belgium the showing is even worse. The use of spirits increased 66 per cent between 1851 and 1881, and of beer increased during the same period 15.75 per cent. The consumption of spirits, wine and beer for 1881 amounted in value to about $95,000,000. Although the couutry is so small, it contained in 1880 no fewer than 125,000 places devoted to the sale of intoxicating liquors. There was a public house on the average for every twelve or thirteen grown-up males. The suicides rose from fifty-four per 1,000,000 iuhabitants iu 1848 to eighty in 1880. The lunatics advanced from 720 per 1,000,000 inhabitants in 1840 to 1,470 in 1881.

LITERATURE.

"Grant's Memorial: what shall it be?" is discussed in the September number of the North American Review, by Launt Thompson, Karl Gerhardt, O. L. Warner, and Wilson McDonald, sculptors; W. H. Beard, painter; Calvert Vaux and Henry Van Brunt, architects; and Clarence Cook, art eritie. The same number of the Review contains a consideration of the question, "Shall our National Banking System be Abolished?" by George S. Boutwell, F. J. Scott, S. Dana Horton, and Edward H. G. Clark. Each writer takes a different view, Mr. Clark is author of the little work "Man's Birthright" which is attracting wide attention for its theory of property distribution. The most readable article in the number is ex-Sergeant-at-Arms Freneh's "Reminiscences of Famous Americans," which is a series of delightful anecdotes about the famous war-Senators.

The current number of the Missionary Review of Princcton, N. J., is a most valuable one. "A Short History of Christian Missions," from Abraham to Cary Livingstone and Duff opens the number, a very suggestive and thoughtful artiele; and as if to suppliment it Dr. A. T. Pierson's plan for the evangelizing of the world follows. Few men have so labored at the solution of this problem as the devoted pastor of Bethany church, Philadelphia, and if his plan is not perfect it at least reaches far toward that wonderful and glorious end. Upon this question no Christian can afford to be either indifferent or inactive. Upon the same line is an article on Co-operation in Foreign Missions. The reports of yearly work from twenty-four foreign missionary societies and five of the faith missions are full of instruction and profit.

The Library Magazine is always full-frieghted. From the September number take a few titles as promise of the whole: "Prof. Mivart on Instinct," Roman Life and Character," "Sir William Napier," "Local Government and Ireland," "An Appeal to Men of Wealth," "England and the East," "John Bright on America." The department of Current Thought is more distinctly American, and is a valuable addition. This number is accompanied by an Extra which is altogether native and ranks with the best. Maurice Thompson writes for it "Birds of the Rocks," William Sloane Kennedy, "John Ruskin and his Works."

THE CHURCHES.

—The British Wesleyans have 6,000 communicants and 20,000 adherents in Ceylon.

—The trustees of Union College have received a letter from Rev. Joseph T. Duryea, formally declining the offer of the presidency of that institution. Dr. Duryea gives as his reason that he intends to remain in the ministry.

—There have been added to the membership of the Third Presbyterian church, Chicago, during the pastorate of Dr. Kittredge, from other churehes, 1,639, and on confession of Christ, 1,527, making a total for the fifteen years of 3,166.

—There has been rapid growth in the Reformed Episcopal church during the past eight years. It has now ten bishops, 103 presbyters and deacons, 7,943 communicants, prosperous Sunday schools, and church property valued at $1,021,569.

—Dr. Lansing Burrows has sent out the minutes of the Southern Baptist eonvention. It appears that the white Baptists of the South have 570 associations, 14,102 churches, and 997,509 members. The colored Baptists have 7,480 churehes, with 871,-043 members. Total Baptists in the South, 1,868,-552. The baptisms for the year were 64,301 whites, and 38,538 colored.

—The present year being the bicentenary of the ediet of Nantes, has naturally been availed of for the formation of Huguenot societies. One of these societies was lately organized in London. Boston has a number of reminders of the Huguenots, one of the most notable being Faneuil hall, whose founder belonged to this sect, while the old Granary burying ground contains the graves of the Huguenots who sought refuge in the town after the revocation of the edict of Nantes.

—About two miles from Tacoma, Washington territory, is the Presbyterian church of the Puyallup Indian reservation. The church is a plain frame building, painted white, of neat, tidy appearance. The services are conducted by the Indian pastor, mainly in the native language. After the sermon the Indian elders often make earnest addresses. The attendance at church is usually large.

—The Church Missionary Society is able to report a large increase in the number of men offering themselves for service in the missionary field. Eighteen have been accepted for immediate service, including among the number eight university graduates. This society also receives men for training for missionary service, and twenty-six persons have been accepted for this purpose. May missionary revivals like this which has brought forward so many candidates for service in foreign lands be experienced in this country as well as in England!

—The London Missionary Chronicle for July discredits the report, which we could not believe, of the strangling of the Prime Minister of Madagascar by the allies of the Freneh invaders. It says that by the latest letters it appears that "his energy and influence were as great as ever; the existence of a 'peace party' was apparently unknown; the military organization was being quietly improved; and the people as little disposed as ever to submit to French protection." A large camp of 15,000 men is being trained by English officers, four or five miles north of the capital.

—Rev. George Grenfell, of the English Baptist mission in the Congo, has explored the Mobangi river, from the right side of the Congo, for more than 400 miles and finds it to average six hundred yards wide and twenty-five yards deep. He is the first European who has been on its waters. It is supposed that this large waterway is the lower part of the Welle, a river whose course is one of the unsolved problems of African geography. This conjecture causes much interest with those interested in African exploration. The London Times says: "With such enterprising explorers as these Baptist missionaries in the field, this and other problems are not likely to wait much longer for solution." Unlike most other great rivers, the Congo has no delta. It discharges into the sea by a single, unbroken estuary, seven and a half miles across, in which a sounding line of two hundred fathoms does not everywhere toueh bottom, and a current runs five to seven knots an hour. This enormous volume exceeds that of every other known stream except the Amazon.

The World places a low value upon the net results of the Concord School of Philosophy, which has labored through twenty-six protracted summer sessions. It calls attention to the fact that mankind has made marvelous progress in twenty-six years; new lands and races have been added to the family of civilized nations; all arts and discoveries have advanced apace, and especially social science; and yet "what grist has this long-running windmill ground?"

The World irreverently describes the School as an "adult kindergarten whieh annually draws together a lot of old women, of both sexes, to discuss at length 'the whatness of the wherever,' and other kindred subjeets suited to a philosophic second childhood." Yet we are asked to give up the Gospel as something obsolete, and try philosophy!

It will be time enough for the ehange when the Concord School, like the people of Williamstown haystack prayer meeting, have taken up some heathen eommunity and done for it what Christian missions have done for the Sandwich Islands and Madagascar. New Guinea would be a good place to try. And now that Theosophic Alavatsky has collapsed in India, the coast would seem to be clear for something of the kind.—The Foreign Missionary.

THE HOLINESS WORK IN MICHIGAN.

The State eampmeeting of the Michigan State Holiness Association will be held at Spring Arbor, Mich., Sept. 16–24. The annual meeting will be held at the same time on the eamp ground and will probaly occupy most of the last two days of the campmeeting. All wishing further information should write to the undersigned at Holiness Record office, Grand Rapids, Mich. Our holiness school in charge of Sister Mains will commence Sept. 1st. Persons wishing information in regard to the school should write to Miss Lura A. Mains, Coldwater, Mieh.

May a flood of light and glory fill the hearts of all of the Lord's children is the prayer of your brother in the work, S. B. SHAW.

A REMARKABLE MISSIONARY.

There is a remarkable man working for Christ about 250 miles from Pretoria, in Africa. Sixteen years ago he went to Natal, seeking employment. There he met the late Rev. Mr. Allison, who took him into his sehools and instructed him in Christian truth. After his conversion he felt a call to return to his home and friends in their darkness, and tell them what great things the Lord had done for him and started on foot a journey of over 700 miles to carry the Gospel to his tribe and people. His chief forbade his preaching, but for over four years he taught from house to house, reading and expounding the Scriptures, and was greatly blessed. After the death of the chief, Samuel obtained permission to hold public services and open a school. A buildieg was erected that would hold 600 persons, a school established, and the work prospered. Churches were afterward built in two other places, and two good men sent away for two years' study. After their return they took up the work, great good was done, and many turned to the Lord. Rev. Mr. Watkins, of Pretoria, invited Samuel to visit him, and describes him as a very little man, with the courage of the apostle Paul, and tenderness of the apostle John. He told his story all unconscious of the sublime heroism it contained. He had labored nine years in the dark wilds of Africa, unknown, unpaid, unvisited, unrecognized by any church.—Selected.

COMPARISON OF MISSIONS.

In the case of some of the denominations the figures refer to the northern wings only. In each, it is those who support the particular missionary societies, only, who are enumerated.

The Presbyterians number 600,000, and gave to foreign missions, last year, $648,000, equal to $1.07 each. They received 2,172 additions to their mission churches. The Congregationalists, numbering 387,000, gave $595,000, an average of $1.53 each. They had 391 additions. The Methodists, numbering 1,800,000, gave $394,000, equal to 21 eents each. They received 2,101 additions. The Episcopalians, numbering 364,000, gave $159,000, or 43 cents each. They had 338 additions. The Baptists, numbering 662,000, gave $327,000, or 49 cents each. They received 7,392 additions. There are 50 American missionary societies, with 248,000 members in the native churches. Of these, two-fifths, or 102,000, are Baptists, under the eharge of our Baptist Missionary Union. The growth of our mission churches last year was 8 per cent; nearly double the ratio of growth at home. And yet we have but 200 missionaries all told, against the 5,000 pastors at work here. Some of the societies do not employ salaried agents or secretaries, but most of those which do so, pay larger salaries to the secretaries than to the missionaries. The Presbyterians are the most partial in this respect, paying an average of $5,000 a year to their secretaries, and only $1,080 to their missionaries. Why this difference we do not know. It cannot be at all accounted for by the difference in the eost of living. The Methodists pay $4,500 to their home officials, and $1,800 to their missionaries. Next come the Congregationalists, $3,500 to the home and $1,050 to the foreign workers. The Baptists range as fourth in the order of this diserimination, viz., $3,000 to $1,200. The Episcopalians come nearer to equality —$3,000 to $2,666. The Disciples reverse the conditions, paying their home officials $500, and their missionaries $2,000. The United Presbyterian, Canadian, Presbyterian, Free Will Baptist, and Seventh Day Baptist denominations also pay their missionaries more than they do their agents. The following have secretaries who serve without salary: Reformed Presbyterian, Associate Reformed Synod, Evangelieal Lutheran, Lutheran General Counеil, Canadian Baptist, Quakers.

The Methodists paid the largest amount for home expenses, viz., $50,000, or 14 per cent of the whole. The Congregationalists paid $42,300 or 11 per cent; the Baptist, $35,000, or 17 per cent; the Presbyterians, $31,000, or 7 per cent. Five denominations, ineluding the Reformed Presbyterians and Free Methodists, report no home expenses, but send all their money directly to the work. The Quakers raised and disbursed $64,500, and the United Presbyterians, $103,000, at a cost of 2½ per eent; and the Disciples $36,000 at a cost of only 1¾ per cent. The largest expense is 22 per cent, by the Southern Baptists.

The smallest proportion of giving is by the colored Methodists—1 cent each; the largest is by the Moravians—$5.19 eaeh! If we all did the same our Missionary Union would receive annually 3½ millions of dollars, and the missionary societies of this country would eontribute annually 50 millions. The Moravians required but $9,500 to raise and disburse $250,000. The various branches of the Baptist faith eontributed a total of $430,000; of the Congregationalists order, $640,000; Methodist, $760,000; Presbyterian, $950,000. Total amount contributed in this country for foreign missions, last year, so far as reported, $3,420,613.

The American Board Congregational, was organized in 1810, and the Baptists were second in the field, 1814. Adoniram Judson and his associates were the originators of both of these movements.—Rev. E. W. Hicks, in Sandwich Church Visitor.

FARM NOTES.

RAILROADS, FARMS, AND FACTS FOR ALL.

Next to agriculture and closely connected with it, by far the greatest industry of our country is the railroad system, an interest nearly unknown a short fifty years ago. Half of it is the growth of about a dozen years past, as the mileage at the beginning of 1872 was just half of that at the end of 1883. The figures, brought up to Christmas, show the construction of 6,600 miles during the past year, making a total length in the United States of 119,421 miles, and the 79 miles lacking for a round 120,000 will be finished before this can reach the eye of the reader. Last year's new construction exceeded the entire length in existence here only 30 years ago. Taking the last census figures for agriculture, and reckoning the past year's building of railroads at the previous average cost per mile, we have:

Value of Farms in United States, buildings, fences, etc., (Census 1880)	$10,197,096,776
Value of all Farm animals	1,500,464,609
Farm Implements and Machinery	406,520,055
Total invested in agriculture	$12,104,081,449
Total invested in railroads in U. S. (Jan 1, 1884)	$7,270,000,000

That is, $600 have been used in railroads for every $1,000 value of farms, fixtures and live stock reported in last census—and the chief business of the railroads is carrying farm products. Of the 770 million dollars earned by railroads for 1882, the latest reports made, 203 millions came from passengers, 605 direct from freight carried, and of the remaining 62 millions from miscellaneous sources, a large share was for freight carried by express companies.—Query—Would the farms of the country have one-half or even one-third their present cash value, if there were no railroads?—The mileage of the railroads doubled between 1850 and 1855, and again between 1866 and 1874, and between 1871 and 1883; that with the two exceptions less than 3,000 miles were built in a year prior to 1869; that more miles were built in 1882 than existed in 1852.

During 1882, the latest period for which reports are received, the railroads carried 7½ times as many passengers (375,351,812), as the entire census population of the country! Of these, over 86 millions rode on the elevated railroads in New York City. Leaving these out, the steam railroads of the Middle States carried 13 times the population of these state (N. Y., N. J., Pa., Md., Del. and W. Va.). More striking still are the freight statistics. During the year the railroads carried 360,490,375 tons, or 720,980,750,000 pounds — equal to an average of 14,414 lbs., or over 7 tons for each of fifty million men, women and children! This was all carried an average of 108¾ miles—equal to carrying a ton nearly forty billions of miles (39,302,209,249 miles), or near sixteen hundred thousand times around the world, over two hundred times to the sun and back! And the average charge for the whole country was only 1 cent and two mills per mile, for carrying a ton of freight—in the Middle States only one cent per mile. Imagine a team hauling a ton of grain 25 miles for 25 cents, including driver, team, wagon, loading and unloading and boarding themselves!

Hitch up all the agregate teams in the United States and Territories. The census gives us nearly half a million (496,920) yokes of working oxen, and over ten millions (10,357,488) horses, with near two million (1,812,808) mules and asses. The last two, if two-thirds are in working age and condition, would give us over a million spans; or with the oxen about four and a half million (4,553,685) teams. These teams to do the hauling done by the railways, would each have to draw a ton over 8,639 miles! In other words, in order to transport the freight now carried by railways, every team in the country would have to draw a ton weight about 29 miles a day, during 300 days a year, and at the average railroad charges, would receive about 34 cents a day, for man, team, wagon and pay board feed and repairs; the balance for wages, interest and wear! But allowing for return trips, each team going 14½ miles a day and back, our whole team force would have to be doubled to do the freighting now done by the railroads.—American Agriculturist.

GASKELL'S COMPENDIUM

Of Self-Teaching Penmanship
IS Selling Better Than Ever.
NEARLY 300,000
HAVE BEEN SOLD SINCE ISSUED.

We stopped advertising a year ago because our orders were so heavy; we have now increased our facilities for mailing, and all orders will be promptly attended to.

Gaskell's Compendium of Penmanship is not altogether in book form. No one can sit down by himself and learn from a book alone. It requires practice from movable copies. The Compendium consists of four parts—Copy-slips, a small Book of Instructions, Ornamental Sheet, and Envelope or Case, into which these are placed for mailing. Teachers and others are offered liberal inducements to take the agency for it. Thousands of young people have acquired a good handwriting from it, but there are hundreds of thousands who have not as yet seen it, and who would gladly buy it if they thought they, too, could make good writers so easily.

Sent, Postpaid, to any address for $1.

Write for a copy of the PENMAN'S GAZETTE, the finest penman's paper in the world; engraved penmanship from all of the master penmen of the century; portraits and sketches; answers to correspondents, etc. Specimen copy free to those who have not yet seen the paper. The GAZETTE circulates in every city, town, village, and cross-roads in the Union, and is, therefore, a paying advertising medium for all good articles used by writers and students. Address

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

HOME HINTS.

CHOLERA DRINKS.

People are more frequently puzzled concerning what to drink than what to eat. And strange to say it is much easier to decide upon the former than upon the latter, for drink should always be simple no matter what the season of the year, or the day in the week, or whether in sickness or health. Milk for babes, childhood, puberty, adolescence, the prime of life, middle age, and old age is always a safe drink, unless tea or coffee is used at the same time (whether at the same meal or during the same day). Babes, children, and adolescence should never drink tea or coffee. Those older are always safe without them, especially in a malarious climate (and it is very little else west and south of New York). Tea and coffee should not be used in any household where milk forms an important article of diet, for fear of the temptation to mix them. Indeed, whenever drunk, they should be taken without trimmings. They are both excellent occasionally used as a medicine. Coffee is more difficult to digest, and is liable to cause a sluggish liver and nausea. Tea is safer, though it constipates, and deranges the system in this way. Frequently parties not in the habit of using it have during a siege of diarrhœa, and even dysentry and cholera morbus, been very much benefited by drinking it hot and plain and moderately strong several times in the twenty-four hours. When milk is distasteful, water cold (no ice) or hot should be the steady drink. The fact is, there is altogether too much liquid of all sorts drunk at the expense of solid food. There is a guzzling from morning till night; the stomach is constantly distented with drink, which allows of no healthy appetite or desire for food. Under those conditions there is a faintness expericnced which suggests hunger, but either there is no time or disposition to partake of anything substantial; water won't answer every time, and gradually something is added until a full-fledged appetite is established for strong drink.

If people would eat more, and at regular hours (no matter whether at home or abroad), of plain, solid food, one or two glasses of water or milk would generally be sufficient to quench their thirst and supply the necessary liquid their digestion demands. No two digestions are alike, some needing more, some less of something or other; but whenever stomachs are regularly supplied with wholesome food, and enough of it, there is very little call to drink immoderately of anything from one meal to another. In the majority of times when people imagine they are thirsty, they are hungry, because they were too hurried, or too weary or in a strange place, or something had happened at the previous mealtime which cheated them out of their proper allowance of food, and consequently the faintness or unusual goneness that made them think they were thirsty was in fact hunger. To drown hunger with water or tea, or anything stronger, is criminal, in that nine times out of ten it will be repeated so often that a habit will eventually be formed for some strong drink. As will be readily understood thirst is often spurious, different individuals developing different causes, giving us whims, habit, gluttony. And because water satisfies more easily and prudently, and is universal and free, its very abundance becomes its greatest enemy, and inclines the unthinking masses to hunt for something with an exorbitant price attached to substitute it at home and elsewhere. Anything with a burdensome price for purse and morals seems better than the simple aqua puras.

Another cause for drink is the thousand soda waters and spring waters which even the least pretentious drug shop displays temptingly upon his most foremost shelves. Could spring waters be drawn and drank at their fountain head, much fraud and health would undoubtedly be spared the consumers. While everyone realizes that the basis of all liquors is some form of alcohol, and that of the soda waters is carbonic acid, they do not always know that spring waters may be a home product and spurious, notwithstanding all the enticing foreign labels they bear, or the iciness of their cans or bottles. All this, too, in spite of the genuine springs at all of our own parks. Another cause for drink is ice, which was only yesterday used to set things upon to keep cool and sweet and in respectable appearance, but to-day is put into everything to freeze the very marrow out of the various edibles, to take away their natural bouquet and flavor, and even the color of the most familiar dishes; and we have iced water, tea, coffee, cream, milk, lemonade, wine, beer, soup, meat, berries, pies, puddings, etc., etc., until the whole mucous and muscular tissues of the entire alimentary canal, beginning at the lips are in a baneful condition of freeze and thaw and semi-state of collapse. Indeed, it is no longer what is ice used with, but in what does it not form the essential element of mastication or deglutiton? And the more ice is used the more one needs to drink. It never quenches, but creates thirst. It is agreeable and urgent to the whole economy only when the delicate Fahrenheit thermometer registers 100 degrees or over in the fevered mouth or steaming axilla, and then only in small bits to dissolve gradually in the parched mouth. Another cause for drink is salt, and the usual array of condiments so lavishiy supplied at the table. A very limited supply of these are occasionally good for a short time when the system sinks to a low ebb from continual illness, or unusual fatigue—even then rest is better than the whip to the flagging engines.—Odelia Blinn, M. D., in the Inter-Ocean.

The Coming Conflict.

A NEW AND STRANGE STORY BASED ON STARTLING FACTS, VIVIDLY PORTRAYING A MYSTERIOUS AND DANGEROUS POWER AT WORK IN THE GOVERNMENT, THE CHURCH, AND THE HOME.

"All will agree that this is a powerfully written story."—Evangelist, (Chicago, Ills.)

"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D. D. in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia.)

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

"The book will create a sensation in Masonic circles, and evoke criticism of a most relentless character. The courage of the author in attacking such a rock-rooted bulwark as Freemasonry is something to admire, Fanatic though he be."—Nebraska Watchman.

"Light is needed on this subject and needed badly, and we welcome this contribution to the literature of anti-secretism, and cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers."—United Presbyterian, (Pittsburgh.)

"A charming work, fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin;' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the book, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.'"—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ills.)

Thick paper, beautifuly bound, 352 pages, sent to any address for $1.50. AGENTS WANTED.

BATAVIA CONVENTION PAMPHLET.

A Staggering Blow!

Such was to Freemasonry the great NATIONAL CONVENTION held in BATAVIA, N. Y., September. 1882. It gave the world

Thurlow Weed's Great Letter

On the abduction and murder of WILLIAM MORGAN in 1826, which has been the most widely published of any Anti-masonic document. The dedication of a noble granite monument to the memory of Morgan, and the able and eloquent addresses of the Convention make this a most valuable pamphlet.

SEE WHY.

It contains—
1. Portrait of Morgan.
2. Portrait of Thurlow Weed.
3. Fine picture of the Monument.
4. The great letter of Thurlow Weed and his affidavit—almost the last public act of his life.
5. Address by J. E. Roy, D.D.
6. The monument oration by Pres. C. A. Blanchard.
7. Addresses on "Christian Politics" by Pres. J. Blanchard, on the Character of Freemasonry by Prof. E. D. Bailey, on the "Freedmen and Secret Societies" by Rev. H. H. Hinman; and very interesting personal and historical reminiscences.

The Master's Carpet.

BY

E. Ronayne.

Past Master of Keystone Lodge No. 439, Chicago.

Explains the true source and meaning of every ceremony and symbol of the Lodge, thus showing the principles on which the order is founded. By a careful perusal of this work, a more thorough knowledge of the principles of the order can be obtained than by attending the Lodge for years. Every Mason, every person contemplating becoming a member, and even those who are indifferent on the subject, should procure and carefully read this work. An appendix is added of 32 pages, embodying

Freemasonry at a Glance,

which gives every sign, grip and ceremony of the Lodge together with a brief explanation of each. The work contains 222 pages and is substantially and elegantly bound in cloth. Price, 75 cents. Address

IN BRIEF.

"What is syntax?" asked the teacher. "A saloon license is syntax," shouted the son of a prohibitionist.

In the last nine months the total immigration has been decreased 80,000 over the corresponding period of last year. There was a falling off of 34,000 from Germany alone. The only increase was from Ireland, which was 300.

It is stated that Dr. Clark Whittier of Boston has bought 60,000 acres of land in North Carolina, and proposes to divide it into 1,000 farms, of 60 acres each, on which he hopes to settle 1,000 families. The course of Dr. Whittier is in striking contrast with that of many monopolists who are gobbling up hundreds of thousands of acres of land in the west and is to be commended.

A mass of granite estimated to weigh at least 500,000 tons was displaced recently on the line of the Iron Mountain railroad, Missouri, by a single blast. A shaft 65 feet deep was sunk with lateral chambers, in which 5 tons of powder were stored. After the shaft had been nearly filled to the top, an electric spark from a battery half a mile distant fired the magazine with the result indicated.

Ocean waves, according to the Hydrographic bureau of Washington, during storms in the North Atlantic sometimes extend to a length of 500 or 600 feet, and last from ten to eleven seconds. The longest wave, hitherto observed, is said to have had a length of half a mile, and to have spent itself in 23 seconds. The most careful measurement of the height of waves gives from 44 to 48 feet as an extreme limit, and about 30 feet as an average height of "great" waves "rolling mountain high."

The following will prove a very interesting combination of figures: Put down day of month on which you were born; double it, add 7; multiply by 50; add your age; subtract 365; multiply by 100, add the number of the month you were born, (calling January one, February two, March three, and so on), add 1,500. The first two figures of the result will give you the day of the month of your birth, the next two your age and the last two the number of the month you were born in.

A story is told of a bishop in Atlanta, Ga. He recently addressed a large assembly of Sunday-school children and wound up by asking in a very paternal and condescending way: "And now, is there a-a-n-y little boy or a-a-n-y little girl who would like to ask me a question?" After a pause he repeated the question: "Is there a a-n-y little boy or a-a-n-y little girl who would like to ask me a question?" A little, shrill voice called out: "Please, sir, why did the angels walk up and down Jacob's ladder when they had wings." "Oh! ah, yes, I see," said the bishop. "And now, is there a-a-n-y little boy or a-a-n-y little girl who would like to answer little Mary's question?"—Baltimore American.

Mr. Len Piles, a citizen of Sullivan county, Indiana, is the owner of a mad-stone. It is gray in color, full of pores, and almost as light as a piece of paper It is a genuine mad-stone, and was brought to the United States from Ireland many scores of years ago by Mr. Piles' ancestors. Great care has been taken of it, and it has been handed down from generation to generation. It is valued at $400. Over 1,000 applications have been made by it. Two pieces were broken off and are owned by parties in Louisville and Terre Haute. The record of the stone has been lost, however, as it has changed hands so many times. The stone has been in this country sixty years, and has never been known to fail to cure a mad-dog bite when properly applied. It has been in the Piles family 200 years. The editor of a Sullivan paper says that parties living 150 miles distant from Sullivan who have been bitten by dogs have been brought to this wonderful stone and have been cured. The stone looks the same now as fifty years ago.—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Ronayne, Past Master of Keystone Lodge, No. 639, Chicago, gives the correct or "standard" work and ritual of Masonry; the proper position of each officer in the lodge room, order of opening and closing the lodge, dress of candidate, ceremony of initiation, the proper manner of giving the signs, grips, etc., are fully illustrated and explained. First three degrees. Paper cover, 35 cents.

The Master's Carpet, or Masonry and Baal Worship Identical, explains the true source and meaning of every ceremony and symbol of the lodge, and proves that Modern Masonry is identical with the "Ancient Mysteries" of Paganism. Bound in fine cloth, 420 pp.....75 cts.

Freemasonry at a Glance illustrates every sign, grip and ceremony of the first three degrees. Paper cover, 28 pages. Single copy, six cents.

Freemasonry Illustrated. A complete exposition of the seven degrees of the Blue Lodge and Chapter. Profusely illustrated. A historical sketch of the institution and a critical analysis of the character of each degree, by Prest. J. Blanchard, of Wheaton College. Monitorial quotations and nearly four hundred notes from standard Masonic authorities confirm the truthfulness of this exposition and show the character of Masonic teaching and doctrine. The accuracy of this exposition legally attested by J. O. Doesburg, Past Master Unity □ No. 191, Holland, Mich., and others. This is the latest, most accurate and complete exposition of Blue Lodge and Chapter Masonry. Over one hundred illustrations—several of them full page—give a pictorial representation of the lodge-room, chapter and principal ceremonies of the degrees, with the dress of candidates, signs, grips, etc. Complete work of 640 pages, in cloth, $1.00. per dozen, $9.00. Adoptive Masonry Illustrated. A full and complete illustrated ritual of the five degrees of Female Free Masonry, by Thomas Lowe; comprising the degree of Jephtha's Daughter, Ruth, Esther, Martha and Electa, and known as the Daughter's Degree, Widow's Degree, Wife's Degree, Sister's Degree and the Benevolent Degree. 20 cents each; per dozen, $1.75.

Knight Templarism Illustrated. A full illustrated ritual of the six degrees of the Council and Commandery, comprising the degrees of Royal Master, Select Master, Super-Excellent Master, Knight of the Red Cross, Knight Templar and Knight of Malta. A book of 341 pages. In cloth, $1.00; $8.50 per dozen. Paper covers, 50cts; $4.00 per dozen.

Grand Lodge Masonry. Its relation to civil government and the Christian religion. By Prest. J. Blanchard, at the Monmouth Convention. The un-Christian, anti-republican and despotic character of Freemasonry is proved from the highest Masonic authorities. 5 cents each; per dozen. 50 cents.

Judge Whitney's Defense before the GRAND LODGE OF ILLINOIS. Judge Daniel H. Whitney was Master of the lodge when S. L. Keith, a member of his lodge, murdered Ellen Slade. Judge Whitney, by attempting to bring Keith to justice, brought on himself the vengeance of the lodge, but he boldly replied to the charges against him, and afterwards renounced Masonry. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

Oaths and Penalties of Freemasonry, as proved in court in the New Berlin Trial. Also the letter of Hon. Richard Rush to the anti-Masonic committee of York County, Pa., May 4th, 1831. The New Berlin trials began in the attempt of Freemasons to prevent public initiations by seceding Masons. These trials were held at New Berlin, Chenango Co., N. Y., April 13 and 14th, 1831, and General Augustus C. Welsh, sheriff of the county, and other adhering Freemasons, swore to the truthful revelation of the oaths and penalties. 10 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

Stearns' Inquiry into the Nature and TENDENCY OF FREEMASONRY. With an Appendix treating on the truth of Morgan's Exposition and containing remarks on various points in the character of Masonry, and a Dialogue on the necessity of exposing the lodge. 338 pages: cloth, 60 cents each, per dozen, $5.00. Paper covers, 40 cents each; per dozen, $4.00.

Masonic Oaths Null and Void; or, Freemasonry Self-Convicted. This is a book for the times. The design of the author is to refute the arguments of those who claim that the oaths of Freemasonry are binding upon those who take them. His arguments are conclusive, and the forcible manner in which they are put, being drawn from Scripture, makes them convincing. The minister or lecturer will find in this work a rich fund of arguments. 207 pp., postpaid.....40 cts.

Bernard's Appendix to Light on MaSONRY. Showing the character of the institution by its terrible oaths and penalties. Paper covers: 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Freemasonry Self-Condemned. By Rev J. W. Bain. A careful and logical statement of reasons why secret orders should not be fellowshiped by the Christian Church, and by the United Presbyterian church in particular. Paper covers: price, 20 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Masonry a Work of Darkness, adverse to Christianity, and inimical to republican government. By Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong (Presbyterian), a seceding Mason of 21 degrees. This is a very telling work and no honest man who reads it will think of joining the lodge. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

The Mystic Tie, or Freemasonry a LEAGUE WITH THE DEVIL. This is an account of the church trial of Peter Cook and wife, of Elkhart, Indiana, for refusing to support a reverend Freemason; and their very able defense presented by Mrs. Lucia C. Cook, in which she clearly shows that Freemasonry is antagonistic to the Christian religion. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

Sermon on Masonry, by Rev. James Williams, Presiding Elder of Dakota District Northwestern Iowa Conference, M. E. Church—a seceding Master Mason. Published at the special request of nine clergymen of different denominations, and others. 10 cents each; per dozen, 75 cents.

Are Masonic Oaths Binding on one InITIATE. By Rev. A. L. Post. Proof of the sinfulness of such oaths and the consequent duty of all who have taken them to openly repudiate them. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Freemasonry Contrary to the ChrisTIAN RELIGION. A clear, cutting argument against the lodge, from a Christian standpoint. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Thirteen Reasons why a Christian should not be a Freemason. By Rev. Robert Armstrong. The author states his reasons clearly and carefully, and any one of the thirteen reasons, if properly considered, will keep a Christian out of the lodge. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Oaths and Penalties of the 33 DeGREES OF FREEMASONRY. To get these thirty-three degrees of Masonic bondage, the candidate takes half-a-million horrible oaths. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

ON ODDFELLOWSHIP.

Sermon on Odd-fellowship and Other Secret Societies, by Rev. J. Sarver, pastor Evangelical Lutheran church, Leechburg, Pa. This is a very clear argument against secretism of all forms and the duty to disfellowship Odd-fellows, Freemasons, Knights of Pythias and Grangers is clearly shown by their confessed character as found in their own publications. 10 cents each; per dozen 75 cents

Odd-fellowship Judged by Its Own Utterances; Its Doctrine and Practice Examined in the Light of God's Word. By Rev. J. H. Brockman. This is an exceedingly interesting, clear discussion of the character of Odd-fellowship, in the form of a dialogue. In cloth, 50 cents; per dozen, $4.00. Paper covers, 25 cents; per dozen, $2.00. German edition, entitled "Christian and Ernst," paper covers, 50 cents each. The German edition is published by the author.

Revised Odd-fellowship Illustrated. The complete revised ritual of the Lodge, Encampment and Rebekah (ladies') degrees, profusely illustrated, and guaranteed to be strictly accurate; with a sketch of the origin, history and character of the order, over one hundred foot-note quotations from standard authorities, showing the character and teachings of the order, and an analysis of each degree by President J. Blanchard. This ritual corresponds exactly with the "Charge Books" furnished by the Sovereign Grand Lodge. In cloth, $1.00; per dozen, $8.00. Paper cover, 50 cents; per dozen, $4.00.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

COUNTRY.

The losses by fire in the United States and Canada during August reached $5,500,000 the average for the month for ten years being $7,000,000. For eight months this year the fire waste foots up $65,500,000.

The commissioner of the New Orleans Exposition has set apart January 19, 20 and 21 for a special convention of persons interested in the improvement of waterways, including an interoceanic canal.

A patent was issued Thursday at Washington for an apparatus, composed of a system of springs to run sewing-machines, entirely doing away with the treadle. The motive power is regulated by simply bearing the foot on a rest.

Owing to the strike inaugurated by the miners in Pennsylvania 4,000 men are now idle, and it is expected every mine in the Monongahela valley will be closed.

Rain fell almost incessantly from Tuesday to Friday last week at Galveston, the signal service gauge registering a total of nearly 9½ inches.

The Republican General Committee of New York adopted resolutions at Albany Friday night urging the nomination of Dr. John Swinburne for Governor.

At 11 o'clock Friday night a mob attacked the jail at Knoxville, Tenn., and taking out Lee Sellers, an alleged murderer, hanged him from a bridge, several shots being fired into his body while suspended. Sellers cut one of the lynchers badly and also attempted to cut his own throat.

Fire in a tenement house in West Nineteenth street, New York, at midnight Thursday caused a panic among the occupants, nine of whom were rescued by the firemen from imminent death. The breaking of a ladder precipitated four firemen to the street, crushing a fifth man, who stood upon the sidewalk, two of them being fatally wounded and the others badly injured.

A hailstorm in Erie county Pennsylvania, Tuesday night destroyed crops and fruits and broke the windows of every building in the path of the storm. Hail fell to the depth of two inches.

Texas fever has broken out among domestic milch-cows near the stock yards at Detroit, Mich., but butchers are trying to keep the matter a secret.

Four masked men entered the passenger car of a Chicago & Alton train at Blue Springs, Mo., Wednesday night, and with drawn revolvers secured from the occupants small amounts. They then ordered the train stopped, and decamped. Blue Springs is near Glendale and Blue Cut, the scene of former robberies by the James gang.

BLUNT, D. T., Sept. 4.—Fred Coddington struck a vein of illuminating gas while boring for a well seven miles northeast of Blunt, 145 feet below the surface, yesterday. It burns steadily with a five-foot flame, and has been visited by crowds. Other bores have been sunk to a greater depth in that vicinity, but no gas struck.

Chinese miners who had been imported by the Union Pacific railway company, were driven from the pits at Rock Springs Myoming, Wednesday afternoon, by a force of armed white men, the Chinese fleeing to the hills for safety. Seven of the fugitives were shot dead by the mob, and many wounded. The Chinese quarters were then set on fire. The mob burned 100 houses and drove out 500 Chinese, who are now without food among the hills west of the town. The bodies of fifteen Chinamen have been recovered, and it is believed there are as many more in the ruins of the burned buildings. The authorities will send food to the starving refugees.

Major Aaron Stafford, the last surviving officer of the war of 1812, died at his residence in Waterville, Oneida county, N. Y., Sunday in the 99th year of his age, having retained all his mental faculties to the last.

At Buffalo, N. Y., early Sunday morning Thomas Ford stabbed John Bingham, the latter receiving injuries from which he died shortly afterward.

The steamer Wallula cleared from Duluth for Buffalo Sunday with 20,000 barrels of flour received from Minneapolis. This is the largest cargo yet floated on any of the great lakes.

Deadwood and vicinity was visited with a snow-storm Saturday morning. The dispatches state that the outlook for grain is gloomy in the extreme.

President Cleveland arrived in Albany Sunday morning, and left on the afternoon train.

FOREIGN.

It was reported Friday that King Alfonso will ask the Emperor of Austria to use his influence with the German government in behalf of Spain, and to persuade Prince Bismarck to abandon his scheme of occupation of the Caroline islands. King Alfonso, it is further reported, says that the affair has so aroused the Spanish people that he would lose his throne if he should recede from the claim of Spain to the islands, and that Spain would be ruined if he should push his claim.

The Spanish government has received official notice from the commander of the warships dispatched to the Caroline Islands that the fleet arrived at Yap, one of the group, Aug. 21, prepared to occupy it, but delayed landing. Three days later a German gunboat arrived, landed a force, and immediately hoisted the German flag, despite the protests of the Spanish commander. Upon receipt of the news a cabinet council was held, and the king summoned to attend. It was decided to adopt energetic measures, and courtmartial the commander at Yap for inefficiency. When the seizure became generally known a mob assembled in front of the German embassy, tore down the coat-of-arms, and dragged it through the streets. Troops were called to disperse the mob. The insult to the German embassy created great excitement in Berlin, and the German press declare it must be atoned for.

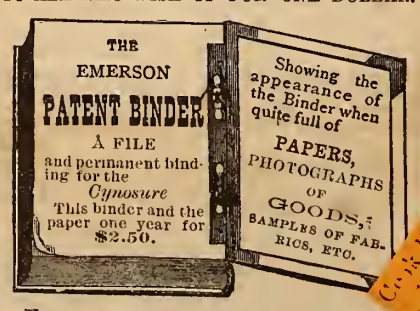
The expulsion of the Russians from Prussia is being rigidly enforced, and in many places the sufferers are persons who have been residents for as long as twenty years, and performed military service. Appeals against the expulsion have been made in vain.

Petitions are being circulated in Egypt for the establishment of a British protectorate over the country, to which the Khedive is strongly opposed.

Four Arctic expeditions are being fitted out by Germany.

Prussia has agreed to contribute 50,000,000 marks to the German project for the new canal to the Baltic sea.

The French minister of Public instruction has issued notice to the clergy that they must refrain from influencing the people in favor of any political party.



There were 2,147 new cases of cholera and 779 deaths in Spain Saturday. The situation at Marseilles and Toulon is improving.

AN INIMITABLE SUMMER RESORT.

The largest majority of health or pleasure-seeking tourists that have not the requisite time and wealth to visit the mountain resorts of Colorado or the cool lake retreats of Northern Wisconsin and Minnesota, long for a resort that will combine the benefits of easy access, pure air and enough natural attraction to entertain and invigorate the spirit. Origon, Ogle county, Illinois, possesses the combination in the greatest degree: On the Burlington route, but 99 miles from Chicago, and reached from that point twice per day in less than four hours, with good and ample hostelries; numbers of springs gushing forth pure and health-giving water; the beautiful Rock river; towering hills and massive rocks, one can well imagine that all the popular and interesting resorts of the continent have been merged together to be enjoyed at this delightful place. Detailed information furnished upon application to Perceval Lowell, General Passenger Agent C., B. & Q. R. R., Chicago, or M. L. Ettinger, General Ticket Agent, C. & I. R. R., Rochelle, Ill.

It seems that Henry Ward Beecher, while he has been preaching for months the gospel of an evolution of progress in respect to nature, holds to a contrary theory in morals, since he advocates high license for the saloon. All the eloquence would have departed from his greater father, Lyman Beecher, in that celebrated temperance speech which Miss West describes so graphically, had he been given a prophet's ken to see his son's backsliding.

The action of the Georgia State Agricultural Society at its recent convention in Marietta, reminds us of the old Puritan times or even of the years when the ancient Hebrews obeyed joyfully the commands of their real King and true God. The Society voted to request the Governor of the State to appoint a day "of thanksgiving and praise to our heavenly Father for his goodness and mercy in blessing us with good seasons, good crops and the prospects of a bountiful harvest." It will seem like the millenium when the farmers' societies shall thus turn devotedly to the Giver of seed-time and harvest instead of wasting their time and debauching their morals with horse-races.

The well known wife-beater, saloon-keeper, drinker, bruiser, and professional pugilist Sullivan of Boston, has probably at last found his match. He was arrested last Sabbath afternoon in Cleveland, for playing base ball, at the instance of the Law and Order League, and on the oath of Mr. Rockafeller, of the Standard Oil Company. Sullivan, who has had a monopoly as champion of the pugilistic business, will now be beaten by a monopoly in kerosene. Let his punishment be so exemplary that the base ball business on the Sabbath will be given up.

The yatching business goes by contraries about New York Bay. The great international race between the English boat Genesta and the American Puritan, had not up to Saturday amounted to anything but expense. Three races were down in the programme. Two of them failed because the wind would not blow; and the vessels are both misnamed. "Genesta" is the Latin for broom, and is used in imitation of the Dutch Admiral Von Tromp, who fastened a broom to his mast-head and nearly swept the British from the seas during last century. But so far the Genesta only resembles a broom because she follows behind. The Puritan belies her name more seriously, because her master has little or no regard for the Lord's day, but sails about as if it was any other. The Gencsta, on the other hand, most commendably, regards the Sabbath, both officers and men. We hope she will win at last and teach our Yankee Sabbath-breakers a lesson.

BENJAMIN RUSH.

[See pages 3 and 8.]

There was a fear expressed, when President Cleveland appointed Judge Powers, of Michigan, to succeed Judge Hunter as Chief Justice of Utah, that the vigorous and upright course of the latter would not be followed up. But we hope otherwise. Judge Powers has just been called to Washington to consult with the President about Mormon affairs. He represents the latter as determined to carry on the war against the atrocious system to the uttermost and instructs the judge and officers of the court to carry out the law to its utmost rigor. Judge Powers represents the Mormons in much fear of the law, and some of their prominent men, as John Taytor and George Q. Cannon, late "honorable" member of Congress, as fugitives from justice. Let the work go on, and when the Edmund's law is wrung dry let us have something with more backbone to it.

John A. Logan has taken another hitch toward the White House. He was about through with the "Ancient and Accepted" or Scotch rite in Masonry a year ago, and has probably got ere this his honorary ticket to the circle of Sovereign Grand Inspectors General. Last Friday, while in Chicago attending the reunion of the officers of the Army of the Tennessee, he was initiated into the so-called mysteries of Royal Arch Masonry in the hall of Washington Chapter on the corner of Randolph and Halsted streets, thus adding to his political qualifications the titles of York Rite Masonry. Many of the readers of the Cynosure are familiar with the blasphemous ceremonies connected with these degrees, the journey to Jerusalem, the burning bush, etc., and they will remember that three candidates are needed for the show. Gen. A. L. Chetlain, a man whose name we are grieved and surprised to see, was one of the three, and Gen. Joseph Stockton the other. That the popular and political effect might be as great as posible, Logan followed the example of Le Grand Monarque, Louis XIV., who used to dine and dress in public. The Masons kept "open house" during the afternoon and evening when Logan was going over the "rough road." The daily papers say that no less than 1,200 Masons were present. The hall cannot contain anything like so many and so they were coming and going, but no less than 600 were present at any one time. This affair the Masons claim was "one of the most important events that every transpired in Masonic circles in this city." It can be so interpreted only in the light of the effect it will have on Logan's prospects for 1888.

1785—OUR CENTENNIAL—1885.

See what a century has wrought!
Think of the touching lessons taught
By hope, and love, and truth, and thought,
In one swift hundred years of trial,
To drive the evil spirit hence
With the plain force of common sense,
And logic lit with eloquence,
And royal gifts of self-denial!

The pulpits' thunder has been heard
Around the world; hearts have been stirred
By song and speech and quoted Word.
No frail, broken reed we lean upon.
The press has scattered leaves afar,
Which for the nation's healing are;
And faith has been our guiding-star
When harsh storms have swept the horizon.

From phase to phase the cause has sped;
From height to height by courage led.
Our armies moved where light was shed
From heaven on our triumphal banners.
There's "music in the air," and we Salute with song the century
Of the reform we live to see.
The welkin rings with our hosannas!

And we do not rejoice alone.
Each sainted father who has gone
To wear his crown and grace his throne
Looks from the battlements above us
And sees the work so well begun
Shining like cities in the sun.
God grant the work that's left undone
May still be helped by those who love us!

The "morning star"* whose radiance lent
Soft light in a dark firmament,
Now fills with hope a continent,
And gives the cloud a silver lining.
The flood recedes, the waves grow less,
In lands deluged in drunkenness.
The bow of heavenly righteousness
And promise o'er the world is shining.

THE RIGHT OF INSPECTION.

BY REV. H. H. HINMAN.

It will be admitted by all that the family, the church and the state are fundamental to civilized society, and that whatever interferes with their just province is destructive of the public good. Freemasonry claims not to interfere with any social, religious or civil obligation. Let us examine this claim in the light of history and Masonic authority.

It is a landmark, "That Freemasonry is in the possession of secrets that cannot be divulged" (Mackey's Ritualist, p. 240). These secrets are said to be of great value. "Masonry includes within its circle almost every branch of polite learning. Under the veil of its mysteries is comprehended a regular system of science" (Sickel's Monitor, p. 62). "By its legend and its ritual it is implied that we have been saved from the grave of iniquity and quickened into another and better existence" (Mackey's Ritualist, p. 109).

Now, one of the first and highest duties I owe to my family is to communicate important truth. If under the veil of Masonic mysteries is comprehended a regular system of science I certainly ought to lift the veil that my son and daughter may see it. If "by its legend and its ritual" it is implied that we have been saved from the grave of iniquity and quickened into another and better existence, then surely my wife, father and mother are clearly entitled to its legend and ritual. If I withhold them I am guilty of a grievous wrong against those I have sworn to love and protect. The marriage covenant is the oldest and most sacred of human engagements. It implies mutual confidence, for whatever concerns one concerns also the other, for "they shall be no more twain but one flesh." An institution that forbids the wife to make any inquiry into the society, doings or business of her husband, does interfere with her rights and his. A secret sworn covenant with those who may be the basest of men, into which she has no right to make any inquiry does seriously interfere with the marriage vow.

The church has manifestly a right to inquire into the character and life of those who offer themselves for membership. Suppose a Mason applies for admission to a church. The pastor aware of his existing relations says that some members of the church think that Masonry is wrong and ought not to be approved by extending fellowship to Masons. He thinks it quite possible that they are mistaken, and as they wish to act neither rashly nor uncharitably he suggests that the brother will briefly explain just what Masonry is, giving its obligations, penalties and ceremonies; and if, after knowing the facts, it is believed to be such an institution as a Christian can consistently be connected with; and if, as they hope, he is otherwise worthy, they will gladly accept him. But those are the things he has sworn "always to conceal and never reveal." He says that in his opinion Masonry does not interfere with his Christian duties. But the pastor says, "Perhaps not, but some of the brethren who have been Masons, think it does. Until we know what obligations you have taken, and that they are innocent, I do not see how we can receive you, for none of us wish to give countenance to questionable morality. If the church may not enquire into that department of your life which some of the brethren think to be immoral, then surely it is denied the exercise of its legitimate rights, and cannot with decent self-respect proceed any farther."

Suppose the Mason is a minister of the Gospel. Having finished his education he is about to be ordained and installed. The venerable brethren who have met for that purpose have assumed a weighty responsibility. Henceforth the honor or shame of this ministerial brother is to be measurably theirs. Before they vouch for his soundness in doctrine and practice they have a right to know what that doctrine and practice are. They have met for that purpose. After relating his religious experience and doctrinal views, he is asked if he has ever entered into any other covenant besides the covenant of the church?

"O yes, I am a Freemason."

"Well, what did you promise in your Masonic covenant?"

"I promised not to tell."

"But you can at least tell us what you did not promise. We have heard that Master Masons swear to conceal all the secrets of a brother Mason except murder and treason; that they swear this under death penalty, and that they say, 'So help me God and keep me steadfast in the due performance of the same.' Now did you take this obligation?"

"Why do you ask?"

"Because we have a right to know. If you swore this oath it seems to me you swore to do wickedly; to conceal crime provided it was neither murder nor treason; and that when you asked God to help you do it, you blasphemed his holy name in asking him to help you wickedly."

"I am not at liberty to say whether I took such obligations or not."

"Then your liberty is not Christian liberty. You either did or did not so promise. If you did not, you have only to say so; but if you did, Christian candor requires that you confess it. Christ said, 'Except ye be converted, and become as a little child, ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven.' Your answer has nothing in it of child-like simplicity."

"Well, I can make no other answer."

"Then we cannot proceed."

Suppose this Masonic minister is by and by convinced that Masonry is wrong, and that he has sinned against Christ and his brethren. He remembers the command "Confess your faults one to another," (Jas. 5: 16)and that God has said, "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper, but whoso confesseth and forsaketh them shall find mercy." He goes to the church to confess, but there meets the Worshipful Master of the lodge, who bids him remember his obligation and beware! But he replies, "Did not you assure me that my Masonic obligation should not conflict with my duty to myself, my country, or my God?"

"Certainly."

"Well, with my present views it does conflict, and hence I cannot be bound by it."

"Your present views! What has that to do with your Masonic covenant? If we allow every person to set aside his solemn oath, simply because he has changed his mind, there is an end to Masonry at once."

"But have I no right of private judgment? Have I, like Esau, sold my birthright, so that I have no place for repentance?"

"You swore to 'always hail, ever conceal and never reveal,' that was in your oath. Now listen to Masonic law: 'It is the covenant that makes the Mason. He cannot cast off or nullify his Masonic covenant. No law of the land can effect it. No authority of the church can weaken it. It is irrevocable.' (Webb's Monitor by Morris, p. 240.) 'If we would be Masons, we must yield private judgment.' (Pierson's Traditions of Masonry, p. 30)."

"But repentance of what I feel to be sin, is a duty I owe to God: confession, a duty I owe to my brethren. If my Masonic covenant forbids this, then your assurance was false, and the covenant is void."

He proceeds to make his confession and is at once denounced as a traitor and reviled as a perjured wretch. Simply because he obeyed the law of the Lord rather than the law of the lodge.

Not less marked are the discrepencies between the duties of citizenship and the promises of Masonry. One hundred citizens of Pennsylvania were summoned to appear before the legislature of that State and answer certain questions concerning the system of Freemasonry to which they belonged. More than one hundred petitions, signed by thousands of people, had been presented, asking that such an investigation be had. Of the number summoned were ex-Governor Wolfe, George M. Dallas, and all the officers of the Grand Lodge; who were required to bring their official records with them. They refused obedience. They brought no records; refused to be sworn, and some of them treated the legislature with rudeness and contempt. A writ of attachment was issued, but they nearly all obeyed the law of the lodge, rather than the law of the land. They published an address in which they say, "The subscribers, citizens of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, were recently summoned before a committee appointed by the House of Representatives, and required to testify as witnesses on oath, in relation to what were called the evils of Freemasonry. They believe it to be a duty to the cause of civil liberty, to the constitution, to their families, and themselves, to resist a compulsory examination for that purpose, and they obeyed the dictates of conscience." How tender were these Masons of the rights of conscience in regard to disobedience to civil law! Not so with the mandates of the lodge. "The first duty of the reader of this synopsis [of Masonic law] is to obey the edicts of his Grand Lodge. Right or wrong, his very existence as a Mason hangs on obedience to the powers immediately set above him. The one unpardonable sin of a Mason is contumacy or disobedience." (Webb's Monitor by Morris, p. 196).

These distinguished Masons acted in perfect harmony with the laws of Masonry when they treated the legislature with "contumacy and disobedience." "A disclosure of any of the secrets which a Mason has promised to always conceal and never reveal is a heinous crime." (Mackey's Jurisprudence, p. 511). So it was a heinous crime to tell the legislature whether as Royal Arch Masons they were sworn to "espouse the cause of a companion Royal Arch Mason so far as to extricate him from any difficulty whether he is right or wrong." It is a heinous Masonic crime to obey civil rather than Masonic law. "Should our [Masonic] obligations ever come in conflict with statute laws, we should first see that the law of God is not violated, and then refer the question to our lodge. Whatever is thus AUTHORITATIVELY given, we will follow with all the strength of mind we possess." (Rob Morris).

The right of inspection is a right inherent both in the church and the state. It is one of the special objects of the church to exercise watch-care over its members, and in case of discipline to enquire into their conduct, either open or secret, which may be feared to be not in harmony with the law of Christ. Every church member agrees to submit to such inspection of his conduct, and the church promises to exercise it. The oath to always conceal and never reveal what is done in the lodge is a direct violation of the church covenant, and a direct interference with the rights of the church. It destroys church fellowship and in so doing must sooner or later destroy the church.

The right of the state to inspect all institutions and practices that in any wise affect the public good is inherent and indispensible. The public good is the paramount law. In the exercise of this right courts are organized and held. Grand Juries have this as a special object, and the National and State legislatures send for persons and papers and make the fullest examination into any facts that they may desire to know. No privacy is so sacred but it may be invaded, and no covenants are so binding but they may be set aside if the public good requires it. All legitimate institutions consent to and challenge such investigation. Conscious integrity is always bold, candid and transparent. It is only "He that doeth evil, that hateth the light." "He that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be manifested that they are wrought in God." Schools, banks, insurance companies, every department of legitimate business must and does open its doors to the fullest official and unofficial inspection. Without official inspection their business would not be permitted.

All but the secret orders. They receive and expend millions of dollars. They bind men by the most terrible oaths. They have courts, laws and penalties of which statute law knows nothing. Their operations do in many instances materially effect the public peace and the general good. Yet they all without exception, whether Communists, Ku-Klux or Freemasons, agree in this, that they deny to the state all right of inquiry into their esoteric character and proceedings. The great danger and dread of Europe to-day is her secret orders. Against them armies and navies are powerless. They fill two great empires with alarm and Russia with crime and blood. Armed secret bands are in all our principal cities. But our greatest danger is the denial of the right of inspection as applied to secret orders. It is not that there are 500,000 Freemasons in the United States of whom 49,000 are Knight Templars, armed and drilled; but the fact that when a witness in Utah refused to tell the court what is done in the secret Endowment House he is rewarded with an ovation by his friends; and when the Masons of Pennsylvania refused to obey the mandate of the legislature, they not only escaped all punishment, but published a volume to show their triumph over a sovereign State.

EDUCATION OF THE YOUTH.

This subject is of the utmost importance in view of the moral character imparted by the teachers employed. We are apt to think that if our children become adepts in the rudiments, that it is the essential. Here is the great mistake made to-day in regard to our common schools. An educated rascal is the worst of the kind, and if we are doing this work we shall reap a terrible harvest, and more constant care is demanded, or as sure as weeds grow spontaneously, so bad men will come of this course. Nothing but a restraining power will save the country and free institutions from anarchy and ruin. The more wealth and material prosperity the greater the calamity.

Who are being employed, especially in our cities, to-day, to teach our youth? Are they not many of them from the foreign element whose parents are either papists or infidels? The average young American lady and gentleman are seeking what they esteem a higher employment in the office or store, and many in the learned professions, and now it does not require much culture to fit one for a school teacher in our common schools: many of the children of papists and infidels, whose lot it is to labor, are seeking this employ.

They are brought up to look with indifference upon the saloon, beer-garden, theatre, race course, skating rink, and ball-playing on the Sabbath and all times, deeming it a matter of course from the example of their parents; educators who will not restrain our youth from those demoralizing influences but rather encourage them. That this is imperiling our future cannot but be evident to every reflecting mind. Our youth, if they do not become papists and infidels, the enemies of free institutions, will lose all genuine regard for that which is noble and good following an example whose unconscious influence is moulding their habits of life. They gain the confidence of the child and he is led at their will; the Scriptures are banished from their literature and they have no guide but superstition. This danger is increasing; the papist and infidel are now quiet in regard to the school question because they see the power that has come into their hands; they are co-workers in evil, and if the lovers of true religion, morals and virtue do not wake up to this subject it will not be long before we shall lose all hold upon the rising generation. When the writer was a youth the wonder of Gen. A. Jackson on his visit to New England—the then President—was the beauty and culture of the young American ladies in the factories of New England. To-day the foreign papist and infidel occupy that field of labor. New England is fast passing into their superstitions and immorality. Boston is to-day a city full of foreign saloons and priest-ridden religionists, because, forsooth, the American youth desert the post of honor for that of pleasure and ease.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

BY ALEXANDER THOMSON.

Where'er a church to heaven lifts up its hands,
The Secret Empire by its threshold stands:
Where'er a hamlet lifts a humble head,
The dark pavilions rest within its shade:
Where'er a city's hum and stir are heard,
There, vampire-like, a foul, unholy bird,
Above its victim poised, with flaming wings,
It lulls him with the siren song it sings,
While from his sleeping soul it draws the life,
Its greed insatiate and its tongue a knife.

O, land unhappy, lulled to false repose,
While dangers gather, and increase thy foes!
O, sleeping Samson, shorn of holy might,
By these dark children of the sullen night!
Who shall awake thee, and with trumpet call
Shout, See! the foemen comes to storm the wall?
In countless myriads from the womb of night,
Come the dark legions for the deadly fight:
Shades of the "Red Men" march in solemn lines,
From northern maples and from southern pines;
From oaken glades of times remote and dim,
The ghastly "Druids" rise with visage grim,
Upon their altars burn unholy fire
Beneath the Christian church's hallowed spire;
While "Foresters" from days of Robin Hood,
Lead forth marauding bands from many a wood.
These and a countless throng no man can number
Augment the host and swell their muffled thunder,
While over all, the strength of every soul,
The sons of Hiram counsel and control.

Who being in power e're struck this mighty foe?
Who lived in power to strike another blow?
Who being ambitious of exalted place,
E're struck a blow at it, and won the race?
O, power of darkness, let thy banners fly,
With pride disdainful light thy haughty eye,
Say to Columbia, Bow thy stubborn head,
I am thy master now, thy power hath fled,
Thy courts and Congress are but puppets dressed,
To dance and masquerade at my behest.

O, church of God, once glorious and elate,
How art thou fallen from thy high estate!
O, heavenly virgin, horn but to command
Prince's obedience, to make nobles stand,
Yea, mightiest nobles, with uncovered head,
While thy sweet hymns were sung and counsels said,
Why stand ye now with blanched cheek of fear,
Too filled with terrors even for a tear?
Ah! faithless virgin, thou hast ceased to hide
Within the embrace of Christ the Crucified,
In thine own strength hast wandered, and art found
A silent captive on forbidden ground:
Within the Secret Empire's fatal hounds,
No more thy voice of holy freedom sounds,
While there a captive thou must wear thy chain,
And Christ's own Bride must be the slave of men.

But hurst thy chains, they are hut ropes of sand,
And to thy King stretch supplicating hand,
And from His presence through the dome of blue,
God's mighty hosts shall come to succor you,
Even nether hell shall tremble at thy tread
If thou in faith wilt hut lift up thy head,
And hy thy light out-heaming, thou shalt see
The Secret Empire all dissolved by thee.

THE TEMPERANCE CENTENNIAL.

FROM DR. RUSH'S ESSAY, "AN INQUIRY INTO THE EFFECTS OF ARDENT SPIRITS UPON THE HUMAN BODY AND MIND.

Pythagoras, we are told, maintained that the souls of men after death expiated the crimes committed by them in this world by animating certain brute animals; and that the souls of those animals, in their turns, enter into men, and carry with them all their peculiar qualities and vices. This doctrine of one of the wisest and best of the Greek philosophers was probably intended only to convey a lively idea of the changes which are induced in the body and mind of man by a fit of drunkenness.

It belongs to the history of drunkenness to remark that its paroxysms occur, like the paroxysms of many diseases, at certain periods, and after longer or shorter intervals. They often begin with annual, and gradually increase in their frequency until they appear in quarterly, monthly, weekly, and quotidian or daily periods. Finally, they afford scarcely any marks of remission either during the day or night. There was a citizen of Philadelphia many years ago in whom drunkenness appeared in this protracted form. In speaking of him to one of his neighbors, I said: "Does he not sometimes get drunk?" "You mean," said his neighbor, "is he not sometimes sober?"

It is further remarkable that drunkenness resembles certain hereditary, family, and contagious diseases. I have once known it to descend from a father to four out of five of his children. I have seen three, and once four brothers, who were born of sober ancestors, affected by it, and I have heard of its spreading through a whole family composed of members not originally related to each other.

Let us next attend to the chronic effects of ardent spirits upon the body and mind. In the body they dispose to every form of acute disease; they moreover excite fevers in persons predisposed to them, from other causes. This has been remarked in all the yellow fevers which have visited the cities of the United States. Hard drinkers seldom escape and rarely recover from them. The following diseases are the usual consequences of the habitual use of ardent spirits, viz.:

1. A decay of appetite, sickness at stomach.
2. Obstructions of the liver. The fable of Prometheus, on whose liver a vulture was said to prey constantly as a punishment for his stealing fire from heaven, was intended to illustrate the painful effects of ardent spirits upon that organ of the body.
3. Jaundice and dropsy of the various cavities of the body.
4. Hoarseness and a husky cough, often terminating in consumption.
5. Diabetes.
6. Redness and eruption on various parts of the body. They generally begin on the nose, and after extending all over the face, sometimes descend to the limbs in the form of leprosy.
7. A fetid breath.
8. Epilepsy.
9. Gout in all its various forms.

Lastly, madness. Dr. Waters while acting as apothecary of the Pennsylvania hospital, assured me that in one-third of the patients confined by this terrible disease, it had been induced by ardent spirits.

Most of the diseases which have been enumerated are of a mortal nature. They are more certainly induced, and terminate more speedily in death, when spirits are taken in such quantities, and at such times, as to produce frequent intoxication; but it may serve to remove an error with which some intemperate people console themselves to remark that ardent spirits often bring on fatal diseases without producing drunkenness. I have known many persons destroyed by them who were never completely intoxicated during the whole course of their lives. The solitary instances of longevity which are now and then met with in hard drinkers no more disprove the deadly effects of ardent spirits than the solitary instances of recoveries from apparent death by drowning prove that there is no danger to life from a human body lying an hour or two under water.

The body, after its death from the use of distilled spirits, exhibits by dissection certain appearances which are of a peculiar nature. The fibres of the stomach and bowels are contracted; abcesses, gangrene, and scirrhi are found in the viscera. The bronchial vessels are contracted—the blood-vessels and tendons in many parts of the body are more or less ossified, and even the hair of the head possesses a crispness which renders it less valuable to wig-makers than the hair of sober people.

Not less destructive are the effects of ardent spirits upon the human mind. They impair the memory, debilitate the understanding, and pervert the moral faculties. It is probably from observing these effects of intemperance upon the mind, that a law was formerly passed in Spain, which excluded drunkards from being witnesses in a court of justice. But the demoralizing effects of distilled spirits do not stop here. They produce not only falsehood, but fraud, theft, uncleanness, and murder. Like the demoniac mentioned in the New Testament, their name is "Legion," for they convey into the soul a host of vices and crimes.

Thus we see poverty and misery, crimes and infamy, diseases and death, are all the natural and usual consequences of the intemperate use of ardent spirits.

I have classed death among the consequences of hard drinking. But it is not death from the immediate hand of the Deity, nor from any of the instruments of it which were created by him. It is death from suicide. Yes, thou poor, degraded creature, who art daily lifting the poisoned bowl to thy lips, cease to avoid the unhallowed ground in which the self-murderer is interred and wonder no longer that the sun should shine, and the rain fall, and the grass look green upon his grave. Thou art perpetrating gradually, by the use of ardent spirits, what he has effected suddenly by opium or a halter.

I shall now take notice of the occasions and circumstances which are supposed to render the use of ardent spirits necessary, and endeavor to show that the arguments in favor of their use in such cases are founded in error, and that in each of them ardent spirits, instead of affording strength to the body, increase the evils they are intended to relieve.

1. They are said to be necessary in very cold weather. This is far from being true, for the temporary warmth they produce is always succeeded by a greater disposition in the body to be effected by cold. Warm dresses, a plentiful meal just before exposure to the cold, and eating occasionally a little ginger bread, or any other cordial food, is a much more durable method of preserving the heat of the body in cold weather.

2. They are said to be necessary in very warm weather. Experience proves that they increase, instead of lessening the effects of heat upon the body, and thereby dispose to disease of all kinds. Even in the warm climate of the West Indies, Dr. Bell asserts this to be true. "Rum," says this author, "whether used habitually, moderately or in excessive quantities in the West Indies, always diminishes the strength of the body, and renders men more susceptible to disease, and unfit for any service in which vigor or activity is required." As well might we throw oil into a house, the roof of which was on fire, in order to prevent the flames from extending to its inside, as pour ardent spirits into the stomach to lessen the effects of a hot sun upon the skin.

3. Nor do ardent spirits lessen the effect of hard labor upon the body. Look at the horse; with every muscle of his body swelled from morning till night in the plough, or a team, does he make signs for a draught of toddy, or a glass of spirits to enable him to cleave the ground or climb a hill? No; he requires nothing but cool water and substantial food. There is no nourishment in ardent spirits. The strength they produce in labor is of a transcient nature, and is always followed by a sense of weakness and fatigue.

SKETCH OF BENJAMIN RUSH.

[By Mary Allen West, in the Union Signal.]

Dr. Benjamin Rush was by nature a pioneer. Thus we find him in the forefront of many historic movements. In 1774, as a member of the Provincial Assembly of Pennsylvania, he moved the first resolution in favor of American independence. Two years later, June 23, 1776, he was appointed chairman of the Committee on Independence, and on the Fourth of July following, as a member of the Continental Congress, he appended his name to the immortal declaration. We are glad to note the fact that his wife, Julia Stockton, was the daughter of another signer of the Declaration, Richard Stockton, of New Jersey. They were married in 1776, and the patriotic independence of that historic year well symbolizes his character.

He was also a pioneer in the abolition of slavery, an advocate for the broadest education of women, when such advocacy was rank fanaticism, the first person to propose plans for educating people to recognize the horrors instead of the glories of war, and for establishing a Universal Peace Union.

He was one of the originators of the Bible Society, and drafted its first constitutions.

Born near Philadelphia, Dec. 24, 1745, he grew to manhood amid the sturdy surroundings of early colonial life. With a love for study and investigation amounting to a passion, he drank in all the knowledge the schools of America afforded. He was graduated at Princeton College in 1760, afterward studied medicine in Philadelphia, then continued these studies in Edinburgh, London and Paris. Returning to America in 1769, he began the practice of medicine in Philadelphia, and the same year was elected Professor of Chemistry in the medical college there. He soon became known on both sides the sea as a careful, accurate investigator and a writer whose testimony could be trusted.

Dr. Benjamin Ward Richardson speaks of him as one of the most active, original, and famous men of his times, one of "the elect of history." Lettson styles him "The American Sydenham." "Like Sydenham," Dr. Richardson says, "Rush was an enthusiast, a philanthropist, a man of immense grasp in the work-day world, as well as a polished scholar, and a scientist of the most exact methods."

Dr. Thomas Young bears strong testimony to the original energy of character, of Dr. Rush, and to the value of his researches, especially in regard to epidemic diseases. Bear this in mind when reading his testimony concerning the effects of alcohol in epidemics of yellow fever and cholera. For his services to humanity in the terrible yellow fever epidemics of 1793–1805, the king of Prussia sent him the coronation medal, and the king of Spain thanked him. In 1807 the queen of Etruria presented him with a gold medal, and in 1811 the emperor of Russia bestowed a similar token of his admiration of Dr. Rush's medical character.

Such a man could not witness unmoved the ravages of intemperance. "He saw all of its evils and never tired of raising his voice against it." He viewed it from every standpoint, as a physician, a patriot and a Christian, and his whole soul was stirred within him. Thus stirred he wrote the famous essay, early in 1785. This was followed by a series on the same general topic: the effect of ardent spirits on the human system. These were widely copied, one authority says, into all the newspapers in America. They attracted great attention and exerted such an influence for good that, according to Hildreth, the historian, at the Philadelphia celebration of the Fourth of July, 1787, which had the added dignity of also celebrating the adoption of the federal Constitution, ardent spirits were excluded from the entertainment. A glorious prophecy of the way our national holiday shall be celebrated when the principles of that Constitution and of the Declaration of Independence shall permeate our entire commonwealth.

Dr. Rush was not content with writing against intemperance; the living voice must emphasize the printed page. Feeling that religion was the most potent force in keeping this evil in check, his strongest appeals for aid in his grand work, are made to ministers and religious bodies. Feeling greatly indebted for the influences which turned his attention to this work, to the Quakers, and to Ashbury, Dr. Coke and other Methodist itinerants, he made his first appeal to their religious bodies. In 1788, as he says, "I bore my testimony at a Methodist conference against the use of ardent spirits, and I hope with effect. I also brought the matter before the Friends' yearly meeting. I have likewise written to the Roman Catholic bishop of Maryland, to set an association against them on foot in his society. I have repeatedly insisted upon a public testimony being published against them by the Presbyterian Synod of this city, and have suggested to our good Bishop White the necessity for the Episcopal church not standing neutral in this interesting business."

In 1811 we find him appearing before the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church, to which communion he belonged, pleading the cause of temperance so effectually that a committee was appointed whose report, adopted by the Assembly, begins the long line of noble "deliverances" of that influential body upon this subject. He presented to this General Assembly one thousand copies of his essay printed in tract form.

Two years later he died, April 19th, 1813, but the good he did was not "interred with his bones." His essays were scattered everywhere, the seed thus sown sprang up and bore fruit abundantly. Some of this seed germinated in Litchfield, Conn., and fruited in the first temperance society known in America. In 1789, nineteen years earlier than the formation of a similar society in Saratoga county, New York, over two hundred most respectable farmers of Litchfield, formed themselves into "an association to discourage the use of spiritous liquors."

Litchfield has the reputation of having produced more great and good men and women to the acre, than any other township in America; this early temperance movement may account for the phenomenon.

From other seed, sown by the same hand, grew the Massachusetts "society for the suppression of the liquor traffic." The action of the Presbyterian General Assembly was brought before other ecclesiastical bodies, especially the Congregational Association of New England. From such a presentation of the subject to the Massachusetts Association, this society originated.

In 1812 the same matter was brought before the Connecticut General Association and a committee was appointed to see what could be done to abolish the evil of intemperance. They reported that they had attended to the subject committed to them, but that intemperance had been for some time increasing in the most alarming manner, and that after careful and prayerful inquiry, they were obliged to confess that they "did not perceive that anything could be done." In that audience sat Rev. Lyman Beecher, from Litchfield, where the first temperance society was formed. He relates that when he heard this report, "The blood started through my heart and I rose instanter, and moved that a committee of three be appointed immediately to report at this meeting the ways and means of arresting the tide of intemperance." The committee was appointed with Dr. Beecher as chairman. The next day he brought in their report, which, he says, "was the most important paper I ever wrote." It recommended that all ministers should preach temperance; that ardent spirits should be dispensed with at ecclesiastical gatherings; that church members abstain from selling or drinking intoxicating liquors; that parents exclude them from their families, and admonish their children against them; that farmers, mechanics, and manufacturers, substitute for them palatable and harmless drinks for their laborers; that temperance literature be prepared and circulated and societies organized for the promotions of morals. * * * Cogent reasons and powerful appeals enforced this report. It was thoroughly discussed by the Association, adopted, and one thousand copies printed for general circulation.

Now the combat deepened, and soon there was beautiful fighting all along the line." Soon was heard the thunder of those great guns, Beecher's Six Sermons on Intemperance, which are not yet antiquated. Only last week a clergyman who had lately read them for the first time, said to me: "We have not gone beyond them yet. They contain the germs of our most advanced thought on intemperance."

Those sermons, read on an Illinois prairie by a former parishoner of Dr. Beecher, led him to tear down his distillery "which brought him much gain," literally tearing it down and using the stones of which it was composed to build a church to the living God. His wife joined in the good work, with her own hands hammering into indistinguishable shape the worm of that still. To-day Illinois is proud to count a president of a local union and one of a young ladies' union among the family of that heroic woman.

At this centennial occasion it is pleasant to trace the links connecting these W. C. T. U's directly with Dr. Rush, for his essay fired the heart of Lyman Beecher to write those sermons whose echoes reverberating through a thousand miles, demolished that distillery and inspired that spirit which has "evoluted" in these local unions and their faithful presidents.

OR

THE QUESTION OF THE HOUR.

BY E. E. FLAGG, AUTHOR OF "HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE CONCLUSION OF THE MATTER.

A story, like a human life, must draw to its conclusion some time, and as very little remains to be said regarding the fortunes of the characters with whom we have traveled thus far, we will proceed to the inevitable winding up.

Martha and Nelson stand in the front of the greatest moral conflict the world has ever seen. It rages hot and heavy, a battle all along the line. They, no less than the old anti-slavery reformers, live in a time that tries men's souls.

The paper in Martin Treworthy's tin box made Nelson sole heir to his bit of city property, and paved his way for the purchase of what is now one of the best farms in the State. And in the hermitage, moved to more congenial surroundings, they spent the first years of their married life, which were gladdened by the advent of a little Martin Treworthy Newhall; and even when fortune prospered them and they built a new and commodious residence, they still sacredly preserved it, converting it into a kind of summer-house half hid with creeping vines. And if the reader visits it once more, as we now invite him to, he will find the settee and the leathern armchair in their old places; even the pot of ivy and the vases of dried grass which Martha is at the present moment engaged in arranging. Nelson is watching one of the most glorious of summer sunsets, and as the radiant level beams convert the broad acres of wheat into a living lake of emerald, he hums softly,

"Green fields beyond the swelling flood."

Martha came and stood behind her husband.

"It is almost like a bit of the New Jerusalem let down to earth," she said.

"It makes me think of Tom," he answered.

Martha's only reply was to lean her cheek on his shoulder, and they stood thus together for several moments in silence.

Nelson had not forgotten Tom, but though he had lost a brother he had found a sister. On the principle of the attraction of opposites, Dora had conceived for Martha that passionate attachment which a weaker nature often shows for a stronger one. She is happily married to one of the worthiest of her farmer suitors, consults Martha in all household difficulties with even more freedom than her energetic mother, and bids fair to develop into a model of a young American matron.

"Judge Howland! this is an unexpected pleasure," exclaimed Nelson and Martha both in delighted unison, as a visitor suddenly makes his appearance—a tall, fine-looking man, whose decidedly familiar features convince us that it is indeed Stephen Howland, now privileged to write Judge before his name, and one of the foremost political leaders in the great party of national reform.

That Puritan couple have to-day no occasion to be ashamed of the Daniel they have given their country—and here pardon us one moment's digression. There is much bemoaning nowadays over the loss of the old spirit of integrity that characterized our forefathers, but if we would have sons of the Puritans filling again our legislative halls and judicial benches there is one way, and only one way, by which it can be accomplished—restore again the Puritan home.

"Business took me in this direction," responded Judge Howland, as he shook hands with his old client; "and I could not resist the temptation to turn aside and congratulate you on what I presume is no news. I hear your name prominently mentioned as candidate for a seat in the next legislature."

Martha's cheeks flushed with fond pride as she looked at her husband, who answered quietly:

"My highest desire is to be worthy of the honor. Then I can bear success or defeat with equal composure. But I want to know, Judge Howland, if you have any idea of the cause of your failure to be re-elected last fall."

"Yes, I have," slowly responded the Judge, "though I may not be acquainted with all the facts. I know my enemies got up a malicious story of bribery on my part, and one man even swore to my giving him a large sum of money to buy up votes with—a sum larger than my whole personal estate. The story was purposely started nigh on the eve of the election so as to give me no time to deny it till it had done its work in defeating me. Masons and Odd-fellows were the originators and propagators of the whole ridiculous charge. A public man, as soon as he displeases Masonry, is politically doomed."

"Well, now," said Nelson, "what is to become of the country when the reputation of no candidate for public office is safe; when be must fall down and worship before the brazen image of the lodge, or be cast into a fiery furnace of cowardly defamation and slander?"

"I don't know unless the moral sense of the nation awakes to what is now the real Question of the Hour. That question is not so much whether we shall put down this or that great evil—not even intemperance, blasting, gigantic iniquity though it be, but whether Christ shall rule our nation through Christian rulers, or Satan through the godless secret lodges. I do not mean to belittle the other great issues which are pressing upon us, but I do assert that this is the one grand issue which contains all others as in a nutshell. I do not wonder that men seeing the tremendous amount of misery and woe wrought by the saloon, and not seeing how this secret, irresponsible lodge power backs up that and every other evil, should think the temperance question the most important. But how long is it since a Masonic clerk, by neglecting to record the minutes of the Constitutional Amendment passed in this State, killed all the hopes of the temperance men and women who had labored so untiringly for its passage? How often the County Commissioners and Excise boards are Masons standing in fraternal relations to the rum power? How often liquor cases are tried and juries fail to convict because there is a secret understanding with a Masonic judge or attorney? How many cases are put off on a frivolous pretext and never tried at all for the same reason? Temperance men and women must wake up to these things; they are waking. This grand party of Christian reform which has risen up to combat their secret enemy bears the destiny of the American race in its bosom over our stormy political waters as the Mayflower bore the seed for the nation's planting; and its platform embodies lessons experience has been teaching them through years of disappointment and frustrated hopes, and which once learned can never be unlearned."

Nelson was thinking of Martin Treworthy, who would have so rejoiced in this new party but died without the sight.

Judge Howland paused a moment, and then he said with slow and solemn emphasis:

"'How long halt ye between two opinions?' —that is the question God is asking the American nation to-day."

THE END.

—Mr. Bickham, of Dayton, son of W. D. Bickham, of the Dayton Journal, who acquired considerable skill as a "pitcher" while at college, was recently asked to occupy that position in a Sunday game. He declined, for the reason that "he would not dishonor the Sabbath." Some of the smart Alecks have ridiculed the act. But probably nine-tenths of all the cultivated people of the land will commend the courage of the young man. There would be no surer method to bring base ball into disrepute in all civilized communities than to undertake making it a regular Sabbath amusement.—Inter-Ocean.

REFORM NEWS.

TO OUR WISCONSIN FRIENDS.

Bro. Bancroft is very anxious to obtain the services of a good organizing agent, and thinks the money can be raised to pay him. Of the 195 circulars I sent out last spring thirteen have received a response, sending money and pledges enough to start a fund of about $15 per month. An equal response from the rest would create a fund of over $200 per month. That ought to pay two pretty good men for some effective work. Now please roll in the pledges in good faith, and God will, we believe, provide the man or men. The pledges may be conditional on the man being found by the time of the annual meeting in November. But let all do as the urgency of the case demands, and the work will go on. Work and pray.

THE KANSAS CONVENTION.

The State convention of the Kansas Christian Association assembled at Willis, Brown county, Kansas, September 1st., at 2 P. M.; holding in the Wesleyan church two forenoon, three afternoon, and three night sessions. The convention was welcomed by kind words of cheer by Rev. G. H. Hemingway, pastor in charge, which were replied to by Rev. J. A. Richards, President of the Association.

The first half hour of all our sessions was spent in devotional exercises. The statement of Rev. J. P. Stoddard, Secretary of the N. C. A., as to the general progress of the work, also that of Rev. R. Loggan, Kansas State agent, as to the progress of the work, as carried on by himself, were both full of interest and encouragement.

Secretary Stoddard, in his lecture the first evening, after premising the great truth, that God is to be clearly recognized in government, proceeded to expose the follies, the silly and sinful rites and ceremonies of Freemasonry. Rev. Rufus Smith followed, showing the utter uselessness and worthlessness of the system.

The election of officers for the ensuing year resulted as follows: Rev. J. A. Richards, of Fort Scott, re-elected president; W. W. McMillan, of Olathe, secretary; J. A. Torrence, North Cedar, treasurer; Revs. J. S. T. Milligan, F. D. Houlette, C. H. Story, and C. Coleman, vice-presidents.

Addresses were delivered during the forenoon of the second day by Rev. R. Smith on prohibition, by Bro. Needles on the importance of the Christian element to a political reform, and by Secretary Stoddard on the future issues of party politics. During the second afternoon, J. Thompson addressed the convention on the impossibility of a safe disregard of God and Christ in our actions and relations; several expressions were given and a deep interest was excited.

The second evening Rev. M. A. Gault was heard on the despotic character of Masonry, and Rev. R. Smith farther on prohibition.

During the forenoon of the third day the committee on "plan of work" reported, recommending county organization as far and as fast as possible, as auxiliary to the State Association. These county organizations to be made, with the usual officers, to carry on the work more effectually in their own bounds, to hold meetings quarterly and to report every three months to the State secretary. It was farther recommended that the executive committee prepare a suitable circular and blank form of pledge to be sent to friends throughout the State asking them to pledge or pay such sums as they may be disposed to in support of the work during the year. Rev. R. Loggan was chosen State agent for the following year, at a salary of fifty dollars per month and expenses. This contract was afterwards definitely arranged. The executive committee was directed to prepare and publish, six weeks before its meeting, a programme for the next convention.

The following resolutions were adopted:

1. That the principle of secrecy is not in harmony with either the Divine character, "for God is light, "or social organization among men, except as a desperate remedy for some abnormal condition.
2. That secret combinations under ordinary conditions of society must be understood as a conspiracy against either society itself, or some interest of it, and should be opposed as that which in ordinary conditions is evil and only evil.
3. That their number, which is legion, reveals the number of the interests of society which are in this manner assailed.
4. That these combinations and their operations are at least wanting in those features of loyalty to God and Christ, and the law of God, which they should possess as valid agencies for God's glory or man's good.
5. That the titles, regalia, military weapons, penalties, oaths, and claimed obligations of these various combinations are a usurpation of both civil and ecclesiastical functions, and are liable to seriously interfere with the proper exercise of these functions.
6. It is evident that they are fast accumulating the requisite strength to either control or destroy God's ordinances of the church, state, and family, and the purpose is not only unveiled, but expressed, to bring everything into subordination to their rapacious greed of honor, wealth, and power.
7. The voice of revelation and the current events teach us that not a moment must be lost, nor an effort withheld requisite to bring Lots out of Sodom and extinguish the already kindled flames of social destruction.
8. That church and state organizations must be taught and incited to cast this viper, so long and so disastrously cherished, from their bosoms, and if nothing else will avail, then separation from all affiliating and festering and even tolerating relations must be the resort of the Christian and patriot.
9. That we have learned with satisfaction that it has been proposed to hold a national conference of Bible Christians on the subject of secrecy and general reform, and we hereby express our approval of such a conference and will do what in us lies to assure its success, and the inauguration of a new era of Gospel reform.
10. That we express our hearty thanks to the N. C. A. and their general agent, Rev. J. P. Stoddard, for the liberal assistance financially given during the past year, and that we will redouble our efforts in securing the funds necessary to vigorously prosecute the reform work more thoroughly, and extend the circulation of the Cynosure and other anti-secrecy literature.

The finance committee reported $16.85 raised from citizens and others present.

The treasurer, J. A. Torrence, reported $4 from R. P. congregation of Olathe, and $5.08 from the R. P. congregation of North Cedar, making with the above, a total of $25.93, which was distributed, by order of convention, among those having just claims on the treasury.

The audience in the third afternoon listened to an address by Rev. F. D. Houlette, who retailed some items of experience in connection with Masonry; after which followed a testimony meeting, and questions and answers, exciting deep interest and attention.

The last evening Secretary Stoddard highly entertained a full house on the possibility of understanding much of Masonry without even entering the lodge, and also in giving many other interesting and instructive facts as to what passed inside the lodge, showing also the distant relation and very remote connection allowed women with the lodge.

The convention which had, during its sessions, been entertained by the citizens of the place, in a princely manner, then adjourned sine die, with the benediction by Rev. G. H. Hemingway.

W. W. MCMILLAN, Secretary.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

DEPOT, KANSAS CITY, Sept. 7, 1885.

I am not surprised that the devil is making a desperate fight for this "Great American Desert," as it used to be called. He knows the possibilities of these broad acres. I have now spent nearly a week mostly upon the table lands back from the larger streams. Fields stretching far as eye can reach are literally burdened with ripening corn, while stacks of grain or piles of straw proclaim an abundant "harvest home."

From Willis, in Brown county, Kansas, I went by night train to Humboldt, Neb., an enterprising little city of 1,200 to 1,500 inhabitants. For beauty of situation that young city may safely challenge the western plains to produce its peer. Less than twenty-five years from the scourging prairie fires and the undisputed sweep of the buffalo, the whole region round about has been transformed into an almost continuous succession of grain fields, meadows, orchards and groves, all ministering to the comfort of the occupants of scores of happy homes where poverty has given place to competency in an incredibly short space of time.

Taste is evidenced in the plot of the town, and many of its residences, business houses and public buildings are models of neatness, stability and convenience, making one feel as he enters the Peoples' church, or glances down the long row of brick fronts that a respectable section of some New England village has been transported to the "far West."

It is not until coming to the moral condition of this place that the Christian finds occasion for serious regrets. There are excellent people in Humboldt to whom I am personally indebted for many kindnesses, but when I saw a large crowd gathered on the race course and learned that two athletes were to run for a wager of $50; when I was told that large sums changed hands as a result of that contest; when passing along the streets I saw by the side of the walks devices apparently for gaming purposes, and saw boys who had come in from the country putting down their nickles and dimes to be picked up by sharpers; when our good Bro. Rufus Smith from Missouri, attempted to read and comment on the 10th Psalm, within the enclosure of the public square and was told by the city marshall that his orders were to arrest him unless he obtained a permit from the mayor; and when subsequently Bro. S. while quietly returning from a religious meeting to his hotel in company with two other gentlemen and two ladies, was set upon and pelted with rotten eggs by cowardly ruffians, I recalled the words I once heard from the lips of Wendell Phillips, when he declared, "There is not a city in the United States with a population of ten thousand, that is not ruled by the worst class of its citizens." Humboldt is not yet ten thousand strong, but unless the Masonic mayor and his associates in the city government, take prompt and energetic measures to bring those miscreants to justice who assailed a helpless old man and smeared the garments of respectable ladies of their own city with rotten eggs on the street, public opinion will justly hold them responsible as parties in crime or brand them as incompetent and utterly unfit to hold any office of trust in a civilized community. Let us hope that the Masonic mayor and the city government may wash their hands of this dirty business, and if they are innocent, remove this stain which must otherwise rest, for a generation at least, upon their beautiful town.

LATER.—I have just met on the train Mr. S. C. Newman, who is publishing a paper at Delavan, Ill. He seemed quite interested in a chart I was studying and after a brief interchange of views he said, "I am opposed to Masonry because it interferes with justice in the courts." He was familiar with the Carpenter and Zura Burns case at Taylorville, Ill., and from this and other cases he had drawn his conclusions. Is he correct? Who will give other and well authenticated instances of the kind?

J. P. STODDARD.

NINE IOWA PASTORS.

CLARENCE, Iowa, Sept. 7th, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—After the close of the State convention I went with Bro. John Dorcas to his home in Red Oak township, four miles from Tipton, the county-seat of Cedar county. His plan of work was to labor personally with the pastors of the various churches. Accordingly we visited and conferred with nine of the pastors of the county.

I was gratified to find that only one of those nine ministers is a Freemason. We labored thoroughly with him, showing him that Masonry is a false religion according to the representative men of the order. As he is a Royal Arch Mason I particularly dwelt upon the Masonic method of perfecting holiness; which, according to Mackey, is by strict obedience to the obligations and precepts of the fraternity. After contrasting this legal method with God's plan of purifying our hearts by faith, I showed that the Masonic plan was so mistaken and deceptive that if the Masonic obligations were as pure as the law of God it would be a failure. I then proceeded to analyze the obligations of the Master Mason, and the Royal Arch degrees, and showed how clearly they conflicted with both divine and civil law. I did not claim that every Freemason of these degrees would trample upon the laws of both God and men to keep his Masonic obligations, but I showed that the contingency was liable to arise where he could not perfect his Masonic character, and attain to Masonic saintship unless he did.

The conference with this pastor was one of thrilling interest. Being sorely pressed with the truth he turned upon me and inquired if I had ever been made a Mason? I said no. "Then," said he, "You know nothing about it." This he had been careful not to to affirm until he was assured that I was not a Mason.

"What!" said I. "Can nothing be proved by human evidence?" I then callad his attention to the evidence of Grand Lodge officers before the committees of State Legislatures. To the testimony of adhering Masons before courts of justice, and to the testimony of seceding Masons. "When," said I, "you remember that all these seceders substantially agree with each other, and also with the sworn testimony of adhering Masons, you certainly will not ask me to stultify myself by admitting that I do not know what the obligations of Freemasonry are because I am not a Mason."

He boldly denied having taken any obligations that would require him to conceal crime or defend criminals.

I replied, "My dear brother, I hope you do not mean to say that as a Royal Arch Mason you were not obligated to keep the secrets of a companion Royal Arch Mason, murder and treason not excepted. And to espouse the cause of a companion Royal Arch Mason when in any difficulty, so far as to deliver out of that difficulty whether he be right or wrong." To this appeal his only response was silence.

In a burst of indignation he declared it was unmanly to bore into his secrets. But we showed that, as it was the perfection of the Masonic religion to strictly observe Masonic obligations, the nature of those obligations was a legitimate subject of inquiry. That the devilish nature of the Masonic religion could not be fully seen without an analysis of the Masonic obligations. This view tended to quiet his mind, for he evidently saw that it was legitimate for

CORRESPONDENCE.

LODGE MONKEYING AT GOVERNMENT EXPENSE.

DETROIT, Mich., Sept. 7, 1885.

Rochester, N. Y., is one of the best located and most pleasant of cities, and has one of the richest and most fertile countries around it. It has many internal resources of wealth in its water power and great manufacturing facilities. It was once one of the most moral, best ordered and most religious cities in the country. But now this beautiful city is depraved, demoralized, and ruled by that evil trinity of TOBACCO, LIQUOR and the LODGE! Its immense liquor and tobacco manufactories, its liquor and tobacco saloons, and low dives, and its secret oath-bound societies—alas! now control this beautiful city, and its preachers and its editors and its churches with very few exceptions, are paralyzed and dumb before these satanic powers. The Masons, with their usual mendacity, have assumed the prerogative of laying the corner-stone of the new government building, a building to be erected by the money of the people, a vast majority of whom are opposed to secret societies. It is gratifying to know there is one man in Rochester who dares speak out, and one paper that dares publish his protest, as see the following from the Post-Express. GEO. W. CLARK.

THE MASONS AND THE FEDERAL BUILDING.

The announcement has been made that the corner-stone of the new building for the United States Government in this city is to be laid on the 9th proximo under the auspices of the Masonic societies of this city. The statement has been public some weeks, and as no contradiction of it has appeared it is safe to assume that the event will take place as promised. As I think it would be an outrageous thing to let any secret society or class assume the consequence of exclusively inaugurating a public work such as the Federal building, I wish to enter my earnest protest against allowing the Freemasons or any such body to take any part in laying the corner-stone. The act of placing the so-called corner-stone in position with any more ado than accompanies every other stone in the building, is flat nonsense and worthy only of children, but to let one particular society do the spectacular act on the occasion, is a bad precedent that may have far-reaching consequences. No one but a fool believes the Masonic lodges have anything to do with the trade of building stone-walls. They are a secret society with purposes which the public know nothing about. The United States government cannot be under any obligations to them, and if none of its officials asked them to preside at the corner-stone laying, I must say they had a great deal of assurance in thrusting themselves forward to a place to which scores of other societies have an equal right.

The people who are to pay for this building are of many minds; some of them have strong prejudice against Masons. I have not; but if the public must have a hauble, it is only fair to give all who desire it a chance to show themselves and their finery. This Government should not countenance mummery in its affairs, and as there has been rather too much of it in this city heretofore this occasion shall not pass without at least one effort to put an end to tomfoolery in such cases. The fathers of the Republic decreed an absolute divorce between church and state. We, their successors, had better not renew the alliance in any form or tolerate dalliance between the parties. If the semi-religious Masons may lay the corner-stone with their peculiar rites, it would be but fair to have Bishop McQuaid or Coxe dedicate the building with incense and prayer. As a place for the sale of revenue stamps, distribution of mail, etc., the building will probably do well enough without going under the hands of fraternity or churchmen. Whether it will or not I maintain that as an annex to a Masonic lodge the United States would somewhat overtop the original structure and produce an architectural monstrosity intolerable to gods and men. E. R.

IF THIS COAT FITS PUT IT ON.

RANKIN, Ill.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—I regret to see a paper, otherwise so ably edited, and working for so excellent ends, as temperance among others, indulging in such intemperance in harsh and abusive speech. If your endeavors, in themselves so commendable, are not crowned with success, this circumstance will in no small degree account for it. I admit that your editorials are sober and able, but as much cannot be said of many of the articles of your correspondents, and by publishing them you show your approval of them.

In the Cynosure of Aug. 20th a writer makes some comments on an article entitled, "Smoked and Pickled," and you consider these comments to contain "pith and point" enough to make them worthy of publication. This commentator asserts, that those who "chew the cud," "burn incense to Baal," and are found in secret lodges, cannot be the children of God. (How the writer happens to introduce Baal in this connection, does not appear clear.) In other words, those that use tobacco and frequent lodges cannot have spiritual life. The Bible asserts that faith in Christ constitutes spiritual life; this writer substitutes abstinence from tobacco and lodge-fellowship for faith in Christ; or at least he asserts that the tobacco habit and lodge-fellowship is prima facie evidence of an unregenerated heart.

I have no intention of defending the tobacco habit, and secret societies I abhor possibly as much as you do, but as to the searching of hearts and passing the final sentence upon my fellowmen, I prefer to leave those things in the hands of God. I have read your, in many respects, excellent paper with great interest. I have admired your courage and patience in struggling for "unpopular truths," but fearing that silence and a continued subscription would be construed to mean acquiescence in those things I disapprove, I prefer to drop my subscription. Thanking you for the past, I remain Respectfully yours,

OSCAR HOLMGRAIN.

NOTE.—This brother's remedy is like "cutting off his nose to spite his face"—it is too severe for the discase. The Cynosure has allowed much liberty to correspondents without assuming to endorse as wisest and best every idea presented. Some of those of whom the brother complains he would learn to esteem and love for their amiable Christian character upon acquaintance. He may not, others may not gain their meaning clearly. Have, then, fervent charity one for another. The above is a good letter, commended to all our readers. It is much better than giving up the paper, and will effect more—and we shall expect the subscription to continue.—ED.

LODGE AND PROHIBITION.

CUSTER CITY, Pa., Aug. 31, 1885.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—At a prohibition convention for this county (McKean) to nominate a jury commissioner, Rev. D. A. Parselles, an M. E. pastor, expressed himself this way: "I was a member of a lodge of Royal Templars of Temperance. I could not speak of prohibition in the lodge nor advocate it outside. At one time, I had the opportunity to obtain a good lecturer, but he could not come, for fear he'd say something on prohibition. I will hold to nothing that will not allow me to talk prohibition."

Don't imagine for once he is an anti-secretist. I believe he hungers for the leeks and garlics of Egypt as bad as the Israelites ever did; and we have good but silly people hungering for the minor orders to be brought into the U. B. church. I query sometimes which of the minor orders they would be willing on their knees before God, to ask might be blessed and prospered because of their charity and their helps to prayer meetings. Methinks the sentiment would be in a similar strain to the "Prayer" written by a 32° Mason but a strong prohibitionist, even to persecution. We have quite a prohibition sentiment in this vicinity and some of it is anti-secret but not of the aggressive form. They are not educated to the point. Without doubt others could be brought in had we the right man to handle it. I am as an Appius Claudius to them.

And viewed askance with fear—"

Fear that I carry an epidemic in my pocket, or that the lunatic asylum is not large enough, or I am a slumbering volcano, or "suthin" else but a man. Some people say blessed be nothing, while I mourn because I want something—to hire lecturers with. May the good Lord hasten the dawn of that day when I can help educate the masses on the dark idolatry.

Can you or any of your readers give us an expose of "The Sons of Temperance?" I am told by the M. E. pastor of this place, that the only secret is the password. It seems remarkably strange that that can be so. In fact I don't believe it.

Are the members of the "Temple of Honor" and the "Knights of Honor" one and the same?

J. C. YOUNG.

NOTE.—The "Temple of Honor" or "Templars of Honor and Temperance," as the order is called indifferently, is a secret temperance order. Its deistic character was admirably shown in these columns more than a year since in a series of articles by Albert M. Paull of Providence, R. I., a former member of the order. The Knights of Honor is one of the irresponsible mutual insurance lodges. Who will answer Bro. Young's question about the Sons of Temperance?

COME OUT.

WARREN, Ill.

I am often sneered at by some of my good orthodox brethren because I refuse to fellowship a certain class of men that are called brethren. They say I must not judge lest I be judged. "Have charity," they say, "for the men that worship in those anti-Christian lodges for they are just as honest as you are." They may be sincere but that does not prove them to be Christians. They may pray long and loud and speak with the tongues of men and of angels and have not that charity "that is not puffed up. Seeketh not her own; rejoiceth in the truth." They are as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal.

If we are not to judge them the Bible tells us how to know them. The tree is known by its fruit, and John says "every spirit," and I think that will include every man and institution, "that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God." This is the spirit of anti-Christ. Such are deceivers and anti-Christs, and we are told not to receive such into our houses nor bid them God speed. If we do we are partakers of their evil deeds.

Paul says, "Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers, wherefore come out from among them." These are the conditions by which we become the sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. It is a lamentable fact that many apparently good brethren and sisters are yoked up with those secret anti-Christian societies, using their time and money that belong to Christ and his church to build up an anti-Christ. Peter would call such "wells without water, clouds that are carried with a tempest for whom the mist of darkness is reserved forever."

B. WILLIAMS.

PITH AND POINT.

SEND IT OVER ALL LANDS.

Having travelled almost constantly in nine States for the past twenty five years, holding union meetings and doing other works among the people, I think I am safe in saying that I have seen the withering influence in the family and the church of Jesus from the Masonic order and other secret societies. Brain, heart and money going in the direction of the lodge, stripping the family of the same and leaving the church-house often unfrequented and without necessary fixtures and furniture, while the lodge is carpeted and adorned. I hold that the Christian Cynosure is and of necessity ought to be the paper of the general church, and all free men should do their best to send it over all lands.—A. A. MYERS, Williamsburg, Ky.

LEAD AWAY FROM CHRIST.

Being a warm advocate of prohibition I was a supporter of St. John in the last campaign, and I have ever been opposed to secret organizations although they may appear to be for the promotion of good objects. I believe their tendency is evil and that they are calculated to lead from a dependence upon Christ and the Christian religion and frequently into practical infidelity. I am well pleased with the Cynosure and feel thankful to the unknown friend that has been so kind as to furnish me with the excellent reading matter that I find in your paper. It is truly a welcome visitor at my house.—PARKER MOON, Carthage, Mo.

THE WISDOM THAT IS FROM ABOVE IS FIRST PURE.

We see the monster secretism stalking abroad with its high pretension to almost everything good and noble, even to salvation (and that without Christ), while we know the very reverse is true concerning it. It not only does not and can not save people, but is leading thousands downward for time and eternity, and the great majority of God's servants are mute on the subject. They dare not speak out; they think it will only drive them from their pulpits and call down the anathemas of the whole fraternity. The masses say, Don't stir up the hornets' nest or you will be stung and you will lose your usefulness, and thus men are deterred from exposing the monstrous evil—perhaps, honestly, too. Now what is right? I ask. Is it practicable to say what you know should be said? Somebody enlighten me on this subject and oblige,—AN INQUIRER, Rutland, Iowa.

BIBLE LESSONS.

THIRD QUARTER.

STUDIES IN THE KINGS.

LESSON XIII. Sept. 27, 1885.—Review.

Review Hints.—The lessons for the past quarter cover nearly a century (about 90 years) of Israel's history. We cannot boast of a much longer existence as a nation.

Lesson I–III afford examples of the bitter consequences of departing from God. The tendency of sin to grow worse and worse, as exemplified in these lessons, should be particularly emphasized. This is one of the greatest perils in deferring the acceptance of Christ and consecration to his service.

In lessons IV–VII God exhorts his people through his servant Elijah, and pleads with them, by his threatenings and judgments, to turn from idolatry to himself. Indeed every dispensation of Providence during those years is a call to repentance. How long he has plead with us, too, as individuals and as a nation!

In lesson IX he gives us another example of the bitter consequences of sin in the story of Naboth,—the sin of Covetousness, the crying sin of to-day! What a train of evils follow its lead! Lying, perjury, oppression, injustice, hypocrisy, robbery, murder! An emphatic warning!

In lesson VII we have an example of man's frailty and of God's gracious dealing with his faithful servants. In lesson X, an example of his rewards bestowed upon them. In lesson XI we have a glimpse of immortality, and in lesson XII, the sinner finds encouragement to apply to the Fountain opened for sin and uncleanness.

Who is there that is not touched by these lessons; saint or sinner, young or old, backslider or faithful servant, Mr Great Heart or Mr. Ready-To-Halt, individuals or nations? The study of such examples, exhortations, encouragements must surely increase our responsibilities. May these prove, not the savor of death unto death, but of life unto life!—U. P. Bible Teacher.

A Wonderful Woman, A Wonderful Life, AND A Wonderful Book.

Laura S. Haviland is a quiet, gentle, unassuming Quaker woman, 76 years of age, yet vigorous, who has had a remarkable career of usefulness, and has now given to the world a remarkable history of her "Life Work" as a teacher, at an early day, of the colored refugees in Canada and in Michigan, and in other States, as a traveler down South in the guise of a "berry picker," helping out into freedom many slaves; as a nurse and preacher to the sufferers in hospitals during the war; and with Gov. St. John and Flizabeth Comstock, relieving the destitute and suffering refugees in Kansas, etc.

Her book is neither fiction nor founded on fiction, but is an interesting narration of facts of a most thrilling character, as every one will find and testify who will get and read her book, now on sale at the Cynosure office, 221 W. Madison St., Chicago, Ill. Price, cloth, $1,75; half Russia, $2.25.

Com.*) James Kennedy, California; Robert Hardie, Dakota; J. F. Galloway, Florida; L. N. Stratton, Illinois; Israel Hess, Indiana; J. N. Norris, Iowa; H. Curtis, Kansas, S. A. Pratt, Massachusetts; H. A. Day, Michigan; E. Tapley, Mississippi; S. C. Kimball, New Hampshire; Robert Armstrong, New Jersey; E. A. Foldstrom, Nebraska; J. M. Scott, Ohio; Wm. H. Pruett, Oregon; A. M, Paull, Rhode Island; J. W. Moss, West Virginia; M. R. Britten, Wisconsin.

AMERICAN PLATFORM.

ADOPTED AT CHICAGO, JUNE 20, 1884.

Viewing with deep concern the corrupt and unsettled condition of American politics, and witnessing with alarm the fearful prevalence of caste and clannishness by which our citizens are being arrayed in hostile bands, working secretly to compass political ends, a method directly and powerfully tending to increase corruption, to destroy mutual confidence, and hasten disruption and bloodshed; and having no hope of adequate remedy for these evils from existing parties, and believing the foundation of a party based upon the fundamental principles of the Declaration of American Independence, both inevitable and indispensable:

We, therefore, a portion of the American people, believing with our fathers that we have our rights and liberties, not from men or parties, but from God; believing in the Christian marriage, and not in Mormonism; believing in the religions democracy of the New Testament, and not in the despotism of the lodge; believing, also, with our Scotch and English ancestors, that civil government, though ordained in God, is "founded in nature, not in grace," and, therefore, that all have equal civil rights; while we abhor the idea of enforcing religion or controlling conscience by human laws and penalties as calculated to make hypocrites, not Christians, and savoring of the days of priestism, the fagot and the stake, we at the same time as firmly believe that atheism and priestcraft are twins and both alike foes to human liberty and welfare. We further most firmly believe that a government without God has none but lynch power, and is destitute of all legitimate authority to maintain civil order, to swear a witness, to try a criminal, to hang a murderer, to imprison a thief; and while we consider government without God as a mere usurpation, we regard all religions and worships invented by men, and so having no higher than human origin, as mere swindling impositions and cheats. We believe in peace and in national arbitration as a means of perpetuating it; yet we as profoundly believe that the bravery and blood of our soldiers have bought us the peace which we enjoy, and we honor the memories of the dead and will be just to the claims of the living; and we take up and prolong the strain raised by the women of this country: "For God, and home, and native land," and trust that this beautiful and patriotic motto will soon be not only echoed by their voices, but sustained by their votes.

We, therefore, solemnly adopt and present the following, as containing a brief synopsis of the principles of our government, by which we intend to be governed in casting our votes. We hold:

1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.
2. That the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.
3. That God requires, and man needs a Sabbath.
4. We demand the prohibition of the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating drinks.
5. We hold that the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.
6. We are opposed to putting prison labor or depreciated contract labor from foreign countries in competition with free labor to benefit manufacturers, corporations or speculators.
7. We are in favor of a revision and enforcement of the laws concerning patents and inventions; for the prevention and punishment of frauds either upon inventors or the general public.
8. We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage.
9. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by Articles 13, 14 and 15 of our amended National Constitution should be preserved inviolate, and the same equality should be extended to Indians and Chinamen.
10. That international differences should be settled by arbitration.
11. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.
12. That the general government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.
13. That it should be the settled policy of the government to reduce tariffs and taxes as rapidly as the necessities of revenue and vested business interests will allow.
14. That polygamy should be immediately suppressed by law, and that the Republican party is censurable for the long neglect of its duty in respect to this evil.
15. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice President of the United States.

THE CHURCHES VS. LODGERY.

The following denominations are committed by vote of their legislative assemblies or by constitution to a separation from secret lodge worship:

Adventists (Seventh-day.)
Baptists—Primitive, Seventh-day and Scandinavian.
Brethren (Dunkers or German Baptists.)
Christian Reformed Church.
Church of God (Northern Indiana Eldership.)
Congregational—The State Associations of Illinois and Iowa have adopted resolutions against the lodge.
Disciples (in part.)
Friends.

The Christian Cynosure.

EDITORS.

J. BLANCHARD. HENRY L. KELLOGG.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1885.

DR. J. E. ROY'S ADDRESS at the court house, Wheaton, is handsomely noticed by the American, Washington, D. C., and is warmly commended by those who heard it. One who read it has sent his subscription for the Cynosure. Bro. Hinman's familiar style and good sense are a great addition to what was before an excellent paper.

SECRETARY STODDARD brings word from Kansas that Rev. J. S. T. MILLIGAN, of North Cedar Reformed Presbyterian church, takes a profound interest in the proposed General Convention of Christian churches against the lodge. This convention is endorsed by prominent Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Lutherans and others. The bare proposal of it kindles enthusiasm whenever it comes. Committees are consulting, and the Cynosure will cheerfully publish suggestions as to time, place, etc.

REV. EZRA JONES, Presbyterian, sends us a copy of the Citizen, Phelps, N. Y., containing a good sound sermon preached by him in his 82nd year. Rev. Mr. Jones was a Sophomore in Middlebury College, Vt., when Morgan was murdered by the Masons. He had taken seven degrees in Masonry, which he renounced and thenceforth kept his garments pure from the abomination: and now with a quiet conscience in a good old age he awaits the reward of a well-spent life.

GOOD TEMPLARS AND PROHIBITION—A special to the Chicago Daily News, from Madison, Wis., Sept. 1, says: "The Grand Lodge of Good Templars convened here to-day, about two hundred delegates being present. The order is reported in good condition throughout the State. A big effort will be made at the session to divorce the organization from the prohibition movement." The strings of Good Templar initials are steadily disappearing from prohibition papers, which brings that party steadily toward the American party, that is, to bed rock. No national reliance whatever can be placed on secret lodges for temperance voting, as the above shows; and the sooner the divoree is completed, the safer and sounder for the cause. The Good Templars who voted for St. John last fall, were "few and far between."

"BETWEEN TWO OPINIONS."

This book is brought to an end in this Cynosure, and will forthwith be issued in the volume.

We know not how to speak of this work or its author. She is a little, black-eyed woman, living in Wellesley, Mass. We have seen her but once and but a couple of hours.

Mrs. Stowe, with whose Uncle Tom's Cabin, we always associate this book, was our neighbor and acquaintance for years. General Wolf, a night or two before he fell on the Heights of Abraham, read "Gray's Elegy written in a Country Churchyard," then just out, and remarked: "I would rather be the author of that poem than the Conqueror of Quebec." I would rather have been the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" than either: and, at the risk of being deemed an enthusiast, I would rather have written this book of Miss Flagg's than to have written Gray's Elegy, conquered Quebec, or written "Uncle Tom;" and we risk the opinion that every careful reader of Miss Flagg's volume, who votes with the American party, will concur with us in this estimate of it, extravagant as it may seem.

Mrs. Stowe is a genius, and her book, though entitled "Life among the Lowly," sheds it brightest and most benignant rays on the wealthy and aristocratic. Even her hero, Uncle Tom, was a slave-saint whom a pious slave-holder would have been proud to own. Miss Flagg's genius, like that of Harvey, who discovered the circulation of the blood, is the "genius of industry," and its motto might well be "Medio tutissimus ibis." Her heroes are common mechanics, and her heroines such as any farmer's girl might hope to equal. Her book will not enchain and enrapture like Mrs. Stowe's, at the same time it is a better book. "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was an effectual center blow at slavery. Miss Flagg aims to disenchant the American mind from the sorcery of the lodge, and whoever can read it through with dry eyes, has better nerves or less susceptibility than we. Yet, the work escapes the objection to most novels that they give false ideas of life. Her St. Clairs are excellent farmers, and her Evas would make excellent bread. And if, as we incline to believe it, her book should, like "Uncle Tom's Cabin," hit the public between wind and water, so as to gain a vast circulation, it will bring the American party to the front, as Mrs. Stowe's book led the Republicans to the White House "through the graveyard of the Whig party," as predicted by Salmon P. Chase. Miss Flagg has undertaken no less than the mighty task of dethroning the image of the apocalyptic beast from its shadowy throne in the polities of Americe and the world. And if she fails, like Phœbus who undertook to guide the chariot of the sun, she will "fail amid great undertakings."

PIRATES OF PROHIBITION.

The types last week made us say "obnoxious" when we had written "obvious;" and war hoofs for iron hoofs. The obvious rule is that candidates must stand upon, and for the platforms of their parties. We voted for St. John without his publicly accepting our platform or our nomination; though in private conversation and correspondence, he did both. He acted thus to keep his honor good with the Prohibitionists, whose nomination he had accepted; who paid him his support, and a part of whom were Good Templars, whom we denounce, because they reverse Shakespeare's > "Stealing the livery of heaven

> To serve the devil in."

The Good Templars wear the livery of the devil, while pretending to serve God.

But this game of Good Templarism is being fast played out. Their late Grand Lodge in New York resolved that it was inconsistent for Good Templars to sign petitions for saloon-licenses, and three hundred members left the lodge on account of that vote. The Grand Lodge itself voted against the St. John or Prohibition party. Only about one in one hundred Good Templars voted for St. John last fall. Edward Evans at Lake Bluff, argued in favor of dropping the name Prohibition, and adopting another for their national party. The name should, and doubtless will be AMERICAN, which was the name first given to American politics; and which excluded, as we do, monarchial monopolies and titles of nobility. One half, or nearly so, of the Wisconsin Good Templars insist on divorcing their lodge from the Prohibition party. In short a secret temperance lodge is a pirate which will scuttle the Prohibition ship unless it is cast overboard, and the sooner the temperance cause casts it off, the safer.

DR. BENJAMIN RUSH.

"The foe of tyrants and the friend of man;" a Quaker, a Presbyterian, instructor of the first Methodist Bishops, Coke and Ashbury and the venerable Bishop White, chaplain of the Revolutionary Congress, in the ruinous effects of intoxicants. He gave in person a thousand copies of his celebrated essay on alcoholic liquors, to the Presbyterian General Assembly; and, though mover of the first resolution in favor of Americen Independence, and author of a Declaration from which the one adopted in Congress, July 4th, 1776, was modeled, he received gold medals or distinguished recognition from four crowned heads in Europe, for his labors and humanity in resisting the yellow fever in 1793, and 1805, when all who had strength and means fled from Philadelphia, while hundreds of dying friends and relatives, struck with the disease, with their dying breath were imploring them to stay by them.

Dr. Rush steadily went his rounds, prescribing to 100 and 120 patients daily; and, having found by experience what prescriptions had the best effect, he employed clerks and medical students to prepare, and hand them out to thousands. He refused large sums of money offered, and charged only the common fee for medical attendance; and when he recovered from exhaustion and the disease himself, he dreamed a poor woman cried out to him, "Do not turn away from the poor. Their prayers saved your life when doomed to die by the fever." Thousands were helped by him who had nothing to pay; and he said, "The poor are the most profitable patients for God is their paymaster."

He espoused the patriot cause, and aided it by his pen. Crowded by incessant occupation, he at first refused a seat in the Revolutionary Congress, but when some members left because they were opposed to independence, he took one of their empty seats; and in a full, bold hand signed, BENJAMIN RUSH to the Declaration which might hang the signers. He was president of the old Pennsylvania Society for the abolition of slavery; planned, and was vice-president of a Bible Society, the first, we believe, formed in this country. Amid such multiform labors he was so profound and accurate in his scientific research that he was made a member of scientific societies on both sides the ocean: and the illustrious Zimmerman wrote of him: "Sa conduite a menite que non seulement la ville Philadelphia, mais l'humanite entire, lui eleve une statue:" i. e., "Not only Philadelphia, but humanity entire, owes him a statue."

The constitution of the Pennsylvania abolition society, of which Dr. Rush was president, excluded slave holders from membership, an example which churches afterward followed, and gave accuracy and tone to the American mind in the struggle which followed, resulting in the overthrow of slavery.

The temperance movement originated by the essay of Dr. Rush is slower and less violent than that against slavery. Reforms are produced by the Spirit of God, and they spring up like willows by watercourses when the time is come. "Truth springs out of the earth, and righteousness looks down from heaven." In 1808, a temperance society sprang up in Saratoga county, New York. An abstinence pledge was circulated by Esek Cowan, then a raw boy, afterward one of the most learned judges this county has produced. Dr. Lyman Beecher drew facts and principles from the Rush pamphlet, and lit the whole horizon with the blaze of his genius. In 1811 a take-heed society was formed at Cambridge College. The ministry and churches were slowly reclaimed, and the issue is now taken to the polls, and will never go back till a saloon is a nuisance, and the liquor business crime.

As a Quaker and reformer he must have been opposed to the lodge. But he died April 19th, 1813, at the age of 67, and during his life the secret orders had never attracted popular attention. But his son, Hon. Richard Rush, in whom the father's sentiments shone with redoubled splendor, a sketch of whose life we hope soon to give our readers, wrote against the lodge with a power excelled by none, and equalled by none except his long-time associate in public life, John Quincy Adams.

Dr. Benjamin Rush was a medical professor and author, a philosopher and writer on the mind, a founder of Carlisle College Pa.; a statesman, he wrote and moved a first draft of the Declaration of Independence in the Pennsylvania conference, and signed the Jefferson draft, as member of Congress; he was surgeon-general in the American army, and the companion and instructor of bishops and kings; and at the close of his life, was treasurer of the United States mint. Yet his religious character shed a lustre and glory over all his public employments and stupendous acquisitions. He was through life a profound believer and diligent student of the Bible, and at his death left unfinished a work on one branch of its teachings.

—Miss West, in her sketch of Dr. Rush, an article which the reader will wish to turn to again and again, refers to a temperance society in Litchfield, Conn., ante dating that of Lebbeus Armstrong and Dr. Clark, in Saratoga county. This is the first mention we have seen of such a society; and were not the utmost confidence to be placed in Miss West's statements, the Cynosure would hesitate to lower the banner of our hero Armstrong. But the Moreau society seems to have been as independent and original as if there had never been a State of Connecticut—a reform springing up through the influence of the same Spirit of God, even as the great Reformation broke out, like separate yet contemporaneous volcanic fires, under Luther in Germany and under Zwingle in Switzerland. For humanity's sake we hope some one will discover that the first American temperance society began on the Mayflower.

—The nauseous Masonic arguments thrown in the dark at Humboldt, Nebraska, at our anti-lodge friends, have a suitable description in a letter from Bro. Bissell of that place, which waits until our next; as does also an interesting Washington letter received too late for insertion this week.

—The Living Way of Memphis, tells of a remarkable case of body-stealing, the culprits being members of a Masonic lodge. One of their members having died with the request that the Masons should bury him with the rites of their religion after Christian services in his church, the pastor, the congregation and the mourners, after patient waiting, were informed, to their astonishment, that the Hiramites had marched past with the body to another church which boasted of a Masonic minister, and there had everything their own way, to the great disgust of the friends of the deceased.

—A special committee of the Chicago Y. M. C. A. has secured Dr. Nathaniel West for a series of twelve lectures in Farwell Hall, on the "Modern Phases of Infidelity." These lectures have been highly eulogized in other cities and a large attendance is promised in Chicago. The lectures will be given on consecutive Sabbath afternoons at four o'clock, beginning Sept. 27th.

WELCOME TESTIMONIALS.

The friendly relations between the Cynosure and the Swedish churches, which have been so happily increased during the past few months, are also fruitful in blessing to both. Our readers have seen from time to time how greatly the General Agent, the editors and lecturers have been encouraged by the warm-hearted co-operation of Swedish brethren in various localities: they will be equally cheered by reading the following testimonials from Swedish pastors, which are no better than a number of others received at this office. These brethren will heartily co-operate in the proposed conference of churches, and generously assist, when the opportunity shall come, in bringing other denominations into the same liberty which they enjoy in Christ, while separated from the evil fellowship of the lodge:

REV. JACOB J. HOIKKA, Astoria, Oregon:—The object of the paper is more than excellent. I have read the paper; I like it. Never can be spoken or written too much in a right manner about the secret societies. I wish the Christian Cynosure were read by many on this Pacific coast. Here is just as evil a deluge of all kinds of secret societies as that of whisky and beer. The secret societies make the churches secular, and they draw more people from a true religious life than whisky does.

REV. C. J. E. HATERIUS, Kansas City, Mo.:—With what I have seen of the Christian Cynosure I am very much pleased. It is attacking the enemy in one of his very strongholds, and will by the strength of the Lord do a good work. Our Swedish Lutheran church in this country is against all secret societies, as detrimental to true Christianity.

REV. L. G. ALMEN, New London, Minn.:—I have received the Cynosure and your letter. Please accept my sincere thanks. As to the objects and aim of the National Christian Association as well as the way of carrying on the work I fully endorse it, because it must be undenominational in order to reach all or as many as possible.

REV. D. RENSTROM, Creston, Iowa:—I have with much pleasure read the paper and I am glad to say that I enjoy from my very heart your contest with the secret societies, which I, both as a true Christian and as a minister of Christ in particular ought to condemn. It shall become a cordially welcome visitor to me and I will be glad to see how the few but bold heroes go on conquering that red dragon who is drawing the third part of the stars of heaven to cast them to the earth. May the blessed conqueror gather all his true believers around his cross-banner in this holy war against all evil and especially false religion, hypocrisy and infidelity!

REV. J. FELLEEN, San Francisco, Cal.:—I shall be more than grateful to get the Cynosure. I, too, war against secrecy. God help us. Yes, truth shall conquer. The Lord strengthen you.

HIGH LICENSE IN NEBRASKA.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—At Lake Bluff I had the pleasure of listening to Mayor Hardy of Lincoln, Nebraska. He is the reputed father of high license in that State. He said that in connection with others he prepared a proposition to submit a prohibitory amendment to the people of his State and tried to get it adopted by the legislature, failing in which they secured as the next best thing the passage of the present high license law. He says that as a means of lessening the horrors of the drink curse it is a failure and worse than a failure. There is no less drinking under it than there was before. There are no fewer poor, miserable drunkards' wives or worse than fatherless children. Before it Lincoln had twenty-three licensed saloons. The first year after it it had five licensed saloons, the next it had twenty-four. After it no drinking man had to go thirsty, and there were no fewer criminals and paupers to care for.

He had collected the first $1,000 license under it, and by his fidelity in enforcing the law against liquor sellers he made them so angry at him that they threatened his property and his life. Several shots were fired through his dwelling, and as he said he doubled his life insurance and "let the machine run." They set fire to his store, and he doubled his insurance and "let the machine run." They then, in this act proving themselves to be good Freemasons, placed a coffin before his door. His wife asked what that meant and she was told that it meant a threat to put him into it if he was not careful. When she expressed fears for his safety, he asked her if she wished him to show the white feather. She said no. He was in no hurry to put that coffin out of sight, but finally sold it to a furniture dealer for $14, which he put into the Temperance treasury.

If prohibition does not prohibit, here is another proof that restriction does not restrict and regulation does not regulate, and that the way to abolish evils is not to license them whether the license be high or low. Prohibition in the hands of a party that does not wish it enforced will never prohibit, but in the hands of a dominant party that is determined to enforce it, will prohibit. O. F. LUMRY.

me, as a defender of the Christian religion against the rival assumptions of the lodge religion, to inquire into the nature of Masonic obligations. So the cloud of his indignation vanished and he treated us as courteously at parting as when we met.

One of the other eight ministers had been an Odd-fellow. He was so perfectly satisfied that Masonry and Odd-fellowship were good things that he refused to listen to either facts or arguments.

One of the other seven had belonged to several of the minor secret societies and he thought favorably of some of them. But we showed him that God had commanded believers not to be unequally yoked with unbelievers; and that those who were already yoked with unbelievers were commanded by God to come out and be separate; so entirely separate as not to touch the unclean thing.

The remaining six ministers did not sympathize with secret societies in any form. We did all we could to enlighten their minds and fortify them against lodge influence and to arouse them to work actively with Christ against the Masonic anti-Christ.

On Sabbath, the 29th of August, I preached in the morning and lectured on the religion of Masonry in the evening. And on the 6th inst., I preached two sermons exalting Christ as the only and sufficient Saviour, and exposing the false pretenses of the Masonic anti-Christ.

Let all who believe in Christ as the only and all-sufficient Saviour unite your prayers and efforts for the coming of his kingdom, and for the overthrow of the Masonic and all other anti-Christs. Let us continue in supplication, brethren, until the Spirit helps our infirmities and we are enabled to offer prevailing prayer. Brethren, pray for me. Your brother in Jesus, C. F. HAWLEY.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

IDANA, Kans., Sept. 9, 1885.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I have just arrived at Bro. J. R. J.Latimer's, eleven miles west of Clay Center. I rode out with him on a load of lumber. He has a congregation of over one hundred members here on the prairie, all sworn to anti-secrecy. Having been through anti-secret conventions with Bro. J. P. Stoddard and Elder Smith last week at Willis and Humboldt, this reform was the leading topic of conversation. Bro. Latimer wishes that Secretary Stoddard could give a few of his illustrated lectures here. A Free Methodist brother we met on the road to-day also expressed a desire to hear Bro. Stoddard. He said such lectures were needed to save the young men from the lodge. There are two Covenanter churches and two United Presbyterian churches near Clay Center, also congregations of United Brethren, and Wesleyan Methodists. Bro. Stoddard would receive a warm welcome by these churches.

I visited Concordia, the county seat of Cloud, last night and met Bro. H. T. Jackson, pastor of two United Presbyterian congregations; one near Concordia, and one at Jamestown. He has built fine church edifices at each of these places during the past summer, which he expects soon to dedicate. He is heart and soul in the reform work, and would welcome Bro. Stoddard to both his congregations. Concordia is the headquarters of liberalism in this part of Kansas. The Blade is an infidel paper and is now keeping up a war against the Bible in the schools. The school board recently passed a law excluding the Bible from the schools of the town. The churches are trying to rally the people in order to have the law repealed.

I spent last Sabbath with Bro. S. B. Moore, pastor of the M. P. church at Liberty, Neb. He was formerly pastor near Sparta, Ill, and gave me a kind welcome to his pulpit morning and evening. His congregation is right on the anti-secret issue. They have the largest congregation in the village, and would furnish a fine audience for an anti-secret lecture. At Pawnee City, Burchard and Mission Creek, are flourishing U. P. churches, all near together and in sympathy with all true reform. They have never been visited by an anti-secret lecturer, and would heartily support the cause.

I think Bro. Stoddard's illustrated lectures, such as I heard him deliver last week at Humboldt and Willis, are the best adapted to enlighten the public on this subject of any I have heard. I wish they could be delivered in every town and hamlet through this broad land. The people would not long say then, as I have heard them so often say out here in the West, "O the anti-secret cause is dying out. Secretism is growing more popular all the time!"

LITERATURE.

BRICKS FROM BABEL, a brief view of the myths, traditions, and religious belief of races, with concise studies in ethnography. By Julia McNair Wright. pp. 181. Price 60 cents. John B. Alden, New York.

Mrs. Wright has written instructive and entertaining stories against Romanism, and other works that show more than ordinary versatility in her genius, but we doubt not this work, though comparatively small, taxed her powers more than any other. Picking up the clews in the labarynth of the obscurities of the pre-Mosaic age has in past years been so much a guess work that a new book has been demanded every few years to keep pace with the discoveries, real or supposed, which the spade of the explorer is continually turning up. Unlike a few of the archæologists, Mrs. Wright brings to her task a love for Christianity and the Bible, but this does not necessarily prevent the successful study of the ancient records outside that book. She wrote these studies in ethnography chiefly in the British Museum, and has attempted, successfully, we think, to popularize the considerable amount of information gathered in expensive volumes concerning the wandering and dispersion of the descendants of Noah. This book is another valuable addition to the Bible students library.

The September Century furnishes a rare and valuable table of contents. Of greatest public interest, perhaps, is General Grant on "The Siege of Vicksburg;" the forcible frontispiece portrait, after a photograph taken when General Grant was President (with which is given a fac-simile of his first signature on the army pay-account as "General Retired"). A supplemental article of great interest, in the same number, is "A Woman's Diary of the Siege of Vicksburg," which gives an inside view of the hardships and anxieties suffered by the besieged. The "Memoranda on the Civil War," besides General Grant's communication, embrace, "Who Projected the Canal at Island No. 10?" by General Schuyler Hamilton; "The Charge of Cook's Cavalry at Gaines's Mill," in reply to General Fitz-John Porter, by General Philip St. George Cooke, with "Recollections of a Participant in the Charge," by Rev. W. H. Hitchcock; and a continuation of the discussion in regard to "General Beauregard's Courier at Bull Run," by Major Campbell Brown. Wendell Philips Garrison, in an illustrated paper, describes the Prudence Crandall persecution of 1833, and the encouragement given by William Lloyd Garrison to the brave schoolmistress who wished to educate "young ladies of color." Lieutenant Schwatka's paper on "The Great River of Alaska," which has a special interest, is profusely illustrated. It describes the journey of the Government party of exploration commanded by him over the coast mountains of Alaska into British Columbia and their raft journey from the head-waters of the great Yukon river down to the ruins of Fort Selkirk. The second paper in the October number will continue the journey to the mouth of the Yukon. Mr Howells continues his charming and beautifully illustrated Italian papers with a second article on "Panforte di Siena." Miss Alice Maud Fenn describes the pastoral attractions of England in a paper entitled "Among the Red Roofs of Sussex," which her father, Harry Fenn, has profusely illustrated. George W. Cable takes up the discussion excited by his paper on "The Freedman's Case in Equity," with a forcible rejoinder entitled "The Silent South." Mr. Cable's position on this question is that of a Christian and patriot. His views, presented in an eloquent, truthful style, are read with profound interest in all sections. Short essays of general interest in "Topics of the Time" are "Huddling in the Town and Living in the Country," "Some Causes of the Present Depression," and "Sensitiveness of Cities."

The St. Nicholas has a long and varied table of contents, one of the most attractive features of which is a fanciful tale by Frank R. Stockton, entitled "The Battle of the Third Cousins." "A Great Financial Scheme," by Sophie Swett, is a very funny story with a very good moral. The moral is pointed at the tendency to speculate with other people's money and the loose ways of doing business that so largely contribute to the constant emigration to Canada. The story relates with rare humor how a country boy attempted to emulate the great Wall street speculators and met with disastrous consequences. In "Spiders of the Sea," C. F. Holder contributes an interesting paper about crabs, and their many curious ways and uses. Henry Frederic Reddall writes an entertaining article on "Nicknames" which is historical rather than analytic, and shows how some very great people were known by some very queer names. The illustrations are especially noteworthy this month, and include a full page engraving direct from nature, by Elbridge Kingsley.

THE HOME.

CLOSE THE BARN DOORS.

Close the doors of the dear old barn,
For the children are gone away,
And the autumn sunbeams but feebly fall
And nestle amid the hay.
Such quiet reigns on the homestead farm,
As saddens old grandpa's heart,
And grandma knows how sorry she was
From her mischievous pets to part.

There are traces here, there are traces there
Of the roguish hands and feet
Of many a grandchild. True, but then
Their kisses were warm and sweet,
And they coaxed their way into grandpa's heart,
And nestled 'round grandma's chair,
And their shouts rang out through the quaint old house,
As out on the midsummer air.

But quiet reigns on the farm, at last,
And the old barn-swallows rest
In mild content, on the eaves above,
And the ring-dove broods on her nest;
And the dear old barn is empty and still,
And there's never a voice to shout,
Or a merry laugh to echo and ring,
To drive the silence out.

So, grandpa, close the heavy old doors,
And leave the fragrant hay
In the dust and gloom, for the cackling hens
Their eggs in peace to lay;
For summer is gone, and vacation time
For many a month is over;
But when it comes with another year,
Won't your boys be rolling in clover!

A STORY OF THE CRUSADE.

By the window a young girl in deep mourning bent silently over the machine she was feeding with yards upon yards of dainty material. Her busy fingers never faltered in their task, but presently Mrs. Avery caught a faint sob, and looked up to see the tears dropping from the seamstress's eyes. Her sympathetic heart was touched at once, and springing up she swept the work from the machine.

"Now see here, my child," she said gently, "I might have known you were sick, with those pale cheeks; go right home and rest you; not another stitch shall you sew to-day."

"O, Mrs. Avery," said the seamstress, "It is not that; please let me sew, it keeps me from thinking."

"What is it Mary?" she asked gently, "can you tell me about it?" The girl broke at the question into a perfect passion of grief.

"It's Rob, Mrs. Avery; I've always been afraid for him, but I've prayed for him so. Oh, I couldn't think God would let such trouble come to me, but the craze was born in him and now they've got him."

"Rob, your brother?" questioned Mrs. Avery, drawing the poor girl's head to her bosom, and gently smoothing the dark hair.

"Yes, he is such a good brother and loves me so much; you see I brought him up, Mrs. Avery; he was only three when mother died, and there was just we two. He's only seventeen now, and we felt so proud when he got a place in Wolfort's drug store. I thought he'd be among gentlemen, and he's so smart, Mrs. Avery, and so handsome. I never supposed they sold liquor at drug stores. Rob didn't tell me at first; he knew I would'nt like it, but I found it out. It's worse than a saloon, Mrs. Avery; gentlemen can go in there and nobody suspects. Why, there are men who go there just regularly, Rob says, and you wouldn't believe it if I should tell you—"

Mary stopped, and Mrs Avery's heart gave a wild throb—not of fear; she knew her husband too well, she trusted him too fully; but did not these other wives trust? If only Bert were older she might perhaps be anxious.

"And boys, too, younger even than Rob; seems as if it ought to be somebody's business to tell their mothers; sometimes I've thought I would, but I've been so worried and troubled about Rob, it didn't seem as if I could take up other folk's troubles. You see it was pretty bad before I knew it, and I did go to Mr. Wolfort but he laughed at me and then got angry. He said if I thought his place wasn't respectable euough for—for the son of a man who died a drunkard, I'd better take him away."

"What a brute!" said Mrs. Avery.

"I didn't mind it much; it is true, and that's what makes it worse for Rob; mother told me it would be so. I wanted to take him away, but he will not leave, and what can I do, Mrs. Avery? O, I wish somebody would talk to Mr. Wolfort who knows what to say."

"I'll speak for you," said Mrs. Avery. "I'm not afraid of that man."

Her heart was torn within her, but pride closed her lips; she would not for her life have asked Mary Neal the question which was never for an instant out of her thought, "Who were those boys? Can it be possible my Bert was one of them?"

Her voice was steady, though her delicate hands fairly clinched each other, as she asked the question of Bert himself in the evening.

"What do you high school boys do with yourselves during your intermission?"

"O, different things," said Bert, carelessly; "loaf about and tease the girls. Twenty minutes are either too long or too short for anything."

"Don't you think some of the boys make nuisances of themselves at Wolfort's?"

"Who says so?" asked Bert quickly. "Nuisances? not much; he just tries his prettiest to get us to coming there." "Us! what for, Bert? Why should he want you?" and this time the tremble in the mother's voice was unmistakable. "O, well," said Bert uneasily, "lots of the boys have money, and they buy soda water and different things; school's an awful dry place, and then most all the fellows smoke, and they get their cigarettes of him, and so sometimes he treats."

"To what?"

"Candies and soda water, and different things. I tell you, Tom Andrus got caught, though. He came in and called for soda water with brandy, and didn't see that his father was at the end of the counter drinking the very same thing. Just as Tom took up his glass his father put his down and said as savage as you please, 'Well, young man, things have come to a pretty pass, drinking at your time of life.' 'That's just what I was thinking,' said Tom, looking at his father's empty glass. All the men laughed so Mr. Andrus had to join in."

"And you were there, Bert?"

"No, ma'am, not that time. I have been there, though, and I tell you somebody ought to look after Rob Wilder; he's going to the bad."

"O, Bert! promise me, promise me never to go there again."

"I promised myself that the other day. I don't intend to be seen in any sort of a whisky shop, whether they call it a drug store or a saloon. Tom Andrus says Wolfort sells more liquor than any saloon in town; sends it out in bulk to houses and to gentlemen's offices. They keep things private in the store, and call that little back office a reading and smoking room, but any one can get liquor whom they know."

That night Mrs. Avery had many thoughts. One was, "I shall never feel safe again day or night." Another was, "I will surely speak for poor Mary Wilder's sake," and then, "I will speak for my own sake, and for the sake of every mother."

* * * * * *

There were several visitors in the little smoking room at Wolfort's, when the band of Christian women came into the store. Twelve women, some in elegant attire, three in deep mourning, and one, Rachel Lowry, in plain Quaker garb. Some of the faces were pale, but on every one was set the calm assurance of faith, for they had come straight from the presence of the Master, and the Comforter was even then whispering, "Fear not, I am with thee." From street to street of that liquor cursed city they had carried their message of warning and entreaty, and though some scoffed, there were many who were ready to say, "Though I fear not God, neither regard man, yet because these women trouble me, I will get out of the business."

But Wolfort was not the man to be troubled. He had loudly proclaimed his anxiety for a visit, promising to receive the ladies with the utmost courtesy. In truth he redeemed his promise. He received them at the door with an air of profound respect, and invited them to the little room where a vase of flowers among the papers upon the table, were doing their best to overcome the odor of tobacco smoke which pervaded the air. The gentlemen present were all strangers to the ladies, none of the proprietor's regular customers having the fortitude to stay and meet them although urged to do so. At a sign from Mr. Wolfort, Rob Wilder appeared, his brown eyes dancing with fun, and offered a silver tray, filled with glasses of hot lemonade, to the ladies.

"You must be weary with your good work, ladies," said Mr. Wolfort, "and I trust you will allow me to offer you refreshment. It is little enough we poor sinners can do to help on your self-sacrificing work."

"Thank you, Mr. Wolfort," said Mrs. Avery, promptly, "your lemonade certainly looks tempting, but you could hardly expect us, after our week's experience, not to recognize the smell of brandy."

Mr. Wolfort colored slightly, but did not seem abashed, though some of his friends laughed.

"The merest drop, I assure you, just to bring up the flavor; not half so much as you housekeepers use in your mince pies, puddings, sauces and jellies."

"For what we have done in our ignorance, may God forgive us," said Rachel Lowry, "but we will never sin again in such fashion."

Mr. Wolfort took up a glass of lemonade and tasted it critically.

"Now, really, ladies, it seems too absurd; the amount of brandy in that lemonade, I do assure you—"

"Might not make a man drunk," interrupted Mrs. Avery, in a quiet tone, "and yet is enough to awaken a taste for such flavors; is enough to feed and foster an appetite that will soon grow beyond being satisfied with the few drops. The amount of brandy in that lemonade is enough to be the first step in a boy's road to ruin."

Mrs. Avery looked steadily at Rob as she spoke, and Mr. Wolfort curtly bade him take away the tray, adding in a low tone:

"Leave the glasses, you'll find use for them at noon."

At noon! Mrs. Avery thought of those bright-eyed, headstrong, reckless fellows, rushing away for a brief respite from books and lessons, drawn by their boyish appetites into the meshes of this net, finer than a spider's web, stronger than cords of steel. All her fear vanished like dew, in the fierce heat of her indignation, and forgetting everything but her purpose, she first astonished Mr. Wolfort by her full setting forth of his offenses great and small, and then so laid upon him the responsibility of such fearful consequences, present and future, that the complacent man began to feel wonderfully like a criminal. Especially did she protest against his course in enticing the boys to their own destruction, by his drugged cigarettes and his subtly flavored drinks. The sobbing breath of more than one mother was audible through her words, and when her own tears almost choked her voice, Rachel Lowry sank upon her knees and began to pray. The men stood silent, for no one could leave the room without fairly treading upon the women, and Mr. Wolfort with folded arms, and lips that vainly tried to preserve their cynical smile, listened without daring to raise his eyes from the floor. It was a wonderful prayer, full of the tender compassion of a heart whose own sorrows had rent it so wide that it stood open to the woes of all humanity. It plead with God for these suffering ones, for those who were led captives of Satan, but above all it implored his mighty power to touch the heart and arrest the arm of all wrong-doers, and the very tones of Rachel's voice carried such a conviction of nearness to the King, that one almost expected to see Him to whom she spake turn at once and avenge her of her adversaries.

Mrs. Avery stopped to speak a few friendly words to Rob, who was crying openly, and the little band went their way. Mr. Wolfort with an attempt at bravado, escorting them to the door, and saying with a ghastly smile:

"Call again, ladies, whenever you feel inclined; happy to see you always."

"Come home with me, aunt Rachel," said Mrs. Avery, imploringly, and when the friends had shut the door behind them the younger woman sank upon a chair, saying:

"O dear, I feel as if my faith was giving away. What did we accomplish?"

"What the Lord chose; perhaps He will show us, but we need not be troubled if he does not. I'll tell thee what thee needs."

"More faith, I suppose."

"Thee needs thy dinner and a good sleep."

"Why so I do," said Mrs. Avery with a little laugh of relief. "That was what the angel said to Elijah, 'Arise and eat,' and so we will."

And did they accomplish anything? Some of them doubted when the only result apparent was that Mr. Wolfort summarily dismissed Rob Wilder, and refused to allow the visiting committee to enter his store again. But Mr. Avery, whose convictions were all right although he seldom allowed them to interfere with his comfort, after laughing a little at his wife's crusading zeal, roused himself to find a safe place for Rob under the best of Christian influences, and gave the fatherless boy a few encouraging words which filled his heart with new hope for the future.

Professor Harden, awakened to a sense of his own neglect of duty, forbade the high school boys entering Wolfort's during the hours over which his control extended, and in some way, best known to himself, was able to enlist Wolfort himself in enforcing the order.

Still the ladies were refused admission, and although the cashier reported that the proprietor was at home and sick, assured them that it was by his authority that they were excluded.

One day a message came for Rachel Lowry. Mr. Wolfort wished to see her.

"You must go with me," she said to Mrs. Avery, and the two were driven to the elegant home of the proprietor. He hardly looked like a sick man, sitting in his luxurious arm chair by the library fire, but his face was pallid, his eyes were restless, and his hand hot and feverish.

"We are sorry to find you ill," said Mrs. Avery, courteously.

"Are you?" said Mr. Wolfort, with an uneasy laugh, "I supposed that was just what you were looking for, that I might be taken out of the way."

Mrs. Avery was shocked into silence, and before Rachel Lowry could open her lips, Mr. Wolfort went on with his eyes on her face:

"I may as well say it first as last, but I am beginning to believe you have bewitched me. I never was a superstitious man; I've said I wasn't afraid of angels or devils, but I can tell you what is a fact—I haven't had any rest day or night since you kneeled down in my store and asked the Lord to trouble me and give me no peace until my eyes were opened and my heart touched with repentance. Oh, I remember it all. I laughed, but it made the cold chills run over me then. I can't forget it. I say it over to myself till I feel as if I were going crazy. I've heard folks pray before now, but I've never heard any one talk to God as if she'd lived neighbor to him all her life, and just expected he was going to do what she asked him to."

"What can I do for thee?" asked Rachel in her low, quiet voice; "has the Lord opened thine eyes to thee, and touched thine heart to feel thy wickedness?"

Mr. Wolfort writhed in his chair, and glared at Rachel, but presently burst out,—

"I'll tell you what I'm going to do. I'm going to stick to a clean, straight drug business, though there isn't half the money in it. Why, there are fortunes made in handling fine liquors and alcoholic bitters"—

Mr. Wolfort stopped suddenly in his revelation of trade secrets, and after a little pause, added, "I'd give a little fortune now to be able to sleep as I used to, without hearing that prayer, 'Oh Lord, trouble this man; give him no rest; speak to him day and night.'"

Mrs. Avery was weeping, but Rachel's face was calm and it seemed to her pitiless, as she answered "Night and day, for two years, I, too, have heard that prayer. I have never forgotten it since I first heard it from the lips of my boy, dragged into ruin, and made in one moment of drunken delirium, a manslayer. Does thee remember James Lowry?"

The miserable man turned white to his very lips, and sank back in his chair. "James Lowry! my old chum! and you are"—"I am his mother; and I—I forgive thee," said Rachel, as a brief spasm of pain passed over her face.

And then she prayed again, prayer that brought rest and comfort to her own aching heart whatever effect it had upon Mr. Wolfort.

As she rose to leave him, he said humbly, "If one could only undo evil by repentance." "But we cannot, that is what makes it awful to live," said Rachel solemnly.

"I ought—I should like to say something to you—"

"Say it to the Lord; he will understand thee, and judge thee."

The two women rode home in silence, only as they parted Mrs. Avery put her arms about Rachel and said tenderly, "My poor friend, I never guessed that you bore such heavy sorrows."

"I do not," said Rachel, "I have laid them upon the burden Bearer; they are no longer mine."

Months afterward, when a great religious revival swept through the churches in the wake of the temperance crusade, and the miracle of creation was repeated in the hearts and lives of scores of men, Mr. Wolfort arose in the congregation and announced his new found salvation.

Rachel Lowry leaned forward in her place and whispered to her friend:

"Said I not unto thee if thou wouldst believe thou shouldst see the salvation of God?" "Ah!" said Mrs. Avery, "but I did not believe and yet I have seen it."—Union Signal.

SCHOOL CHILDREN REWARDED.

A hundred and fifty years ago, among the German settlers of Pennsylvania, there was a remarkable old school-master whose name was Christopher Dock. For three days he taught school at a little place called Skippack, and then for the next three days he taught at Salford.

Whenever one of his younger scholars succeeded in learning his A B C's the good Christopher Dock required the father of his pupil to give his son a penny, and also asked his mother to cook two eggs for him as a treat in honor of his diligence. To poor children in a new country these were fine rewards. At various other points in his progress, an industrious child in one of Dock's schools received a penny from his father and two eggs cooked by his mother. All this time he was counted a member of the school, but only as on probation. The day on which a boy or girl began to read was the great day. If the pupil had been diligent in spelling, the master, on the morning after the first reading day, would give a ticket carefully written or illuminated with his own hand. This read: "Industrious—one penny." This showed that the scholar was now really received into the school.

There were no clocks or watches; the children came to school one after another, taking their places near the master, who sat writing. They spent their time reading out of the Testament until all were there. But every one who succeeded in reading his verse without mistake stopped reading, and came and sat at the writing table to write. The poor fellow who remained last on the bench was called a Lazy Scholar.

The funniest of Dock's rewards was that which he gave to those who made no mistake in their lessons. He marked a large O with chalk on the hand of the perfect scholar. Fancy what a time the boys and girls must have had trying to go home without rubbing out this O!—From "A School of Long ago," by Edward Eggleston, in St. Nicholas for July.

THE CHILDHOOD OF MOZART.

"There can be but one Mozart." How often have these words been repeated by all who are familiar with the music of this immortal master, the prince of melody! Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart was born at Salzburg, Austria, January 27, 1756. His musical career began in his infancy, His remarkable genius, together with his serious face, caused the fear that he would not live to grow up. His sister, Marianne, had considerable musical talent, and while her father was giving her lessons, Wolfgang would employ himself picking out thirds. He soon received instruction with her on the clavier. He was a sweet, tractable child, applying himself to whatever was set for him to learn; but soon everything was given up for music. At the age of six, he composed a concerto for the piano so difficult that his father could not play it, and Wolfgang was obliged to show him how it should go. Wolfgang then began to study the violin, and one day, when some musicians were practicing together at his father's house, he begged that he might join them. His father requested him to play very softly so as not to disturb the others; but he played so beautifully that the second violin, whom he accompanied, soon ceased and left Wolfgang to finish alone. The child was of a sunny disposition, and would often say: "Next to God comes papa." He wished he could "put his papa under a glass case, so that he could never escape from home," and once, when away from home, he "sends his mamma a hundred million kisses, and kisses Marianne's nose and mouth."

In 1762 his father took Wolfgang and his sister to Vienna, where they were enthusiastically received. The children were petted by the whole court, and Wolfgang hugged and kissed the Empress Maria Theresa and the little princesses before leaving.

In October, 1787, after his return to Vienna, Mozart produced his greatest opera, "Don Giovanni." As late as the night before the performance the overture had not been copied. Mozart wrote on until late into the night, and his wife could only keep him awake by telling him the old fairy tales, such as he loved when a child; at times he would break from laughter to tears, until growing more and more weary he fell asleep. At seven the next morning, he arose and finished the score, the ink in some parts being scarcely dry when the copies were placed on the musicians' desks. The musicians had to play the overture at sight, but its beauties aroused the greatest enthusiasm both in the players and the audience. Mozart superintended all the rehearsals, and inspired the singers with his own ideas and feelings. He taught the hero to dance a minuet, and when one of the singers failed to conquer his score, Mozart altered it on the spot. At last the Emperor bestowed a court position on Mozart, but the salary was so meager—it was less than $500—that it was of little help to him, while his duty, to compose dance-music for the court, was humiliating. Well could he reply, when asked his income by the tax-gatherer, "Too much for what I do; too little for what I could do."—St. Nicholas.

TEMPERANCE.

THE TEMPERANCE SHIP.

Take courage, temperance workers!
You shall not suffer wreck,
When up to God the people's prayers
Are ringing from your deck:
Wait cheerily, temperance workers,
For daylight and for land;
The breath of God is in your sails,
Your rudder in his hand.

Sail on! sail on! deep freighted
With blessings and with hopes:
The good of old, with shadow hand,
Are pulling on your ropes.
Behind you, holy martyrs
Uplift the palm and crown;
Before you, unborn ages send
Their benedictions down.

Courage! your work is holy,
God's errands never fail!
Sweep on through storm and sunshine,
The thunder and the hail!
Work on! sail on! the morning comes,
The port you yet shall win:
And all the bells of God shall ring
The Ship of Temperance in.

TEMPERANCE LAWS IN THIRTY-SIX STATES.

The laws of the States are either license or prohibitory laws. The license laws are often coupled with local option which is of two kinds. The first, which we may call primary local option, is a vote of the people on the question of license or no license. Secondary local option is the settlement of the license question by the election of municipal councils and boards of trustees on the issue of license or no license. The following is the latest version of the laws in the States named:

Maine has both statutory and constitutional prohibition.

New Hampshire has prohibition by statute, of a satisfactory character when officials keep their oath of office.

Vermont also has a prohibitory law and prohibition is as well established in this State as in any.

Massachusetts has a stringent license law. It provides for six classes of licenses, the prices fixed by law ranging from $50 to $1,000. Licenses may be refused altogether by the municipalities. The law has a civil damage clause, and one against drunkenness, not well enforced. This State can boast one saloon to each sixty-four voters, while Vermont with its fairly enforced prohibitory law has only one to every 246 voters.

Connecticut has a local option license law.

Rhode Island is under much the same sort of license, but its legislature has voted to submit prohibition to the people. The matter must again pass the legislature before going to the people.

New York is endeavoring to secure high license legislation from the present legislature.

New Jersey has a local option license law; fees range from $50 to $100.

Pennsylvania has a license law but several counties and towns are under prohibition by special enactment.

Delaware has a very lax license law. Fee $100.

Maryland has the same, with many no-license counties, by special election authorized by the legislature.

Virginia has a stringent license law but license may be refused by the magistrate in case of complaint.

West Virginia has also a stringent license law, with modified local option.

North Carolina is under local option, and much local prohibition.

South Carolina's law stipulates for no license outside of incorporated towns and cities, and provides for local option in these. Elections decide the question for two years.

Georgia has local option in special counties, and high license wherever license is granted. One town has a $100,000 license fee, and one hundred counties prohibit the traffic entirely.

Florida has a stringent licence law, with local option. License can be granted only on petition of a majority of registered voters, and each signature must be attested by two witnesses and the whole list published for two weeks.

Alabama has local option on petition of the legislature.

Mississippi has a high license law, but requires a petition of a majority of male inhabitants. License fees from $200 to $1,000.

Louisiana has local option by election of municipal authorities to whom is given all control of the liquor traffic.

Texas has local option.

Arkansas has virtual Home Protection, the law providing that if a majority of men and women of legal age petition for no-license, no licenses can be granted. It has also entire prohibition within three miles of a church or school-house.

Tennessee has a four-mile law; giving prohibition to the territory for four miles around every school house and institution of learning. This does not apply, however, to incorporated towns, and over 100 towns have become unincorporated in order to have the benefit of the four-mile law. Tennessee has voted to submit prohibition, but like Rhode Island, must vote again before a popular vote can be taken

Kentucky has a general local option law, elections holding for two years.

Missouri has one of the most stringent high-license laws.

Kansas has constitutional prohibition.

Iowa has the same.

Minnesota has now a local option license law.

Wisconsin has secondary local option, with a civil damage provision.

Illinois has a high license law with secondary local option.

Michigan has a tax law with secondary local option. Tax, $300.

Ohio has a tax law pronounced unconstitutional, as the state coustitution prohibits license.

Indiana has a general license law.

Nebraska has a high-license law with prohibition the rule, and only by affirmative vote of the people is license granted. Price of licenses from $500 to $1,000.

Colorado as a State licenses the saloon whose sales are more than by the quart. The constitution provides that the legislature shall enact prohibitory laws, but it is of no effect.

California is under license law.

Nevada has a general license law.

Oregon has a local option law and has submitted prohibition to a vote of the people next June.—Union Signal.

THE CHURCHES.

—Captain Bundy, the sailor evangelist, is cruising in the Straits of Mackinac, Michigan.

—The Southern Baptists number 1,868,552, of whom 997,509 are white, and 871,043 are colored.

—Over ninty conversions have been recently reported at the Methodist church of Decatur, Ala.

—Efforts are being made to place missionaries of the Protestant Episcopal church iu Castle Garden, N. Y.

—The Methodist churches of Atlanta have reported nearly 500 additions to their membership during the present year.

—The Roman Catholics claim 100,000 adherents among the negroes of the South—two-thirds of them in Maryland, Kentucky and Louisiana.

—The interest in the Young Men's Christian Association movement is exteuding throughout the South, and in some of the cities steps are being taken to increase its efficiency by employing methods, comparatively new to the South, which have proved successful elsewhere.

—The remarkable revival at Hot Springs, Ark., still goes on. After two full months there is no abatement in the good work, which seems rather to increase. There have been more than three hundred conversions. One hundred and three have been added to the Methodist Episcopal church, South, and other denominations have shared largely in the fruits.

—Rev. P. A. Seguin, having removed from this city to Detroit some months ago, has taken the superintendency of a number of French evangelical missions iu Michigan, Ohio, and a part of Canada. He requests the prayers of Christian people in behalf of his work.

—The General Assembly of the United Presbyterian church has outlined its benevolent work for the ensuing year on the basis of an average contribution from each member of two dollars and eighty-one cents.

—Through the liberality of Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson a service of song has been provided for the masses in Tompkins Square, New York, at which thousands of people gather on Sunday afternoon to hear the hymns.

—It may not be generally known, says an exchange, that at one of the evangelist Moody's London Meetings, the philosopher agnostic, Herbert Spencer, sat upon the platform at a service and donated a hundred pounds to testify his appreciation of the benificent results of this religious work.

—Rev. Mr. Imad-ud-din, for many years a very useful native pastor or Amritsur, Northern India, is the first converted Hindoo, it is said, to receive the title of D. D. Since his conversion, nearly twenty years ago, he has written more than twenty books, including commentaries on several of the books of the New Testament.

—The statue of Zwingle, the Swiss reformer, is to be unveiled at Zurich in the course of this month. For ten years past the idea has been entertained, and subscriptions solicited; and at last the monument is nearly completed. Unfortunately, it was found impracticable to erect it in the great square which bears the reformer's name, and near the church where he used to preach. It is to stand by the Wasserkirche.

—Since the commencement of the year there have been received into the church at the Railroad Chapel, Chicago, of which the Rev. Charles M. Morton is pastor, seventy-two persons, nearly all of them on confession of their faith in Christ.

—The Presbytery of San Francisco has now upon its rolls two Chinese, one Japanese, one Welsh, one Spanish, and one French church. All are prosperous except the Spanish, which is at present without a pastor.

—The Congregationalist calls attention to the decorous action of the owners of the English yacht, Genesta, now visiting New York, in observing the Sabbath, which it says is at once a rebuke and an example. The vessel reached Marblehead on Saturday evening, August 8th, and on Sunday every arrangement on board indicated a careful respect for the day. The decorum of the crew was all the more noticeable when contrasted to the gayety of hundreds of other crafts which were sailing about the harbor all day.

—The Women's Missionary Societies of the Methodist church in Chicago and the ministers of the same denomination are looking forward to the immediate opening in that city of a Christian training-school for women. Property is to be secured, a charter procured, and work at once begun. The missionary pupils are to prepare for all kinds of Christian work, foreign and home, in this school. While they are receiving theoretical instruction, they will also be doing practical work among the poor and degraded of the city. Some localities of Chicago have only one evangelical church to 15,000 people.

—The new Presbyterian church at Carroll, Iowa, has a novel arrangement called the "Nursery." In the corners each side of the vestibule curtains are drawn across, which add much to the appearance of the auditorium, and inside each little room behind the curtains is a small comfortable rocker and crib, all furnished for the babies. The pastor wants both mothers and children at church, and this provision for their comfort in the house of God is worthy of imitation, since, frequently in most of our Western country and village congregations, all the family must come or all must stay at home.

—The British and Foreign Bible Society determined last year to issue an edition of the New Testament at two cents a copy. In nine months 950,000 copies were sold.

—Since 1841 the Primitive Methodist church in England has grown in membership from 75,967 to 192,384, and in the same time the ministry has increased from 495 to 1,042.

—According to General Booth, the Salvation Army flies its colors in 17 countries, numbers 1,050 corps of soldiers, and 2,650 paid officers. The army publishes 20 newspapers, reaching half a million readers every week.

—The Romanists seem to intend to occupy the new Congo State in force. They have already sent missionaries there and recently have commissioned forty more. Very impressive services were held in the cathedral of Algiers as the company was about to start on its journey to the Congo valley. A number of the company have received special training at Algiers for service among Oriental peoples. One of the features of the system which they are expected to develop is the purchase of children to be educated for the work of the church. The Missions Catholiques acknowledges in a recent number the receipt of 1,570 francs "for the purchase of pagan children" and a sum of 676 francs "for the purchase and baptism of pagan children under the names Marie Therese, Theodora, Elizabeth, Marie," etc.

—There is a missionary hospital at Jaffa, under the care of Miss Mangan. The Misses Mangan and Newton first began caring for the sick by receiving sufferers to their own house; but the work has grown so that a rented house was obtained, and care for the sick made a specialty. Eighteen beds are now kept full of patients indoors, and of out-patients there were 11,500. There are now constantly employed four ladies and one skillful Syrian doctor.

—There is a Baptist church of seventeen or eighteen members at Nablous, Palestine—the ancient Shechem—with a congregation of 100, a Sunday-school of 140, a day school of 100 Mohammedan girls, and a house of worship called "Zion Upper Chamber Baptist Chapel."

—The Lutherans of America have a history of which they must not be ashamed. The first Protestant church of America was built by the Swedes, about 1638, at Wilmington, Delaware, and mission work was commenced among the Indians before John Eliot put his foot on American soil. Luther's Catechism was the first book of Christian instruction ever translated into any Indian tongue of the land, and Lutheran missionaries preached the Gospel to the red men forty years before the coming of William Penn. One hundred years ago there were about two dozen Lutheran pastors in this country whose congregations numbered about 6,000 members. To-day her roll has the names of 3,700 pastors, and her communicant membership is about 900,000. For fifty years on an average, the church has doubled the number of her ministers every ten years, and the number of her members every fourteen years. Of late years she has proportionately increased more rapidly than any other denomination in the land. A careful statistician says that she is growing at the rate of about 62,000 members and 320 congregations each year, or nearly one congregation and 160 members each day of the year. Naturally a good deal of this remarkable growth is due to immigration, and to the honor of the Lutheran church, it must be said, that she fully understands her mission in this regard and is working with might and main to do justice to it.—N. Y. Independent.

THE SECRET EMPIRE.

—The press report from Madison, Wisconsin, of the Good Templar order is encouraging to all good citizens, in the evidence it gives that the lodge and the prohibition movement are getting farther apart and the former must soon be shaken off: "The thirteenth annual session of the Wisconsin Grand Lodge, Independent order of Good Templars, convened here to-day, 200 delegates being present. The Grand Lodge degree was conferred upon seventy six candidates. Grand Worthy Chief Templar J. F. Cleghorn rendered his annual report, in which he said he believed the present was full of inspiration. Grand Secretary B. F. Parker, of Mousten, reported the total number of lodges in the State Sept. 1, 1885, as 365; total membership at the close of the year, 13,124; total losses during the year, 1,187. Treasurer L. W. Parker, of Mouston, reported the receipts of the year at $5,985 and the expenditures $6,369 The losses in membership during three years past have been very heavy, owing to the fact that the order has departed from its established purpose and dabbled in politics."

—The Masonic Grand Lodge of Rhode Island laid the corner stone Sept. 1st, at Newport, of the statue to the memory of Commodore Oliver Hazard Perry, the hero of Lake Erie. The statue, which is of bronze, weighing nearly four tons, will soon be placed in position.

What imaginable claim the lodge had to this ceremony except the purposes of an advertisement it is impossible to conjecture.

—The National Convention of Masonic Boards of Relief met in Baltimore lately. The Committee on organization reported in favor of organizing permanently for the purpose of facilitating the exposure of persons traveling around the country and imposing on lodges, and for the collection of statistics, etc. A constitution was adopted providing for the election of officers, and the organization will be known as the General Relief Association of the United States and Canada. This Masonic insurance holds back thousands from leaving the lodge.

—Freemasonry was planted in China by the Grand Lodge of England, and the first Masonic hall was dedicated at Hong Kong, Oct. 13, 1853.

—It is said that three Grand Masters of England were Roman Catholics, viz: The Duke of Norfolk, 1720–30; the Duke of Montague, 1732, and Lord Petre, 1772–76. When Grand Master the Marquis of Ripon became a Roman Catholic he left the craft.

—As the Lieutenant-Governor of Illinois has little public business to discharge he gives his attention to Masonry thus: "By order of John C. Smith, 33d deg., Deputy of the Supreme Council for the State of Illinois, a special notification is issued to members that there will be a special session of Illinois Council of Deliberation," etc.

—The celebration of the second anniversary of the establishment of the order of "Independent Forestry" in Illinois took place in this city lately, and consisted of a grand parade through the streets and addressed by R. M. Oliver, High Chief Ranger, Assistant State's Attorney L. L. Mills, Judge W H Barnum, Harry Rubens, the attorney of the liquor dealers in Chicago. The State High Court of Illinois consists of seventy eight subordinate courts with 7,000 members, located in Illinois and adjacent States, Dr. P. H. Corvin and others.

HOME HINTS.

FLIES AND THEIR RELATION TO DISEASE.

It is a common belief that the absence of flies for a season it a percursor of an epidemic, and flies being this year less numerous than some other seasons, some of our contemporaries have reasoned that the cholera or some other dreadful epidemic is to inflict our laud, or as one of contemporaries puts it, "without more flies everybody is going to be sick, and a great many people are going to die." The process of reasoning on this subject is about as follows, given by a writer more rational than superstitious, which we find in the Midland Industrial Gazette: "The absence of flies does not exactly presage an epidemic — that is, the flies are not killed by the poison in the air, as many superstitious persons who have noticed the coincidence between disease and a small fly crop believe—but their absence is in itself a cause of sickness and epidemics. The scarcity of flies this year is attributed to the somewhat phenomenal weather prevailing in the North this Spring. In February there was a remarkable warm spell, a mild temperature that hatched out most of the pupæ, and brought many little flies prematurely into the world. This was followed by a long continued and severe cold in March, which killed all these young flies before they could get in their work on the bald and sleepy. Hence a short fly crop. And now as to its relation to disease: The fly is a vulture, a buzzard on a small scale. It is the most important, because the most numerous, destroyer of pest-breeding material. It gets in on foul and decaying matter that can be reached by no other insect or animal, and it destroys it. The quantity of this pestilential matter thus removed cannot be estimated, because the fly is always getting away with it in summer, while in winter the cold prevents its evil influences being felt. When, therefore, there are too few flies to thoroughly consume all the forms of dead and decaying substance that fills the earth, the surplus pollutes the air, the soil, and water and creates and propagates disease. It is suggested, therefore to New York, that, in view of this fly famine, that city stands imminent dread of an invasion by that great enemy, cholera, and the citizens are warned to be more than usually careful, and to supply the lack of fly by exercising extraordinary care in the removal of everything calculated to beget or nourish a pestilence."

In contradistinction to the above, Doctor Grassi, in an article in the British Medical Journal in 1883, on danger from flies claimed to have made an important, by no means pleasant, discovery in regard to flies. It was always recognized, said the learned doctor, that these insects might carry the germs of infection on their wings or feet, but it was not known that they are capable of taking in at the mouth such objects as the ova of various worms, and of discharging them again unchanged in their fæces. This point has now been established, and several striking experiments illustrate it. Dr. Grassi exposed in his laboratory a plate containing a great number of the eggs of a human parasite, the Tricocephalus dispar. Some sheets of white paper were placed in the kitchen, which stands about ten meters from the laboratory. After some hours, the usual spots produced by the fæces of flies were found on the paper. These spots when examined by the microscope, were found to contain some of the eggs of the tricocephalus. Some of the flies themselves were then caught, and their intestines presented large numbers of the ova. Similar experiments with the ova of the Oxyuris vermicularis and of the Tænia solium afforded corresponding results. Shortly after the flies had some mouldy cream, the Oidium lactis was found in their fæces. Dr. Grassi mentions an innocuous and yet conclusive experiment that everyone can try. Sprinkle a little lycopodium on sweetened water, and afterward examine the fæces and intestines of the flies; numerous spores will be found. As flies are by no means particular in choosing either a place to feed or a place to defecate, often selecting meat or food for the purpose a somewhat alarming vision of possible consequences is raised.—Scientific American

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and reed at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandeigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niegara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribee his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing hie letter he writes: "I now look beck through an interval of fifty-six yeare with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power end dangerous influencee of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this greet journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] single copy, 5 cents.

OR THE POWER OF THE SECRET EMPIRE. A faithful representation in story of the evil influence of Freemasonry, by E. E. FLAGG, author of "Little People," "A Sunny Life," etc. This is a thrillingly interesting story, accurately true to life because mainly a narration of historical facts. 384 pages. In cloth, $1; per doz., $9. Paper, 50c; per doz., $4.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"There is no important history extent but has connected with it numerous other histories of which it was the initial point, or the dominating influence. The abduction and murder of Morgan set ten thousand secret springs in motion, as the surrender of the charters of so meny lodges at that time, and the severing of their connection with the order of some forty thousend of its members indicated. This story is one of these histories, and is a collection of facts woven into a story. It cannot fail to be read with interest."—Free Methodist, Chicago.

"The republication of the Reform Story which ran through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these meke a helpful edditon for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind."—Christian Cynosure.

"It is one of the most fascineting narratives we ever read and teaches its lesson in a manner not soon to be forgotten. It is evidently written for the heart and its words go to the heart. It is singularly free from wild denunciation. Those who are interested in the secret society question would do well to form the acquaintence of this interesting work."—Lutheran Standard, Columbus, O.

"The exciting scenes of the fall of 1826, at Batavia, N. Y., when Wm. Morgan was murdered by Masonry, are woven into the story so as to give the truth of History a setting of attractiveness. The forty chapters of the volume are soon compessed by the eeger reader who begins the volume. This volume ought to be read and will be sought as its merits become known."—United Brethren in Christ.

"In an incidental way the story tells much about the manner of conducting lodges and much about the spirit and methods of Masonry. The story covers the period of the abduction and murdering of William Morgan. The strategic position from which the author writes put a charm in the book, while it gives a good opportunity to show the workings of the order. We wish all the people would read it."—Telescope.

"The story is intensely interesting and the author has succeeded in weaving into it a great deal of information in regard to this mysterious order, which is certainly startling if true, and he gives what seems to be undoubted evidence to prove his assertions. The book is one which should be read by both Masons and Antimasons."—Wayne Co. Herald.

"Our Anti-secret society friends are certainly entitled to great credit for their persistence in their efforts to expose and root out secretism. The object of the writer of this story is to present in its true light the crafty, unscrupulous and exceedingly hurtful influence of Masonry, the parent of all the orders."—Reformed Presbyterian and Covenanter.

FARM NOTES.

THE POTATO CROP.

That the potato crop is one of the most important crops produced in this country a few figures will easily show. In 1882 the total number of acres devoted to potato raising was 2,171,636, and from them were raised 170,972,508 bushels of tubers, valued at $95,304,844. These figures are from the Department of Agriculture report for May, 1873, and are as nearly accurate as may be. In order to ascertain the comparative value of this crop in connection with other farm products we must find out the value assigned to the product of an acre which we as certain to be as follows:

Potatoes	$43 84	Hay	$11 45
Barley	13 50	Oats	9 64
Wheat	12 00	Buckwheat	9 48
Indian Corn	11 91	Rye	8 24

For the cereals named above, of course the grain only is considered, though in a more accurate estimate the value of the straw would have to be included, which however, would still leave the potato crop far ahead.

In respect to average cash value of this crop per acre by states and territories we find that the figures run as follows: Montana, $120, Utah, $112.50, Idaho, $104.20, New Mexico, $90, Nevada, $89.96, Arizona, $82.50, Maine, $75.00, Massachusetts $84, Rhode Island $68.56, Vermont, $68.07, New York being only $48.82.

One reason why less attention is paid by most farmers to this crop than to others is probably because there is much strictly manual labor required in raising and harvesting it; improvements in machinery have not been so great in this direction as in others, and farmers are not to be censured if they devote the larger part of their acres to crops that can be planted and gathered with more ease than this. However the fact stands out plainly that potatoes are a profitable crop; and now that there is really little to fear from the attacks of the Colorado beetle, if care is taken, it would seem a wise plan for farmers whose land is adapted to it to cultivate the potato in larger areas. Some sections seem to be more conducive to disease in the potato than others; but if a few points of culture be borne in mind, there will be little or no fear of the potato rot.

1. Tubers that are not mature when planted induce feeble growth, being wanting in the starch element which nourishes the young plant; hence care should be taken in the selection of seed.

2. Excessive fertilizing, especially with nitrogenious manures causes a too rapid and therefore weak growth of the plant. This should be avoided, as such fertilizers are an immediate cause, it is claimed, of fungous growths, which are the prime causes of decay.

3. Make the location of the potato-patch on rather high ground. Low, wet lands favor decay, owing to dampness. This should always be avoided; and especially should excessive dampness be excluded from the cellar in which potatoes are placed.

Without stopping at this time to consider the kinds of soil best suited to potato, the planting and cultivation, we pass to the more seasonable work of gathering and storing the crop. There might be little need of saying much on this point were it not that there are still many farmers who pay but little attention to this very important part of the work. The potato is not bound to keep from decaying if conditions suited to bring about such a state are present. Some men go into the potato field just after a rain, throw out the tubers covered with mud, and hurry them away to the bins. Of course they rot. Or they leave them exposed to the blistering rays of the sun, which injures them. It is time and money lost in the end to dig potatoes when the weather and the soil are not right. Men sometimes need to censure themselves more, and the weather, the "bugs," and the variety of potato less, as some varieties seem predisposed to rot more than others.

On most farms the hoe and fork are still the only implements used for digging, though some make use of the plow and in rare instances some patent machine finds its way into the field. No doubt, there will be, perhaps now is, a patent potato digger that does good work; but we are not fortunate enough to have seen it yet. But in the use of the hoe or fork, much care is uncessary not to injure the tubers. Those that are bruised and hacked up are on the short cut to the pigtrough, and such should not be put into the bin with the sound ones. "Bad company corrupts good morals," is true in the potato bin.

Different methods for storing for the winter are practiced with varying success. Some prefer the trench system, some the mound system, and some always make use of the cellar; and in many respects the cellar is preferable. One has the opportunity of knowing what is going on in the box or bin in the cellar, when he cannot so easily determine the fact in the mound or trench. A good frost-proof cellar, under house or barn, free from excessive dampness, and he has a good place for his potatoes. But if under the living rooms, we have this word of caution: Never allow decaying potatoes, or vegetables of any kind in fact, to remain there a day after their presence is known. Unhealthful odors, positive disease may be the result to the family above stairs. Precaution is always wise.—Chatham, N. Y., Independent.

IN THE COILS; — OR — The Coming Conflict.

A NEW AND STRANGE STORY BASED ON STARTLING FACTS, VIVIDLY PORTRAYING A MYSTERIOUS AND DANGEROUS POWER AT WORK IN THE GOVERNMENT, THE CHURCH, AND THE HOME.

"All will agree that this is a powerfully written story."—Evangelist, (Chicago, Ills.)

"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D. D. in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia.)

"Unless we are greatly mistaken, the work will do more to awaken the American church and people to the evils of Freemasonry than any other book recently published."—Evangelical Repository.

"The book will create a sensation in Masonic circles, and evoke criticism of a most relentless character. The courage of the author in attacking such a rock-rooted bulwark as Freemasonry is something to admire, Fanatic though he be."—Nebraska Watchman.

"Light is needed on this subject and needed badly, and we welcome this contribution to the literature of anti-secretism, and cordially commend it to the favorable attention of our readers."—United Presbyterian, (Pittsburgh.)

"A charming work, fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin;' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the book, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.' "—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ills.)

Thurlow Weed's Great Letter

On the abduction and murder of WILLIAM MORGAN in 1826, which has been the most widely published of any Anti-masonic document. The dedication of a noble granite monument to the memory of Morgan, and the able and eloquent addresses of the Convention make this a most valuable pamphlet.

SEE WHY.

It contains—
1. Portrait of Morgan.
2. Portrait of Thurlow Weed.
3. Fine picture of the Monument.
4. The great letter of Thurlow Weed and his affidavit—almost the last public act of his life.
5. Address by J. E. Roy, D.D.
6. The monument oration by Pres. C. A. Blanchard.
7. Addresses on "Christian Politics" by Pres. J. Blanchard, on the Character of Freemasonry by Prof. E. D. Bailey, on the "Freedmen and Secret Societies" by Rev. H. H. Hinman; and very interesting personal and historical reminiscences.

IN BRIEF.

A correspondent declares that Patti could not afford to have children, "because she wouldn't sing her own baby to sleep for less than $2,000 a night." That's on a par with the story of the editor, who, when asked by his sweetheart to "notice the moon," declined to do so for less than twenty-five cents a line.

Every stop of a train costs money to a railroad company. Recent statistics kept on a certain trunk line showed that during a year the 350 daily trains made 7,000 extra stops every twenty-four hours, the traffic being largely suburban. Experiments showed also that each stop cost 42 cents, reckoned largely in extra time to its employes who, for that number of stops put in the aggregate 350 extra hours per day, making a total loss to the company of nearly $50,000 a year.

One of the strangest people with whom the missionary has to do are the Falashas of Ethiopia. They are black Hebrews, about 200,000 in number, living west of the Jordan, who have as their holy writings the Old Testament in an Ethiopic version, and who still adhere to the Mosaic ceremonies and laws. They are the children of the Hebrew immigrants, who, in the time of the great dispersion, settled in Abyssinia, and married wives of that nation—a thing not strange, as the Ethiopians are Semitic in nationality and language.

They were in the grocery store. Said Brown (seeing a blind man about to enter): "Were you aware how delicate the touch of a blind person is? When nature deprives us of one sense, she makes amends by bringing the other senses to extraordinary acuteness. Let us illustrate by this gentleman. I'll take a scoop of this sugar and let him feel of it, and you see how quickly he'll tell you what it is." The blind man having entered, he was put to the test. He put his thumb and finger into the scoop, and without hesitation said: "That is sand." Everybody laughed but the grocer. He made three several attempts at blushing, then went into the back shop and kicked his dog.

At the Passaic rolling mill and bridge works, of Paterson, N. J., is being built what will be, when finished, the longest draw-span in the world. It is to be 430 feet long, will weigh about 500 tons, and consist of iron and steel in proportion of three to two. The machinery for latching, lifting the ends and turning the draw is all to be worked from the center of the span, and is fitted to be operated either by hand or power. The turntable is rim-bearing, turning on fifty wheels eighteen inches in diameter. The diameter of the drum is twenty-five and a half feet. It is for the new bridge which the Minnesota and Northwestern railroad company is constructing across the Mississippi river at St. Paul. The length of the entire bridge will be 1,430 feet.

Kentucky used to be classified as a Southern State. A classification under the head of "the Mississippi States," said to be adopted in some of modern school geographies, is not generally accepted. It is a curious arrangement at this late day that classes New, York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey among the "Middle States," and Ohio, Indiana and Illinois "the West." The grouping proposed by the Census office is into North Atlantic, South Atlantic, Northern Central, Southern Central, and Western States. Under this system Kentucky is among the Southern Central States. By this arrangement the Western States begin about the 104th degree west longitude, Colorado being the easternmost of the Western States. The line of the Allegheny or Apalachian Mountains is the general divide between the South Atlantic and Southern Central States. The southern boundary of Pennsylvania divides the North Atlantic from the South Atlantic States, and its western boundary is the line between North Atlantic and Northern Central.

Adoptive Masonry Illustrated. A full and complete illustrated ritual of the five degrees of Female Free Masonry, by Thomas Lowe; comprising the degree of Jephtha's Daughter, Ruth, Esther, Martha and Electa, and known as the Danghter's Degree, Widow's Degree, Wife's Degree, Sister's Degree and the Benevolent Degree. 20 cents each; per dozen, $1.75.

Knight Templarism Illustrated. A full illustrated ritual of the six degrees of the Council and Commandery, comprising the degrees of Royal Master, Select Master, Super-Excellent Master, Knight of the Red Cross, Knight Templar and Knight of Malta. A book of 341 pages. In cloth, $1.00; $8.50 per dozen. Paper covers, 50cts; $4.00 per dozen.

Grand Lodge Masonry. Its relation to civil government and the Christian religion. By Prest. J. Blanchard, at the Monmouth Convention. The un-Christian, anti-republican and despotic character of Freemasonry is proved from the highest Masonic authorities. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Judge Whitney's Defense before the GRAND LODGE OF ILLINOIS. Judge Daniel H. Whitney was Master of the lodge when S. L. Keith, a member of his lodge, murdered Ellen Slade. Judge Whitney, by attempting to bring Keith to justice, brought on himself the vengeance of the lodge, but he boldly replied to the charges against him, and afterwards renounced Masonry. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

Oaths and Penalties of Freemasonry, as proved in court in the New Berlin Trial. Also the letter of Hon. Richard Rush to the anti-Masonic committee of York County, Pa., May 4th, 1831. The New Berlin trials began in the attempt of Freemasons to prevent public initiations by seceding Masons. These trials were held at New Berlin, Chenango Co., N. Y., April 13 and 14th, 1831, and General Augustus C. Welsh, sheriff of the county, and other adhering Freemasons, swore to the truthful revelation of the oaths and penalties. 10 cents each; per dozen, $1.00.

Stearns' Inquiry into the Nature and TENDENCY OF FREEMASONRY. With an Appendix treating on the truth of Morgan's Exposition and containing remarks on various points in the character of Masonry, and a Dialogue on the necessity of exposing the lodge. 338 pages: cloth, 60 cents each per dozen, $5.00. Paper covers, 40 cents each; per dozen, $4.00.

Masonic Oaths Null and Void; or, Freemasonry Self-Convicted. This is a book for the times. The design of the author is to refute the arguments of those who claim that the oaths of Freemasonry are binding upon those who take them. His arguments are conclusive, and the forcible manner in which they are put, being drawn from Scripture, makes them convincing. The minister or lecturer will find in this work a rich fund of arguments. 207 pp., postpaid.....40 cts.

Bernard's Appendix to Light on MaSONRY. Showing the character of the institution by its terrible oaths and penalties. Paper covers: 25 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Freemasonry Self-Condemned. By Rev J. W. Bain. A careful and logical statement of reasons why secret orders should not be fellowshiped by the Christian Church, and by the United Presbyterian church in particular. Paper covers: price 20 cents each; per dozen, $2.00.

Masonry a Work of Darkness, adverse to Christianity, and inimical to republican government. By Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong (Presbyterian), a seceding Mason of 21 degrees. This is a very telling work and no honest man who reads it will think of joining the lodge. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

The Mystic Tie, or Freemasonry a LEAGUE WITH THE DEVIL. This is an account of the church trial of Peter Cook and wife, of Elkhart, Indiana, for refusing to support a reverend Freemason; and their very able defense presented by Mrs. Lucia C. Cook, in which she clearly shows that Freemasonry is antagonistic to the Christian religion. 15 cents each; per dozen, $1.25.

Sermon on Masonry, by Rev. James Williams, Presiding Elder of Dakota District Northwestern Iowa Conference, M. E. Church—a seceding Master Mason. Published at the special request of nine clergymen of different denominations, and others. 10 cents each; per dozen, 75 cents.

Are Masonic Oaths Binding on one Initiate. By Rev. A. L. Post. Proof of the sinfulness of such oaths and the consequent duty of all who have taken them to openly repudiate them. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

Freemasonry Contrary to the ChrisTIAN RELIGION. A clear, cutting argument against the lodge, from a Christian standpoint. 5 cents each; per dozen, 50 cents.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

COUNTRY.

The appointment of Rensselaer Stone as collector of internal revenue in the place of Mr. Harvey at Chicago was unexpected, but is interpreted as showing a stong disfavor toward the Harrison, McDonald gang that has been running the politics of this city from the Democratic standpoint.

A gathering of some interest was the reunion of the organization known as the Army of the Tennessee in this city last week. Gen. Sherman, Postmaster-General Vilas, General W. W. Belknap, Gen-Chetlain, General Fletcher, of Missouri, Governor Sherman of Iowa, Governor Alger of Michigan, and many other distinguished ex-warriors were present.

The Massachusetts prohibitionists, at their convention Thursday at Worcester, nominated Thomas J. Lathrop, of Taunton, for Governor.

In accordance with the request of the United States postal authorities, all mails from Montreal destined for the United States will be fumigated prior to dispatch There were thirty four new cases of small-pox at Montreal Wednesday.

Mayor Rice, of St. Paul, Minn., decided Thursday to permit open gambling, no arrests to be made except in case of disturbances or complaints by citizens.

President Cleveland Wednesday appointed Mrs M. A. Mulligan to be pension agent at Chicago, vice Miss Ada C. Sweet, resigned.

A rock which had fallen upon the track overturned the locomotive, baggage and smoking cars of the Montreal Express near Whitehall, N. Y., early Wednesday morning, the engineer being killed instantly, and five others severely injured.

It is believed that two vessels were wrecked Tuesday night off Two Rivers, Wis. The hull of one can be seen and the wreckage is coming ashore. No bodies have been found.

There were forty-eight new cases of small-pox at Montreal Tuesday and twenty-three deaths. The disease has made its appearance at Ottawa, Ont., and Sutton, P. Q., and fears are entertained that it will reach Richford, Vt., eight miles from Sutton.

Miss Marian Norwood, an actress, retired at New York Tuesday night with a cigarette in her mouth. Falling asleep, the cigarette set fire to the bedclothes, the woman was burned to a crisp.

Resolutions for prohibition and woman suffrage were presented at the constitutional convention of South Dakota Wednesday, and were referred to a proper committee, which will, it is believed, report for the submission of these questions to the people, and an article to this effect will be engrafted into the constitution.

In a colored church near Canton, Miss., Wednesday night, while Aaron Warz, the deacon, was kneeling with the congregation, at prayer, Leon Cockrell, a negro teacher, shot Warz dead.

A suit was decided yesterday in the superior court at Charlotte, N. C., involving points of interest to the general public. In January, 1883, James G. Holmes, late of Charleston, and now of Baltimore, was ejected from the only first class passenger car of a train on the Carolina Central railroad and forced to ride for some hours in a car filled with tobacco smoke He claimed damages in the sum of $5,000, and a jury awarded him $475.

Hon. Emery A. Storrs of Chicago was found dead in bed at the Clifton House, Ottawa, Saturday morning. He had been attending the Supreme Court to argue the motion for a new trial in the case of Mackin, the ballot thief. For several days he had been feeling unwell, but was able to be about the court and hotel.

Near Seattle, Wy. T. Saturday morning a large building occupied by fifty Chinese laborers was attacked by a mob of masked men. The Chinese fled into the woods.

The Sacramento river, California, is now so filled up by debris and slickens washed down from the mines worked in past years that passenger and freight boats can no longer reach Sacramento. The shoaling of the river has increased so rapidly during the last three years that unless measures are promptly taken by the government to thoroughly dredge the wer basin there is every probability that Sacramento City and all the great grain-growing valleys of northeastern California will be cut off from water communication with San Francisco.

Fifty years ago Ellen Johnson, a colored woman, was separated from her mother, who was sold and sent to New Orleans. The mother arrived at Louisville last week hale and hearty. She is 112 years old and the daughter 60. Living in the house with Mrs. Ellen Johnson are the children to the third generation, so that the Johnson family now consists of great-great-grandmother, great-grandmother, grandmother, mother and children.

John L. Sullivan, the prize-fighter, pitched in a game of base ball at Cleveland Sunday. As the champion was leaving the ground he was placed under arrest, charged with violating the Sunday law. He was taken before a justice of the peace and gave bail in $500 for his appearance at 2 o'clock Monday afternoon.

Washington Court House, the county seat of Fayette county, O., a town of some 3,000 inhabitants was terribly visited by a cyclone Tuesday evening last. A heavy rainfall prevented any notice of the wind which came on suddenly with a terrifying sound. The people were not frightened until they heard the rattling of signs in the terrific storm. It kept getting worse and worse until the largest and most substantial brick and stone structures of the city heaved to and fro at the mercy of the steadily increasing gale. Bricks and beams, roofs, fences and almost every conceivable thing that could possibly be wrenched loose flew through the air, scattering death and destruction everywhere. For eight long minutes the destructive work went on. Music Hall was filled with people attending the salvation army meeting, and as a portion of the roof and ceiling fell in, a disastrous panic and stampede was prevented with the greatest difficulty. In Odd-fellows Hall forty members were gathered at a meeting in the second story when the storm came. The building was literally thrown down, yet not one was injured. Thirty-one went down with the ruins and escaped, while nine clung to the walls of an adjoining block and were rescued by ladders. Search amid the wrecked buildings discovered five killed and some 300 injured; nearly a million dollars worth of property was destroyed.

During the same evening cyclones or heavy wind storms passed near Adrian, Mich., through Wyandot Co., O, and in the vicinity of Dublin and Cambridge City, Ind., doing great damage and injuring many persons.

FOREIGN.

Letters from China state that France lost 15,000 men in the Tonquin campaign, while the Chinese loss was 100,000.

Floods have destroyed the crops in Bengal. The Calcutta district is submerged.

Throughout Spain Thursday there were 1,729 new cases of cholera, and 542 deaths were reported.

M. de Lesseps is bringing the influence of powerful financial houses to bear to obtain authority from the French government for an issue on the Panama Canal shares. Premier Brisson adheres to his determination that no decision shall be given until after the elections.

The official Gazette of Berlin says that on Aug. 19 the government received a note from Spain protesting against Germany's occupation of the Caroline Islands, and that Bismarck's reply was handed to the Spanish Minister of Foreign Affairs on Sept. 4. In his reply Prince Bismarck pointed out that German traders who had resided for many years on the Caroline Islands, believing the islands to be unclaimed, had demanded the protection of Germany. Such protection, said the Chancellor, would have been neither solicited nor granted if it had been thought that Spain claimed the Archepelago. Official inquiries showed that the only interests represented on the islands were German and British, the former largely predominating. In view of the fact that Spain had made no objection to Germany's note of March 1885, in which Germany refuted Spanish claims to the Carolines, Germany was justified in regarding the islands as ownerless. The annexation had been effected in good faith, and Germany was willing in a friendly spirit, to examine into the claims now put forth by Spain or to submit the matter to arbitration. The Chancellor, in concluding his reply, said that the question was a too trivial one to imperil the friendship existing between Spain and Germany.
